TO THE Most August and most Serene Majesty OF
CHARLES II.
King of Great Britain, France and Ireland.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

YOUR Majesty's kind acceptance of this Chronicle when first published by Sir Richard Baker, encourages me to present it to Your gracious Protection, as it is now by me Continued to Your Majesties Coronation; containing much of the History of Your Majesties own Life; a Life, which gives to the World the most Excellent Example any Age hath produced of True and Magnanimous Fortitude and Clemency; and speaks You as much a Monarch by Nature as Inheritance. Your Majesties indulgent kindness to all Your People, makes me not despair to obtain Your Pardon for the Mistakes, which perhaps through Ignorance, I may have committed: For there never was any History filled with more various and wonderful Transactions than these Late Times have brought forth: My chiefest design both in this, and all other my endeavours, is to have the honour of being esteemed,

Most Gracious Sovereign,

Your Majesties most Dutiful, and most Obedient Subject, Edward Phillips.

The Epistle to the Reader.

Sir Richard Baker who writ, and published this History, to the beginning of the Reign of King Charles the First, affirmed, That it was collected with so great care and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles should be lost, this only would be sufficient to inform Posterity of all Passages memorable or worthy to be known; and if so much might be said of what he did, I presume, nothing that hath been since added to it, and published, has impaired the credit and worth thereof.

The many Impressions that have been made and sold of the Book both before, and after the Addition, are a sufficient testimony of the kind acceptance it has had in the World: How necessary this present Continuation is (which alone might have made a Competent History) will best appear by the perusal thereof; and in that part which describes the Transactions of the Duke of Albemarle, there is not only so exact an Account as is nowhere else to be found, but also many secret Passages of particular remark, which could never have been known, but from his Excellencies own Papers, and several other private Collections of Persons active with him in that Service, which I had the permission to make use of; wherein I have been so faithful, that there is not any Letter, Speech, or Discourse in Publick Conferences, which are not exactly set down as they were written, or spoke, save only, that of Such Letters, or Speeches, as were very long, the most pertinent parts are only retained.

The wonderful Restauration of his Majesty, which is the Subject of that part of the Continuation; is one of the most extraordinary actions, that has been ever mentioned in Story, both for the Generosity of the Attempt, and the Prudent Conduct of it: For certainly, Nothing was ever enterprized with greater generosity and courage, than with * Nine thousand Six hundred Foot, and Fourteen hundred Horse and Dragoons (and those long train’d up in an aversion to Kingly Government) to preserve the whole Kingdom of Scotland in English bands, and to invade England, at a time when the Governing Power was in those that were irreconcilable to bis Majesties Person, and Government, supported by Thirty Thousand experienced and victorious Souldiers in England, of the same affections (besides what were at their devotion in Ireland, and Dunkirk) and a Militia of Trained Bands in all Counties, to a greater number than those in pay, all of chosen men, of the like Principles: and this at a time, when by the defeat of Sir George Booth, his Majesties greatest hopes were frustrated, and most of the Nobility and Gentry which were engaged with him, were disarmed, and their Estates confiscated, and ready to be divided amongst the enemies of Royalty, to alter, with the Riches, the Interest of the Kingdom, and when they were about to Enlist, and many of the Legislators themselves taken, an * Oath of abjuration of his Majesties Person and Family: But then his secrecy in the conduct of this great Affair is very remarkable, being obliged to act very differently from his intentions, to gain the confidence of those Jealous Masters whose Authority he pretended to obey.

* See pag. 625, where the numbers of his Forces are mentioned.

The Epistle to the Reader.

...for if he had but once trod awry in any of the paths he mov'd, all had miscarried; and notwithstanding his greatest subtlety, many objected (thinking thereby to weaken his credit with the Army) That the King was in the bottom of his Design.

His most prudent contrivances were often disappointed, but by his wisdom and dexterity as often retrieved; one of his greatest difficulties was to temper his own Officers and Souldiers to his purpofe, to which the opinion they had of his Conduct and courage, did much contribute, and when that was effected, he the easier modelled the rest.

...and many objected (thinking thereby to weaken his credit with the Army) That the King was in the bottom of his Design, and that he did, supposing it impossible alone without correspondence to manage so hazardous an undertaking; for he was to compass his ends by several and different means, which could not without great address be prepared and disposed thereof. And how necessary this Correspondence was, is apparent by many Transitions, but by none more, Then in the lucky contrivance of getting the Army out of London, and the quartering his Souldiers in their places, and dispersing the rest; whereby the Parliament, City, and Kingdom became at his Reverence, and without which his Majesties Restauration could never have been effected in this way.

...the consideration of these things leads me unto so great a labyrinth of Admiration, that I cannot easily desist from detaining the Reader too long from the perusal of the matter, which induces me to it: I shall therefore conclude this Epistle with that commendation of this Renowned Generals undertaking, which a Reverend and pious Prelate most justly delivered in a late Sermon, That it was A Generous, Glorious, and Heroical Design, whereby he hath at once redeemed his Country both from Slavery and Oppression, by restoring the King to his People, and the People to their King; and withal hath purchased unto himself, Honour without Envy, Greatness with Safety, and (which is the best reward of Vertue in this World) a perpetual satisfaction and complacency in himself, for having so nobly performed his duty.

12. King Cadmod his Son, reigned 48 years.
13. King Cadwalladar his Son, the last of The British Kings, who died at Rome in the year 689, after he had reigned 3 years. After which, Britain was a Colony of the Saxons; who divided it into Seven Kingdoms: But the Saxons before the death of King Cadwalladar took Kent from the British Kings, and had it in their possession: Which Kingdom of Kent began by Hengist the Saxon in the year 453, in the Reign of King Aurelius Ambrosius, before mentioned, and lasted 372 years, during the Reigns of Seventeen Kings of Kent: The last of which Kentish Kings was overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, who made Kent a Province Province to his Kingdom in the year 827. The second Kingdom was of the South-Saxons, began by Ethelma 488, in the Reign of the same British King Aurelius Ambrosius, containing Sussex and Surrey, and continued 113 years during the Reigns of five Kings only; the last of which Kings was overcome by Ine King of the West-Saxons, and so became a Province to that Kingdom of the West-Saxons in the year 601. The third Kingdom was of the West-Saxons, which began by Ceretic in 519, in the Reign of the British King Arthur, containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wilshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, and continued 561 years, during the Reigns of Eighteen Kings; the last of whom Egbert became King of the whole Nation. The fourth Kingdom was of the East Saxons, begun by Erchenwin in the year 527, containing Essex and Middlesex, and continued 281 years, during the Reigns of Fourteen Kings; the last of which Kings, Egbert, King of the West-Saxons, subdued, and so made the Kingdom of the East-Saxons to be a Province to his own Kingdom. The fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland, begun by Ella and Ine in the year 547, containing Yorkshire, Durham, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370 years, during the Reigns of 23 Kings; after the last of which, this Kingdom yielded to the Protection of Egbert King of the West-Saxons. The sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, begun by Gilla in the year 522, containing Huntingdon, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwickshire, Leicester, Northampton, Derbyshire, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hantsf irst county, and continued 220 years, during the Reigns of Twenty Kings; after which they were subdued by the West-Saxons. The seventh Kingdom was of the East-Angeles, begun by Offa in 575, containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, and continued 553 years, during the Reigns of Fifteen Kings, and at last was subject to the Kingdom of the West-Saxons: But this Kingdom of the East-Angeles was enjoyed by the Danes fifty years before the West-Saxons had it; so the Kingdom of the East-Angeles continued distinct from the rest of the Nation in the whole 403 years: So it appears that after King Porgarene the first of the Britains Kings in the year 455, had called in the Saxons out of Germany to assist him in defending the Kingdom against the Invasions of the Picts and Scots, every Britain King who succeeded him, left some part or other of it to the Saxons; till at last in the year 689, Cadwallader the last Britain King left all at his death; and then the Saxons Kings striving amongst themselves for Sovereignty, they still gained one above another, till at last in the year 818, Egbert, or some under him, reduced them all under his subjection, who then caufed all the South of the Island to be called England; the Dominion whereof continued under him and his Successors, till the Danes in the year 1017, made the great interruption.

14. King Egbert began his Reign in 818, reigned 18 years, at whose time the Danes began first to infet England; he was buried at Winchester.

15. King Ethelwulf his Son, began his Reign in 836, reigned 21 years.

16. King Ethelbald his Son, began his Reign 857, reigned 2 years, and was buried at Winborn in Dorsetshire, then an Episcopall See.

17. King Ethelbert his Brother, began his Reign 857, reigned 2 years, and was buried at the same place.

18. King Ethelred his Brother, began his Reign in 864, and was buried at Winborne in Dorsetshire.

ALTHOUGH we begin the title of our Computation from William called the Conqueror, as though he was the first of our Kings of England: yet before him, were many other excellent Kings; and their Acts perhaps as worthy to be known, if they could be known. But seeing after Ages can know nothing of former times, but what is recorded by writing: it hath happened, partly by the devastation of Libraries, and partly by the scarcity of Copies, before Printing came up; that of many Authors, scarce so much is left us, as their very names: and besides, it hath followed, that as the first Writers were Poets, so the first Writings have been Fictions. And nothing is delivered to posterity of the most ancient times, but very Fables; such as the story of Albion; (of whom they say, this Island was called Albion; though others say, Albâris, of the white cliffs,) that she should be the eldest of the two and thirty Daughters of D usa father, King of Syria; (such as never was,) who being married to two and thirty Kings, in one night, killed all their Husbands: for which fact, they were put in a Ship, themselves alone without a Pilot, so to try their adventure, and by chance arrived in this Island, of whom Gyants were begotten. And if you like not of this, then have you the story of Albinus, the son of Neptune, of whom the Island took its name. But when these are exploded, there follows another with great Antecension, and yet as very a fable as these: namely the story of the Trojan Brîtes, of whom the Island they say, was called Britain: though many other causes are given of the name: as likewise the story of Brîtes Cousin Corinaus, of whom they say, the Countrey of Cornwall had its name, to whom it was given, for overcoming the Gyants Gigantea: and that Brîte having three Sons, Locrinus, Albania, and Cambren, he gave at his death to his eldest Son Locrinus, all the Land on this side Humber, and called it Loegria; to his second Son Albania, all the land beyond Humber, of whom it was called Albânia, (now Scotland:) and to his youngest Son Cambren, all the Land beyond the River Severn, of whom it was called Cambria (now Wales,) with other such stuff which may please children, but not ripen Judgments; and were first broached by Geoffrey, Arch-deacon of Monmouth; for which all the Writers of his time cried shame upon him, and yet can scarce keep many at this day from giving credit to his Fictions. This Geoffrey of Monmouth (afterward made, by the favour of King Stephen, Bishop of St. Paul,) upon a Book written in Welsh, and brought out of Wales by Walter Arch-deacon of Exeter of the British affairs, and translated by Geoffrey, in which, though there were many notable passages, that might give much light to our History; yet so many commentaries Fables were inferred, that they rendered even what truths he wrote suspected.

And when we are once gotten out of Fables, and come to some truth; yet that truth is delivered in such slender draughts, and such broken pieces, that very small benefit can be gotten by the knowing it; and was not till the time of Julius Caesar, a thousand years after...

Of the first known times of this Island.

The Fable of Brito: at which time, the Island was yet but in manner of a Village, being without Walls, or having no shipping, (which are indeed the true Walls of an Island) but only certain small Vessels, made of Boards and Wicker. And as they had no Ships for defence without, fo neither had they any Forts, for defence within: scarce any houses but such as were made of stakes and boughs of trees taille ned together. Neither was it yet come to be a Kingdom, but was governed by a number of petty Rulers; so as Kent only had in it (as Cæsar calleth them) four Kings, (Cingetorix, Cornubius, Tectumagrus, and Segenus): which division, as it made the Britains more cafe to be conquered, so it made the Romans the longer in conquering. For if they had been one united body, one or two Battles might have made a conquest of the whole; where being thus divided, there was need to be as many battles as there were divisions: So as it was many years, before the Romans could conquer the whole Island; even from the time of Julius Cæsar, and of the Romans in Domition: not much less than two hundred years. It is true, after Cæsar’s first coming, the Island grew sensible of this defect of their division, and thereupon by consent of a great part made choice of Cefslaban, King of the Tringantes, who had his seat at Verulam, to be General of their Wars; which made indeed some little drop to the Romans proceedings: but after the Iofs of a Battle or two, they fell again into a relapse of their former defect, and thought it better to secure every one his own, by his own means, then by a general power, to hazard all at once; whereby it came afterward to be true, Domu singulam paginam, universo vincamur. Yet before the Country could be wholly conquered, at first by reason of the Nations valour, lacking to keep themselves free; and afterward by reason of the inoffensiveness of the Garrison of the Solent, and that founded on them slaves, many great op positions were made, amongst which the most memorable was that of Vindicia, a certain Queen of the Country, who having been by the Roman Souldiers her self abased, and her daughters ravished, used means to leave an Army of sixscore thousand men, whom she led her self into the Field, and set upon the Romans in their chief Towns, which were London, Verulam, and Camelotum (now Malden in Essex,) of whom the floe above seventy thousand; but then in a second Battel, had fourscore thousand of her own Army slain, after which Defeat, for avoiding of slaverie, she poyned her self.

This Island for a long time was so much effecten of the Romans, that their Emperors sometimes came inther in person; as first the Emperor Adriæn in the year 124, who reduced that great Wall between England, first made by Agricola, Nero’s General in Brit aina, and Father-in-law to Tullius the famous Historian, Adriæn having sett the Country in order returned. The same Wall was again repaired by Severus the Emperor, in the year 212, who came over into Britain to repress the Incurions of the Picts and Scots, by whom in a Battel near York, he was wounded and thereof did die; or as others say, he died of age and sicknes. Afterward in the year 205, Constatius the Emperor came into Britannia, and ended his life at York, making that City famous for the death and burial of two great Emperours; and yet more famous for the honour done to Constantius the Great, Son of Constatius, who in that City was first saluted Emperor. But notwithstanding the great extremation the Romans a long time made of this Island; yet at last, after five hundred years they had kept it in subjection, they voluntarily left it: the charge of keeping it, being greater then the benefit; for to keep it in sub jection, they maintained no fewer then four score thousand Souldiers in pay. And when Wars grew amongst themselves at home, they could no longer spare so many abroad, but recalled them home: but then, though they left Britain, yet they left not the Britains, but carried them, at least, a great part of them away with them; of whom the most were slain in the field, and the rest, scattered into that part of France, which of them was afterward, and is to this day, called Britain: And now one would think, the Island should be in good cage, being freed from them that kept them in subjection; but it proved to be in worse case being at liberty, then it was before in servitude; for being deprived of their ablest men, and at the same time, their King Lucius happening to die without issue, they were left as a few loose ficks, without the bond of a Governor, which the Picts and Scots observing, thought now was the time to make the Country their own; and thereupon made Invasions upon it with all their Forces. Whereupon the Britains having none left of their Native Kngs to succeed; and knowing they could ill manage the Body of an Army without a Head, they made choice of Vertiga Earl of Cornwall, one extracted from the British Linage; and one of the whome, whether to advise his Cabinet Counsellor, the Prophetical Merlin, or as finding his own strength too weak to make resistance, implores first aid of the Romans; and they making answer, they had business enough to do of their own, and leaving them to themselves, he then fled to the Saxons for aid, a warlike people of Germany, and who had greater swarms then their hives could well hold.

And here we may plainly see how dangerous a thing it is for a Nation to call in Strangers to their aid, and especially in any great number; for though they come at first but Mercenaries, yet once admitted, and finding their own strength, they soon grow Masters: as here it proved with the Saxons.

These Saxons were Inhabit, and brought in with them diversity of Idols, after whose names they gave appellations to the several days of the week. Adoring the Sun, they named the first day Sunday, or Sunaday. The second Monday, from an Idol which ridicu losely repreffented the Moon. Another god they had called Tuisæ, and to him they appointed the third day, naming it Tuesday. The tradion is, that this Tuisæ was the son of Akeba.
Of the first known times of this Island.

Aftkenas, Grandchild of Jupiter, and that he conducted their fore-fathers out of Asia into Europe from the unfinished Tower of Babel. The next Idol which they adored for a god, was Woden, representing an armed man, and they named the fourth day from him Woden'sday, or Wednesday, they honored him as the god of Barne. He was a famous and victorious Prince and amongst them, and of him finely de cended Hengist and Horsa their first leaders into this Island. Not only our Saxons, but all the Seprentional Nations adored and sacrifici cd to Thor, a Statue representing a crowned King, his head encompassed with twelve bright golden Stars, of whom they denominated the fifth day Thor'sday. Friday took the name of Friga, an Idol representing both Sexes, with a Bow in one hand, and a Sword in the other: and though the Statue exprest an Hermaphrodite, yet she was generally reput ced a Goddes. Then they had a god called Souter, and to him they consecrated Satur day: this Idol was like an old man, with a long beard and hair, bare headed and bare footed. Such was the Religion of the Saxons; which giveth us occasion before we treat further of their coming in, to say something of the state of the Christian Church in this Island. Further then, it is recorded, that in the year 65; what time Arrivosgus reigned here, Toph of Arimeakes (who buried the Body of Christ) came into this Island, and laid the foundation of the Christian Faith in the Western parts, at a place called then Thrieth, now Glastenhur ry; and that there came with him Mary Mag dalen, Lazarus, and Martha: and more then this, that Simon Zelotes one of the Apol tes suffered Martyrdom here in Brittan: and more then this, that both St. Peter and St. Paul came into this Island and preached the Gospel; all which, and more to this purpose, is record ed by Authors of good account: though it be hard in believing. That perfons, and speci dally women of so great age, at these untimes must be at this times, should live so long a journey. But howsoever it was, certain it is, the Church of God was as it were this time planted in this Island, though it made afterward but small progress, and that with some perfe cution; as in which time, St. Alban suffered Martyrdom at Verulam, and at Lichfield shortly after, no fewer than a thousand. After this in the year 180. what time Lucius was King of this Island, Elutherius then Bishop of Rome, sent Fagimus and Damiano to him: upon whose preaching, the Temples of the Hea thenish Flamius and Arch-flamius (one and thirty in number) were converted to fo many Bishops Sees; whereof London, Tork, and Caerleyn, (now St. Davids) were made the Metropolitans of the Province. And there is a Table remaining at this day, in the Parth Church of St. Peter, on Cornhill, London, which recordeth, that the Foundation thereof was laid by this King Lucius, and that this Church was the Cathedral to that Archbishops See. In the year the Christian Count was a hundred, A.D. 674, in Italy, where six hundred Western Bishops were assembled, whereof three went out of Britain; and though they were Ortho doxal, and with that Synod determined to give their voices against the Arien Herefie, yet by reason all these Western Fathers were igno rant in the Greek Language, they were circu monstrated by the Arien Bishops, and unani mously they would have Christ, but not Ha umanian. After this, about the year 450. role up in this Island, one Pelagius, a Man brought up in the Monastery of Bangor in Wales, who spread the poyson of his Herefie, first in this his Native Country, and afterward all the world over. And these had been the chief passages in matters Ecclesiastical within this Island, when the Saxons were called in, about the year 450.

And now under the conduct of two Bro ters, Hengist and Horsa, came over nineteenth and Saxons with their Wives and Children, to affit the Britains against the Scots, and were appointed the Isle of Thanet to inhabit. With such assistance, the Britains gave their ene mies Barcel, and overcame them: so as they accounted the Saxons as Angels sent from Heaven, and then allowed them Kent also for their inhabiting. Not long after Hengist ob ained the King Vortigern the property of so much ground, as he could encoile with a Walls here about the Mountains, he there built the Castle, Fifi de numine, called the Tower of Castle. And now having built it, he invites Vortigern to a Feast, who there fell in love with Rowena, the Daughter, or rather the Neece of Hengist; for when Hengist first ar rived in Britain he was but 30, years of age; howsoever Vortigern marrying this fair Lady, put Hengist into such a height of boldness that he began to aspire, finding for greater Forces to come over to him; as meaning to transplant himself hither, and to make this Island his Inheritance: which the British Lords perceiving, and not able to wear their King from his new Wife, and her Father Hu gist, they depose him; and in his place set up his Son Fortimus, a true lover of his Country: who profinently in a pitch Battel near unto Aylesford, and Kent, fell upon the Saxons; where Catigern the Britan Governor of Ferrivas, and Horsa, or Hengist, in single fight hand to hand killed every one. In which place Catigern was hur died, and a Monument in memory of him ere sted, the stones whereof at this day are stand ing in a great plain in the Parth of Aylesford; which instead of Catigern, is corruptly called Kisi-Cothous. Another the like Monument was ereted for Horsa, though now defaced; remembered only by the Town where it stood, called Horsed. Three other Battels after this were fought between the Britains and the Saxons: one upon Crawford, another at Wappes deflate, the third upon Ciremorc: in which last, the Britains got to great a Victory, that the Sax ons were clean driven out of Kent, and this not atmo not suffering to ret; so as shortly after, Hengist with his Saxons departed the Kingdom, as being now out of hope to make his fortune in this Island. But while Forti er was thus in possession of the Country as aforesaid, Rowena the former Kings Wife, being Daughter to Hengist, was as intenitive to bring it into fervitude; which knowing the which could not so long as

Bt.
Vortimer lived: the used means by poyton, to take away his life, after he had been King the space of four years, and then by the Witchcraft of fair words, so enchanted the Britifh Nobility, that her Husband Vortigen was again established in the Kingdom; which was no sooner done, but Henigst (relying upon his Son Vortigen's love) with a mighty Army attempts to return again into the Island; when being relieved, he makes a show, as if he desired nothing but to fetch away his Daughter Rowena, and to have a friendly conference for continuance of amity: which motion seeming reasonable, a place and time of conference was appointed: the time upon the first of May; the place upon the Plain of Ambri, now called Salisbury; whether the plain-meaning Britan came unarmed, according to agreement; but the fraudulent Saxons under their long Catfucks had short speyes hidden, with which upon a watch-word given, they set upon in many Barrels, and of that the Britania fled three, some say five hundred, and took the King himself Prisoner, whom they would not release, till they were put in possession of the four Countries, Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Norfolk. Whereupon Vortigen, whether fearing a second Deposition, or whether to advised by his Cabinet-Counsellor the Prophetical Merlin, betook himself into Wales, and there built him a strong Castle for his fate-guard; while the Saxons coming daily in great swarmes into the Land, had at this time over-run all, if Aurelius Ambrosius a Roman born, but affected to the Britania Nation, had not landed at Totnes in Devonshire, to whom reftored great Troops of Britania. His first expedition was against Vortigen, (as the first cage of the Britania Mifery) whole Castle he beleagued; and whether by wilde-fire, or by fire from Heaven, both he and his Castle, and all that were in it, were burnt to ashes. To this Ambrosius is ascribed the admirable Monumant in Wilshire, now called Stonehenge, in the place where the Britania had been therethroughly flughttened and interred; and of whom the Town of Amblesbury bears its name. After this he set upon the Saxons, and in many Barrels discomfited them; till at last falling sick in the City of Winchester, a Saxon, in flew a Brit, and in habit a Physician, was sent unto him, who instead of Phyllic, ministr’d Poyton, whereof he died in the year 497. after he had reigned two and thirty years.

After Ambrosius, succeeded after (some say his Brother, others a Brit) called Pendragon, of his Royal Banner born ever before him; wherein was portrayd a Dragon with a golden Head, as in our English Camps it is at this day born for the Imperial Standard. And he also many Barrels discomfited the Saxons; till after eighteen years’ reign he came to his end by treachery; dying by Poyton put into a Well, whereof he usually drank, in the year 515. After him succeeded his Son Arthur, be- poni the of the fair Lady Igrain, Wife of the Duke of Cornwall, to whose bed the art of Merlin brought him in the likeness of her husband; and in twelve set Barrels discomfited the Saxons; but in one most memorable, in which girding himself with his Sword called Caliburn, he flew upon his Enemies, and with his own hand flew eight hundred of them; which is but one of his wonderful deeds, whereof there are so many reported, that he might well be reckoned amongst the Fabulous, if there were not enow true to give them credit. Amongst other his Acts, he intituled the Order of Knights of the Round Table, to the end there might be no question about Precedence, and to teach Heroical minds, not to stand upon Place, but Merit. But this great Prince, for all his great valour, was at last in Bawld called, whereof he dyed, in the year 542, after he had reigned fix and twenty years.

After King Arthur succeeded his Cousin Constantine, and after his three years Reign, Aurelius Constantine the Nephew of King Arthur; whose Reign is uncertainly so long, that some say, he was reigned only two, some three, others thirty, and some three and thirty. After Constantine succeeded Verigus, who after many Victories against the Saxons, and four years Reign, dyed. After whom succeeded Malgo Constant, and reigned six years. After him Carisius, who setting upon the Saxons, and beaten, fled into the Town of Chichester, whereupon the Saxons catching certain Sparrows, and fattening fire to their feet, let them fly into the Town, where lighting upon straw, and other matter apt to take fire, the whole City in short space was burnt; and thereupon Carisius flying, securing himself among the Mountains of Wales, where he died, after he had unprofessionally reigned three years; and from that time forth, the Britains lost their whole Kingdom in the East part of the Island, and were confined in the West by the Rivers Severn and Dee. After Carisius succeeded Cadwall, who reigned two and twenty years. After him his Son Cadwalla, who reigned eight and forty years, and then died; whose body was buried in St. Martin’s Church near Llandeilo, and his Image of Brac placed upon the fame Tower, for terror to the Saxons. In this time the Dogma of Mabonset began to spread it self all the Eastern World over. After Cadwalla, succeedeth his Son Cadwaller, in whose time fto great a Famine, and afterward Mortality happened, continuing eleven years, that the Land became in a manner defolate: insomuch, that the King and many of his Lords were driven to forsake their native Country, and Cadwaller himself went to his Cousin Aelin, King of little Britains in France. At which time the Saxons taking advantage of his absence, came over in Swarms, and dispossessed the forlorn Britains of all they had, and divided the Land amongst themselves. Whereupon Cadwaller, obtaining assistance from his Cousin Aelin, was coming over to restrain their infolencies; when making prayers to God for good succese, an Angel appeared to him, or at the least to his feather he heard a voice that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will, the Britains should rule this Land any longer: and therefore bad him be he to Rome, and receive of Pope Cabiduwel, the last of the Britains King; he bequeathed his Kingdom and is shown a Monk at Rome.
The first Kingdom of Kent.

The first Kingdom of Kent began by Hengist, in the year 455, containing all Kent, and continued 372 years, during the Reigns of seventeen Kings, of whom as many as performed any memorable Act, shall be remembered; and for the rest it will be no loss to patch them over in silence. Of these seventeen Kings, Ethelbert being the fifth, was the first Saxen Christian King of this Island, converted by Afsin the Monk, by Gregory sent hither to that purpose, with forty others, in the year 596, to whom King Ethelbert gave his chief City of Canterbury, and his own Royal Palace there, made since the Cathedral of that See; withdrawing himself to Reculver in the Isle of Thanet, where he erected a Palace for himself and his followers. He gave him also an old Temple, standing without the East Wall of the City, which he honoured with the name of St. Pancras, and then added a Monastery to it, and dedicated it to St. Peter and S. Paul, appointing it to be the place of the Kentish Sepulchres. But in regard of Afsin the procuring, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were soon forgotten, and it was, and is to this day called St. Augustine, which Abbey St. Augustine enriched with divers Religions, which he brought with him from Rome; amongst which was a part of Christ's fleshless Coat, and of Aaron's Rod. This King after his own conversion, converted also Sebert King of the East Angles, and assisted him in the building of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London; as also the Church of St. Peter, on the West of London, then called Thorney: and himself at Rochester built the Cathedral Church there, which he dedicated to the Apostle St. Andrew: and dying when he had reigned six and fifty years, was buried at Canterbury. And thus by this first Saxen Kingdom, was all Kent lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was the first impurring, and this happened in the Reign of Ethelburh before spoken of. The sixth King of Kent was Ethelbald, who at first an Apsilata, was afterward converted; and built a Chappel within the Monastery of St. Peter and Paul at Canterbury. The seventh King was Ecgbert, a virtuous and religious Prince, who first commanded the oberving of Lent; and in his days, the Archbishop Hrinius divided Kent into Parishes. The eighth King was Egbert, who obtained the Kingdom by murdering his Neighbors: who being the lady Doppuna, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent. The eleventh King was Widsred, who founded the Priory of Merew at Dover. The last was Bolure, who overcame by Egbert King of the West Saxons, left Kent a Province to the English, in the year 837.

The second Kingdom being of the South Saxons.

The second Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the South Saxons, and began by Ethelbert, in the year 488, containing Sussex and Surrey, and continued 115 years, during the Reign of five Kings only, of whom Cissa being the second founded the City of Chichester, and reigned as some say, for two hundred and sixteen years. And then Bertha being the last King, was overthrown by Ina King of the West Saxons, and his Country became a Province of that Kingdom, in the year 601. And thus as Kent before, so now Sussex and Surrey were lopped off from the Britains Dominion: and this was a second impurring, which also happened in the Reign of the British King Aelfricus.

The third Kingdom being of the West Saxons.

The third Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the West Saxons, and began by Cerdic, in the year 519, containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somerfetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, and continued 561 years, during the Reigns of nineteen Kings, of whom this Cerdic was the first; in whole time Piers, a Saxen, landed in the West, as a place from him called afterward Portsmouth, and aided Cerdic in his conquest. And this happened in the Reign of King Arthur: and as Kent, Sussex, and Surrey before, so now these seven other Shires were lopped off from the Britains Dominion: and this was a third impurring. The fifth King of the West Saxons was Kingilis, who was the first Christian King of this Kingdom, converted by Berrinus an Italian Divine, to whom he gave the City of Dorchester, near to Oxford; who therein erected his Episcopal See. The seventh King was Kewnald, who at first an Apsilata, was afterward converted, and founded the Cathedral of Winchester, and the Abbey of Minsterbury; whose Wife Segfrith also built a house of Devotion in the Isle of Sheppy, wherein her self became a Nun, and was afterward elected Abbess of Ely. The eleventh King was Ina, who ordained many good Laws, which are yet present in the Saxen tongue, and are translated into Latin, by the learned Master William Lambert. This King built a Colledge at Wells, bearing the name of St. Andrew, which afterward King Kenulf made an Episcopal See. He also, in most rarely manner... ner new built the Abbey of Glastonbury; and out of his devotion to the See of Rome, he enjoyed every one of his subjects, that professed in his house of any one kind of goods to the value of nineteen pence, to pay yearly upon Lammasday, one penny to the Pope, which at first was contributed under the name of the Kings Alms, but afterward was paid by the name of Peter Pence. At last he went to Rome, and there took upon him the habit of Religion, and therein died. His Wife also became a veiled Nun, and afterward was made Abbess of Barking, near London. The thirteenth King was Ethelred, who first permitted the bodies of the dead to be buried within the Walls of their Cities, which before were used to be buried in the fields.

The fourteenth was Sigulfert, for whom the Crueltie and exactions, was by his Subjects forced to flee into the Woods, to hide himself, where by a Swine-herd he was slain. The fifteenth was Kenulf, who founded the Cathedral Church of S. Andrew at Wells, and was afterward slain by Kynmaud, whom he had banished. The sixteenth King was Birbrick, whose Queen Ethelfryd having prepared a propoyon for another, the King chance to take it, and thereof died. In fear of which chance the Queen fled into France; where Ethelbert the then King, for her excellent beauty, offered her the choice of himself or his Son in Marriage; but she out of her Inflam humour choosing the Son, was thereupon debarr’d of both, and thrust into a Monastery, where committing Adultery, she was driven from thence, and ended her life in great misery. For her sake the West Saxons ordained a Law, that no Kings Wife should hereafter have the title or Majesty of a Queen, which for many years after was severally executed. It is memorable which is recorded of a King in these parts, named Wæsamund, and was the Founder of Warwick Township: that he had a Son named Offa, tall of stature, and of a good constitution of body, but blinde, till he was seven years old, and then saw; and dumb till he was thirty years old, and then spake.

The fifth Kingdom being of NORTHERNLAND.

The fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland; (so called because it lay North from the River Humber,) and began by Ellis and Ida, in the year 547. Containing York, Durham, Lancafhire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370 years, during the Reigns of three and twenty Kings; of whom nothing is recorded of the two first, but that they built the Cattle of Bamborough. The seventh King was Ethelgyrd, who at Carlagen (now Welfborough) made a slaughter of twelve hundred Christian Monks, and was himself afterward slain by Redwald King of the East Angles. The thirteenth King was Osgar, whose Wife Cuthburg, out of a loathing weariness of Wedlock, fled out a Divorce from her Husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburn in Dorsetshire, where in a Religious Habit he ended his life. The sixteenth King was Cedulf, who after eight years Reign, left his Royal Robes, and put on the Habit of a Monk, in the Isle of Lindesfarn, or Holy Island. Unto this King the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul, at Wearness near to Durham, dedicated his Work of the English Historie, which he continued from the first entrance of the Saxons in this Island, to the year 731, containing after his own account 285 years. The seventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty years Reign forsook the world also, and shirk himself a Monk; whose Brother being Archbishop of York, eredicated a notable Library there, and stored it with an infinite number of Learned Books. The Iait King was Oswy, after whom this Kingdom yielded to the protection of Egbert, King of the West Saxons, who was now in the year 926, become absolute Monarch of the whole Island. And thus by the erection of this fifth Kingdom, were the six Northern Shires lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

The sixth Kingdom being of MERCI.

The sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, and began in Cirea, in the year 512, containing Huntingdon, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, and Leicestershure founded.

Paul, London, &c. where dying, his Body was interred in a Coffin of grey Marble: the cover coped, and as yet flanketh in the Northwall of the Chancel of the same Church. The twelfth was Offa, famous for the beauty of his coun-tenance, who both enlarged with Buildings, and enriched with Lands, the Church of Win-chester, and after eight years reign went to Rome, and was there fown a Monk, and in that habit died. The fourteenth was Sethul, whom Egbert King of the West Saxons subdued, and made his Kingdom a Province to his own. And thus besides the former Shires, these two also were lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

K. Ethelgyrd killed twelve hundred Christian Monks at Winbridge, and thereby caused the King to be deposed, and driven into a Monastery. His Wife Cuthburg, out of ait of Wedlock, fled out a Divorce from her Husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburn in Dorsetshire, where in a Religious Habit he ended his life. The sixteenth King was Cedulf, who after eight years Reign, left his Royal Robes, and put on the Habit of a Monk, in the Isle of Lindesfarn, or Holy Island. Unto this King the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul, at Wearness near to Durham, dedicated his Work of the English Historie, which he continued from the first entrance of the Saxons in this Island, to the year 731, containing after his own account 285 years. The seventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty years Reign forsook the world also, and shirk himself a Monk; whose Brother being Archbishop of York, eredicated a notable Library there, and stored it with an infinite number of Learned Books. The Iait King was Oswy, after whom this Kingdom yielded to the protection of Egbert, King of the West Saxons, who was now in the year 926, become absolute Monarch of the whole Island. And thus by the erection of this fifth Kingdom, were the six Northern Shires lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

The sixth Kingdom being of MERCIA.

The sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, and began in Cirea, in the year 512, containing Huntingdon, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, and Leicestershure founded.
Of the Kingdoms of Northumberland, Mercia, &c.

The seventh Kingdom being of the East Angles.

The seventh Kingdom was of the East Angles, and began by Igbert in the year 575, containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and the Isle of Ely, and continued 353 years during the Reign of fifteen Kings, of whom the first was Sigebert, who first brought the light of the Gospel into his Dominions, and built a School for education of youth, whether at Oxford, or Cambridge, is left a Quer; and after three years Reign shore himself a Monk in the Abbey of Cambrebr, which himself had built: but being afterward violently drawn from thence by his Subjects the East Angles, to retile the Mercian King Penda, and refusing to use any other weapon but only a white wand, was in a Battel by him slain. The seventh King was Aethel, who after thirteen years Reign, was also slain by Penda the Mercian King. This King Aethel was memorable chiefly for the holiness of his Children, of whom his Son Erkenwald was Bishop of London, and built the Abbey of Barking near London. His Eldest Daughter Etheldreda was twice married, and yet continued a Virgin still, and at last became a Nun; and is remembered to posterity by the name of St. Aedreda. His second Daughter named Sexburg, his third named Ethelburg, his fourth (a natural daughter) named Withburg, all entered into Monasteries, and are Canonized all for Saints. The fourteenth King was Ethelbert, a Learned and Religious Prince, who being invited by Offa the Mercian King to marry Effdr his daughter, came for that purpose to Offa's Court, then seated at Sutton Wayth in the County of Hereford, and there by him was cruelly murdered; in whose memorial notwithstanding, he afterward built a Fair Church at Hereford, the church of most of that See, as though he could expiate a martyr's death living, by a Monument to the dead, and were not rather a monument of his own impiety. The fifteenth King was Edmund, who assailed by the Danes for his poffessions, was more assailed for his profession; for continuing contant in his Christian Faith, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then foughed him with whips, and lastly bound him to a stake, and with their Arrows shot him to death: whole body was buried at the Town where Sigebert the East Anglian King, one of his Predecessors had built a Church, and where afterward (in honour of him) was built another most magnificent, of a wonderful frame of Timber, and the name of the Town upon the occasion of his burial there, called to this day St. Edmundsbury. This Church and place, Swarms the Danis King burnt to ashes: but when his Son Canuter had gotten possession of the English Crown, terrified with a vision of the feeming St. Edmund, in a religious devo- tion to expiate his Fathers Sacrilege, he built it anew most sumptuously, and offered his own Crown upon the Merys Tomb. After the death of this Edmund, the East Angles CPUtry was poftel by the Danes, and so continued the space of fifty years, until that Edmund turnned the Elder, expelled those Danes, and made that Kingdom a Province to the West Saxons.

By which that hath been said, it plainly appears, that as no degrees the Britains lost, and the Saxons got the whole power of his Island. For after that Penda, in the year 455, had called in the Saxons, every Briton King that succeeded him, left some part or other of it to the Saxons, till at the last in the year 689, Cadwallader the last Briton King lost all; and then the Saxons kings thriving amongst themselves for sovereignty, they still gained one upon another, till at last in the year 818, Egbert King of the West Saxons reduced them all under his subjection, and then called all the South of the Island to be called England, according to the Angles of whom themselves came: after whom they were no longer properly called Saxen Kings, but Kings of England.
Of the Saxons that reigned sole Kings of this island, and may properly be called English Kings.

Egbert the eighteenth King of the West Saxons, is now become the first of the Kings of England, in whose time the Danes began first to invest the Land; as thinking they might do as much against the Saxons, as the Saxons had done against the Britains; but though they made divers Invasions, and did great spoil, yet they were still repelled. This King reigned sixty and thirty years, and died in the year 836. was buried at Winchester. Of his Issue, his Daughter Edith was made Governess of a Monastery of Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her Brother had given her, called Pollofvorh, situate in Arden, in the North part of the County of Warwick, where she died and was buried, in the place in memory of her called St. Edith of Pollofvorh.

To Egbert succeeded his Son Eadwulf, who in his youth was addicted to a Religious life, that he was first made Deacon; and after Bishop of Winchester; but his Father dying, he was intreated by his people to take upon him the Crown, and by Pope Gregory the fourth, to be that end absolved of his Vow. His Reign was infettled with many and great Invasions of the Danes, to whom notwithstanding he gave incredible overthrows. In the time of his Reign, remembering his former Religious Profession, he ordained that riches and lands due to the Holy Church, should be free from all Tribute or Regal Services, and in great devotion went himself to Rome, where he lived a year; confirmed the grant of Peter pence, and agreed besides to pay yearly to Rome three hundred marks. Returning home through France, and being a Widow, he there married Judith the beautiful daughter of Charlethe Baid, then Emperor; in honour of whom in his own Court, he ever placed her in a chair of Estate, with all other Majestical complements of a Queen, contrary to the Law of the West Saxons formerly made; which so much displeased his Lords, that for it they were ready to depose him: but howsoever he lived not long after, having reigned one and twenty years. His youngest Son Nute was much addicted to learning, and was one of the Divinity Readers in the University of Oxford, and founded a Monastery in Carnal, of which he was called Neufbuke; and being dead, his body was interred in the County of Huntington, at a place then called Marylesbury; and afterward, in regard of his interment, St. Neotes, and now St. Neder. This King was famous for having four Sons, all of whom were Kings of this Land successively.

First after him reigned his eldest Son Ethelbald, in the year 857. who to his eternal he divided the Kingdom into Shires.

Shiffield by whom founded.

Eight hours he devoted to the study of Divinity; nine hours of reading, and Prayers; eight in exercise for himself, and eight in the affairs of the commonwealth and State. His life was devoted to study, and he was also a skilful musician and excellent poet.

All former Laws he caused to be surveyed, and made choice of the best, which he translated into English, as also the pastoral of St. Gregory, the History of Bede, and Boethius his Conjunction of Philosophy; the Psalms of David likewise he began to translate, but died before he could finish it. And so great a love he had to learning, that he made a Law, that all Freemen of the Kingdom, possessing two hides of land, should bring up their sons in learning, till they were fifteen years of age at least, that so they might be trained to know God, to be men of understanding, and to live happily. His buildings were many, both for God's service, and other publick use: as at Edington a Monastery, at Winchester a new Minster, and at Shaftesbury a house of Nuns; whereas he made his Daughter Etheldred the Abbess; but his foundation of the University of Oxford, exceeded all the rest: which he began in the year 895, and to furnish it with able Scholars, drew thinkers out of France, Grimshold and Scotia, and out of Wales, Asser, (who wrote his life) whose Lectures he honoured often with his own presence: And for a stock of Frugality, he made a Survey of the Kingdom, and had all the particulars of his Estate Registered in a Book, which he kept in his Treasury at Winchester. He reigned seven and twenty years, and dying was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Peter at Winchester, though removed afterward into the Church of the new Monastery, without the North-gate of the City called Hyde. His wife Elfrida founded a Monastery of Nuns at Winchester, and was there buried. Their second daughter Eibthleda, took upon her the Vow of Virginity; and by her Fathers appointment was made a Nun of Shaftesbury, in the County of Dorset, in the Monastery founded there by him, who is also accounted the founder of the Town itself. His eldest son Edward, (who being married to Etheldreda Earl of Merewald) had but one Daughter, but with so grievous pain in her Travel, that ever after she refused the Nuptial Bed of her Husband, saying, it was a foolish pleasure that brought with it so excessive pains; and therupon after her Husbands death, made choice to follow the Wars; afflicting her Brother both against the Welsh, and against the Danes, whom she brought to be at her disposing. Dying she was buried at Gloucester, in the Monastery of St. Peter, which her Husband and her self had built. King Edward himself, after four and twenty years Reign, deceased at Eton in Berkshire, in the year 934. and was buried in the new Monastery of Winchester, which his Father and himself wholly finall'd: having had by his three Wives, six Sons and nine Daughters, of whom his eldest Son Athelfrith succeeded him in the Kingdom, whom his Grandfather King Alfred had with infinite care and hands Kindred in an extraordinary manner, putting upon him a purple Robe, and girding him with a Girdle wrought with Pearl. His second Son Elfrith, he so loved, that he caused him to be Crowned King with himself, which yet he enjoyed but a short time, being taken away by death. His third Son Eflward, presently upon his Fathers death died himself also. His fourth Son Edbyp, was by his Brother Athelstan, out of jealousy of State, put into a little Pinnace, without either Tackle or Oars, accompanied only with one Page; with grief whereof, the young Prince leaped into the Sea, and drowned himself. His fifth and his sixth Sons, Eadward, and Eadbred, came in succession to be Kings of England. Of his Daughters, the eldest Editha, was married to Stithred the Danish King of Northumberland, and he deceasing, he entered into a Monastery, which he began at Tewsworth in Warwickshire, and there he died. His second Daughter Elfride, took upon her the Vow of Virginity, in the Monastery of Ramsey, in the County of Southamptom, where she died and was interred. His third Daughter Egina, was first married to Charles the Simple, King of France; and after his decease, to Herbert Earl of Vermandois. His fourth Daughter Eibtheld, became a Nun in the Monastery of Wilson, which was sometime the head Town, giving name to the whole Country of Wiltshire, and anciently called Elfrland. That we may fee in those first times of Religion, when there was least knowledge, there was most devotion. His fifth Daughter Etheldreda, was married to Hugh, furnamed the Great; Earl of Paris, and Constable of France. And Edith his sixth Daughter to Osbert, the Emperor of the West, furnamed the Great; his seventh Daughter Elpina, was married to a Duke of Italy. His eighth Edith, to Louis Prince of Aquitania in France. After the death of King Edward, his eldest Son Athelstan succeeded, and was Crowned at Kingston upon Thames, in the County of Surrey, by Aelbelmus, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 924. The beginning of whose Reign, was molested with the Treason of one Elfrid a Nobleman; who being apprehended and sent to Rome to purge himself, and there denying the act upon his Oath, fell suddenly down, and with-

...and the Priory of Milton; new walled and beautified the City of Exeter, and enriched either with Jewels or Lands, every special Abbey of the Land. But the chiefeft of his works for the service of God, and good of his Subjects, was the Translation of the Bible into the Saxon Tongue, which was then the Mother Tongue of the Land. He reigned fifteen years, died at Gloucester, and was buried at Malmesbury, in the year 940, having never been married.

After the death of Abellffon, his brother Edmund, the fifth Son of his Father, succeeded; and was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames; but no sooner was the Crown fast upon his head, but the Danes were upon his back; and in Northumberland made insurrections; who yet he did not one word of it; but took from them the Towns of Lincoln, Leicester, Derby, Stafford, and Nottingham; compelling them to kneel, to receive Baptism, and to become his Subjects, so as the Country was wholly his as far as Cumberland. He likewise, in order to receive Baptism, was of all his good Laws, one Aslau King of Southwark, he utterly wa- ted and gave it Malcolm King of Scots, to hold of him for Teaty. After his returning home, he set himself to ordain Laws for the good of his people, which Master Lambeth hath since translated into Latin. But after all his noble Acts both in War and Peace, he came at last to a lamentable end; for at his Morrow of Puckleker, in the County of Gloucester, interpreting himself to part a Fray between two of his Servants, he was thruf through the body, and so wounded, that he died, and was buried at Gloucester, after he had reigned five years, and seven months, leaving behind him two young Sons, Edwin, and Edg. confirmed with Seals of Gold. He ordained Saint Germanus in Cramond, to be a Bishop Sec., which there continued till by Caedwalla it was annexed to the Episcopal See of York in Deficiencies; both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor, translated to the City of Exeter. He left behind him two Sons, Eadred, and Ethelred, that was buried in the Minster, without the City of Winchester, whose bones with other Kings are, to this day prefer-in a gilt Coffin, fixed upon the Wall, in the South side of the Quire.

After Edred, not any of his Sons, but his Nephew Ethed, the eldest Son of King Edmund succeeded, and was anointed and Crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Other Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 955. This Prince, though scarce fourteen years old, and in age but a child, yet was able to commit fin as a man; for upon the very day of his Coronation, and in sight of his Lords, as they sat in Council, he shamefully abused a Lady of great Elate, and his near Kinswoman; and to mend the matter, shortly after flew her Husband; the more freely to enjoy his inceltuous pleasure. And whether for this infamous fact, or for thrutng the Monks out of the Monasteries of Malmesbury, and Glastonbury, and placing many Priests in their rooms, as also for banishing Dunstan the holy Abbot of Glastonbury out of the Realm, a great part of his Subjects hearts were so turned against him, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and forced Feality to his younger brother Edgar; with grief, whereof, after four years reign, he ended his life, and was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hyde, at Winchester.

After Ethed, succeeded his younger Broder Edgar, at the age of sixteen years; but his Coronation, when, and where, and by whom, to uncertain, that some say he was Crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the first year of his Reign; others say not till the twelfth, and Williams of Malmesbury not till the thirtieth: Another Chronicle states, that, in his eleventh year; and that in the number of the Bishops of the last Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, This King, by reason of the tranquility of his Reign, was surmised to the Peaceable; for as he was something inclined to the Danes, to the Danes never offered to stir in all his time; and as for the Saxons, they acknowledged him their sole Sovereign, without division of Provinces or Titles. His Acts were some Virtuous, some Politick, some Jilt, some Pious; and yet all these not without some mixture of Vice. To repres drunkenness, which the Danes had brought in, he made a Law, ordaining a fine, by certain pins in the pot; with penalty to any that should presume to drink deeper then the mark. It was a politick device which he used for the destruction of Wolves that in his days did great annoyance to the Land: For the tribute imposed on the Princes of Wales, by King Athelstan, he wholly remitted, appointing in lieu thereof, a certain number of Wolves yearly to be paid, whereof the Prince of North-Wales, for his part was to pay three hundred; which connued for three years space; and in the fourth year, there was not a Wolf to be found; and for the tribute ceased. He had in his Navy Royal, three thousand and six hundred Ships, which he divided into three parts, appointing every one of them to a several Quarter, to seoure the Seas, and to secure the Coasts from Pirates: and left his Officers might be careless, for contr.

when his Ships fail about all the Coasts of his Kingdom every Summer. It was a notable Act of Justice, that in his Circuits and Progresses through the Country, he would take special account of the demeanour of his Lords; and specially of his Judges; whom he severely punished, if he found them De-

Inquisitive. Wars he had none in all his Reign, only towards his end the Welfmen moved some Rebellion; against whom he went with a mighty Army, and chastised the Authors: But when his Souldiers had gotten great spoils, and made prey upon the innocent Countrey people, he commanded them to restore it all back again; which, if it made some few English angry, it made the whole Countrey of the Welf well pleased, and found forth his praisings. His proud Acts were, that he built and prepared seven and forty Monasteries, and meant to have made them up fifty, but was prevented by the behvior of his Officers. He envovled himself in fifty all; es-

pe, being a Vice opposite to all those Virtues, which was Lasfightnius. For first, he dolewored a Sacred Nun, called Wolfschild; on whom yet he begor a Saint, the chaste Edyth.
After her another Virgin, called Ethelhild, for her excellent beauty surmised the White, on whom he begor his eldest Son Edward; for which Fact he did seven years penance enjoyned him by the Archbishop Dunstan. After this he chanced to hear of a Virgim, Dughtor to a Wetern Duke, exceedingly praised for her beauty, and coming to Andover, commended her to his Bed. But the Mother, tender of her Daughters honour, brought in the dark her Maid to him; who in the morrning making haste to rise, and the King not suffering her to depart, he told him what great work she had to do, and how she should incour her Ladies to please; if it were not done; by which words the King, perceiving the heger, turned it to a jew: but so well liked her company, that he kept himself true to her ever after, till he marbled. But now his marriage it self happened by a greater vice then any of these; for hearing of the admirable beauty of Elfsvide, the only Daughter of Ordesgarn, Duke of Devonshire, Founder of Totefack Abby in that Countrey, he sent his great Favourite Earl Etheldred (who could well judge of beauty) to try the truth thereof; with Commision, that if he found her such as Fame reported, he should feizer her for him, and he would make her his Queen. The young Earl, upon light of the Lady, was so surprizd with her love, that he began to wooe for himself, and got her Fathers good will, fo as the King would give his consent. Hereupon the Earl poold to the King, relating to him that the Maid was fair indeed, but nothing so able of the Fame that went of her; yet defending the King, that he might marry her, as being her Fathers Heir, thereby to raise his Fortune. The King conferred, and the marriage was solemnized. Soon after, the fame of her beauty began to spread more then before, so as the King much doubting that he had been abused, meant to try the truth himself, and thereupon taking occasion of hunting in the Duke Park, came to his house; where coming Ethelwald, by his order, acquainted his wife with the wrong he had done both her, and the King; and therefore to prevent the Kings displeasure, interest ed her by all the persuasions he could use, to cloath her self in such attire, as might be least fit to set forth: but the conidering that now was the time to make the most of her beauty, and longing to be a Queen, would not be accessary to her own wrong, but decked her self in her richest Ornaments, which so improved her beauty, that the King at the firft sight was struck with admiration, and meant to be revenged of his peridious Favourite; yet differing in his passion, till he could take her at advantage, he then with a Javelin turned her through; and having thereby made Ethelwald a Widow, took her to be his Prize.

This King, founded the Monastery of Ramsey in Hampshire, reigned fourteen years, lived seven and thirty, and with great Funerals pomp was buried in the Abbey of St. Edmund. He had Children by his first Wife Ethelafa, one Son named Edward, and by his second Wife Elfrid, two Sons, one named Edmund, who died young, the other Ethelred. He had also one natural Daughter, named Edgyth by a Lady named Wolfsicle, the Daughter of Wolholme, the Son of Birding, the Son of Nifing; which two latter, bear in their names the memory of their Fortunes; the last of them being found in an Eagles nest, by King Alfred as he was a hunting. This Edgyth built the Monastery and Church of Saint Denis at Wilton, and was there buried.
After the death of King Edgar succeed his Son Edward, but he lived without some opposition, for Edgar and Elfrid combined with divers of the Lords, to make her Son Ethelred Kings saying, that Prince Edward was illegitimate; on the other side, the Archbishop Dunstan, and the Monks stood for Edward, abetting his Title as being lawful born; but while the Council was assembled to argue their Rights, the Archbishop came in with his Banner and Crosses, and not foraying for debating de fure, de fello prefented Prince Edward for their lawful King, and the Assembly confenting most of Clergy men, drew the approbation of the rest; and thereupon Prince Edward was admitted, being but twelve years of age, and was Crowned King at Kingston upon Thames, by Archbishop Dunstan, in the year 975. In the beginning of his Reign, it fell into debate whether married Priests were to be allowed in Monasteries upon the Revenues of the Church. The Mercian Duke Alfred being desirous to confirm the cause of the married Priests, defended the Monasteries in his indivince, cast out the Monks, and restored again the ancient Revenues to the Priests and their Wives. On the other side, Ealdorun Duke of the East Angles, and Brynhart Earl of Sussex, who stood for the Monks, cast married Priests out of their Provinces. The matter being debated in a Council at Wiminfir, the Monks came was like to have the faft, till it was referred to the Rood, placed on the Refectory Wall where the Council sat: For to this great Or-cel Saint Dunstan desired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent ear for an answer: when suddenly a voice was heard to say, God forbid it should be so, God forbid it should be so. This was thought Authority sufficient, to suppress the Priests, till they perswading the people, that this was but a cunning practice of the Monks, in placing behind the Wall, a man of their own, who through a Trunk uttered these words in the mouth of the Rood. Whereupon another Assembly was appointed at Cleve in Wilshire, whether required the Prelates, with most of all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom. The Synod being met, and the matter at the height of discussing, it happened that the Joynts of the Room, where the Synod was held, suddenly brake, and the floor with all the people thereon, fell down, whereof many were hurt, and some slain; only the Archbifhop Dunstan, then Prefident, and mouth for the Monks stood unharmed; which whether it were done by practice, or were miraculous, reserved the Monks turn for justifying their cause; and married Priests were thereupon discarded.
It were infinite, and indeed ridiculous, to speak of all the Miracles, reported to be done by this Saint Dunstan, which may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.
But now a most lamentable disater comes to be remembered: For King Edward, hunting one time in the Island of Purbeck, not far from Corfe Castle; where his Mother-in-Law, Queen Elfrid, with his Brother Prince Ethel-red, were then rehiding, he out of his love to both, would needs himself alone go visit them; where the cruel woman, out of ambition to bring her own Son to the Crown, caused one to run him into the back with a Knife, as he was drinking a Cup of Wine on Horseback at his departing, who feeling himself hurt, furges his Horse, thinking thereby to get to his company, but the wound being mortal, and he fainting through loss of much blood, fell from his Horse; but one foot being intangled in the Stirrup, he was thereby rudely dragged up and down, through Woods and Lands; and lastly left dead at Corfe Gate; for which untimely death, he was ever after called by the name of Edward the Martyr. He reigned only three years and six months, and was buried first at Winchester, without any Funerals pomp, but after three years, by Duke Alfred, removed, and with great solemnity interred in the Minster of Shaftesbury. Queen Elfrid, to expiate this lye bloody fact, built the two Monastaries of Amestbury, and Wiminfir, in the Counties of Wilshire, and Southampton, in which latter with great perpetuaty, she lived till her death.
After the death of Edward the Martyr, dying at the age of six and twenty, his Half Brother Ethelred, at the age of twelve years, in the year 1979, was Crowned King at kingftone upon Thames, by Archbishop Dunstan, though much against his will; which King by reason of his backwardness in Action, was commonly called the Unready. At the Coron ation of this Prince St. Dunstan in a Prophetick spirit... it spirit denounced on him and the Kingdom, the wrath and indignation of Almighty God in these words following: Because (as he) thought aspired to the Crown by the death of thy Brother whom thy Mother hath murdered; therefore hear the word of the Lord: The Sword shall not depart from thy house, but shall fall continually against all the days of thy life, killing of thy flesh, till such time as the Kingdom shall be given to a house of repentance and language the Nation that now governs know not. Neither hold thy sin, the sin of thy Mother, and the sin of these men, who were perpetrators of her Counsel, and Executors of her wicked designs, he expostulated but by a long, and most severe vengeance. Which prediction of the Holy Archbishop was confirmed by Prodigies, and by the disastrous calamities which fell on him, his house, and the whole confirmed for truth. Besides this, most remarkable are the prophecies of a holy man in the time of this King Ethelred. Before whole time, for two and twenty years past the Danes had lived as quiet inmates with the English: but whether weary of so long doing nothing, or finding now opportunity of doing something, in the second year of this King, they begin to stir, and inviting from home, Forces, who in seven Ships arrived upon the Coast of Kent; they spoiled all the Country, specially the Towns, by burning and foraging the Kingdom, sometimes in one part, and sometimes in another, for eleven years together: till at last, in the year 991, the King by advice of his Lords, of whom Sireius the now Archbishop of Canterbury was chief, was contented to pay them ten thousand pounds, upon condition they should quietly depart the Realm. This served the turn for the present, but was so far from flattering them, that it did but give them the greater appetite: for the year following they came again, and that with a greater fleet than before, against whom the King prepared a competent Navy, and committed it to Ethelred, Earl of Mercia, but he proving treacherous (as indeed all other for the most part did, whom the King employed against the Danes, as with whom they were allied in blood) the Danes prevailed, that for the next composition, they had fifteen thousand pounds given them, and a year after, twenty thousand of foraging the land, more and more, till it came at last to forty thousand: by which means, the Land was emptied of all coin, and the English were brought to, that they were fain to Tilt, and Ear the Ground, whilst the Danesate idle, and eat the fruit of their labours, abusing the Wives and Daughters of their Housethereby, they laid, and yet in every place, for very fear, were called Lord Danes; (which afterward became a word of derision when one would signify a lazy Lubber.) In this distressful state, the King at last betook himself of a course: he sent forth a secret Commission into every City within his Dominions; that at an appointed time, they should massacre all the Danes that were amongst them: the day was the thirteenth of November, being the Festival of St. Brietis, in the year 1002. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the Danes for refuge took into the Church of St. Frideswide, as into a Sanctuary, when the English, neither regarding place nor person, set the Church on fire, wherein many of the Danes were burnt, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. And who would not now think, but that England by this Fact had clean shaken off the Danish yoke for ever? yet it proved clean otherwise: For the news of this massacre, adding a new edge of revenge, to the old edge of ambition, made the Danes sharper for against the English, then ever they had been before; so as the year following, their King Sweyn, with a mighty Navy entered the Country, razed and levelled with the ground the City of Exeter, all along from the East Gate to the West Stad against whom the King levied an Army, and made General over it the Earl Edric, his great favourite, whom he had created Duke of Mercia, and given him his Daughter Edith in marriage; yet all this great favour could not keep him from being treacherous, for being sent Ambassadors to the Danes, to mediate for peace, he revealed to them the weaknesses of the Land, and treacherously dissuaded them from consenting to any Truce. Upon this King Ethelred gave order, that every three hundred and ten Hides of Land should build a Ship, and every eight Hides fain a compleat Armour furnished; yet all this great preparation for no thing, but only to make a show. After this, the King seeing no end of their Invasions, nor promise kept upon any composition; (for three Danish Princes, with a great Fleet were now newly arrived) he determined to venture once for all, and to commit his cause to God, by the fortune of a Battel. To which end he secretly gathered a mighty power, and coming unlooked for, when the enemy was unprepared, he had certainly given an end to the Quarrel, if the wicked Edric had not dissuaded him from fighting, and put him into a caufetle fear, by forged tales. After this the Danes forraged many Countries, burnt Oxford, Thetford, and Cambridge; and lastly, entered Wiltshire, which was the seventeenth faire in number, they had laid waste like a Wilderness. The year after they make a new Expedition, and beliger Canterbury, which by trea- shon of a Church-man they won, took Alphonsus the Archbishop, and slew nine hundred Monks, and many of Religion, besides many Citizens, without all mercy; for they Tythed the people, slaying all by nines, and retaining only the rent to live: so that of all the Monks in the Town, there were but four saved, and of the Lay-people, four thousand eight hundred; by which account Master Lamberts collected, that there dyed in this Massacre three and forty thousand, and two hundred persons. The Archbishop Alphonsus, for that he refused to charge his Tenants with three thousand pounds to pay for his Ranforme, they most cruelly loked to death at Greenwich. Turkills the leader of these Murtherers, took into his passellion all Norfolk and Suffolk, over whom they tyrannized in most savage manner; the rest compounding with the English for eight thousand pounds, quietly for a white fojourn among them. The year following came King Sweyn again, and with a great Navy arrived in the mouth of Humber, and landed at Caister North-
...and the people of Lindsey yielded themselves; so that now over all the North from Withingley, he reigned sole King, and exacted pledges of them for their further obedience. From the North he passed into the South, subduing all before him till he came to London, where he was so violently encountered by the Londoners, that he was glad to retire, in which retiring notwithstanding he entered Bath, where Ethelward Earl of Devon, with his Western people, submitted himself to him. Yet after this, between him and the English was struck a fierce battle, which had been with good success, if the treachery of some in turning to the Danes, had not hindered it. After this the Danes proceeded on victoriously, and had gotten most part of the Land; and even London also by submission: whereupon the unfortunate King Ethelred, sending his Wife Emma, with her two Sons, Edward and Alfred, to her Brother Duke of Normandy, himself also the Winner following pasted either, leaving the Danes Lording it in his Realm. Sweyn now as an absolute King, exported from the English both Virtues and Pay for his Souldiers; and demanding such a Composition for preferring of St. Edmund Monastery in Suffolck, as the Inhabitants were not able, and therefore refrued to pay: he therefore threatened spoils, both to them and the Monastery; that were conceived, when suddenly in the midst of his jollity (faith Howden) he cried out, that he was struck by Saint Edmund with a Sword, being then in the midst of his Lords, and no man seeing from whole hand it came; and so with great horror and torment, three days after, upon the third of February, he ended his life at Thesford, or (as others say) at Gainborough. And now who would not think but this was a fair opportunity offered to the English, to free themselves wholly from the Danish yoke? but when all was done, either crost by treachery, or fruitified by misfortune, nothing prospered. It is true, upon this occasion of Sweyn’s death, King Ethelred returned out of Normandy, but at his coming Canute the Son of Sweyn, had gotten the people of Lindsey to be at his devotion, and to finde him both Hope and Men against their own King; so as Ethelred was now to encounter as well his own Subjects as Danes, which he did so violently, that he made Canute glad to return into Denmark, as utterly hopeless of any good to be done in England. And now one would certainly think the Danes had been removed, Root and Branch, out of England, and never like to trouble the Land any more; and indeed there was all the appearance of probability for it that could be. But it is true sayving, That which will be, shall be, let all be done that can be. For now Turk the Dane, who had before revolted to King Ethelred, growing sensible of his task, which was this, or no way to be redeemed; and tender of his Country-men, cafe, which was now or never to be helped, with a ne of his Ships sailed into Denmark; and first exciting himself to Canute for his former defection, although he had done it of purpose, to learn all advantages against the English, which now he could discover to him; so he prevailed with Canute once again to try his fortune, that with a Navy of two hundred Ships he set sail for England, and landed at Sandwich, where he gave the English a great overthrow, and paide victoriously through the Counties of Dorset, Somerset, and Wiltis. When Ethelred lying dangerously sick at Cymmen, the managing of the War was committed to Prince Edmund his Son, who preparing to give the Danes Battel, had suddenly notice given him, that his Brother-in-law Ethrick meant to betray him in to his Enemies hands, which made him suspend his proceeding: and Ethrick perceiving his design to be discovered, cast off the Masque, and with forty of the Kings Ships fled openly to the Enemy; and thereupon, all the Weit Countries submitted themselves unto Canute. By this time King Ethelred having recovered his ficknes, prepared to go on with the Batrell, which his Son Edmund had intended; but his Forces being afsembled, he likewise had suddenly notice given him, that his Subjects meant to betray him to the Danes. Hereupon he withdrew himself to London, as the place in which he was confind; where falling into a relapse of his former ficknes, he ended his unfortunate days in the year 1016, when he had reigned 37 years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, whose bones as yet remain in the North Wall of the Chancel, in a Cheff of gray marble, appointed to that of Siboba, King of the East Saxons. He had by his deceased Wives, eight Sons, and four Daughters; of whom his youngest named Goda, was married to one Walter de Maughe, a Nobleman of Normandy, by whom she had a Son named Roland, which Roland had a Son named Harold, created afterward by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudely in the County of Gloucester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandos of Sudely, now being.

Ethelred being dead, his third Son Edmund called Ironside (of his ability in enduring labour) but the eldest living at his Fathers death, succeeded, and was crown’d at Kinfles on the Thames, by Lewins Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1016. A great part of the English both feared and favoured, and indeed out of fear favoured Canute; especially the Clergy, who at Southampton adored him as their King, and swore Fealty to him: but the Londines stood firm to Prince Edmund, and were the principal authors of his Election. Canute before the death of King Ethelred, had besieged the City, and now with a large Trench encompassed it: but the new King Edmund coming on, raised the siege, and made Canute fly to the Isle of Shoeppe, where having laid the Winter, the Spring following, he affiled the Welf of England, and at Penth in Dorsetshire; a Battel was fought, and the Danes discomfited. After this, in Worcestersire at a place called Sheronan, another Battel was fought, where the Danes were like again to be discomfited: but the traitorous Ethrick perceiving it, he cut off the head of a Souldier like unto King Edmund both in hair and countenance, and slaying his bloody Sword, with the gaping head, crying to the Army of the English, Off with off, off, and get away, for your King is kill’d; behold, here is his head; but King Edward having notice of this treacherous stratagem, hastened to shew himself where he might best be seen; whose sight so encouraged his men, that they had gott'ern that day a final victory, if night had not prevented them. Duke Eadric excites his Fcut, as being mistaken in the countenance of the man, and desirous to save the blood of the English; upon which false colour he was received into favour again. After this, Canutus secretly in the night brake upon Ingham, and marched towards London, which in a fort was still held by the Danish Ships; but King Edmund hearing of his departure, followed him, and with small ado removed the Siege, and in triumphant manner entered the City. After this near unto Osford in Kent, was another great Battle fought, in which Canutus lost four thousand five hundred men, and King Edmund only six hundred; the rest of the Danes saving themselves by flight; whom if King Edmund had pursu'd, it is thought that day had ended the Wars between these two Nations for ever. But the ever traitor Eadric, kept King Edmund from pursuing them, by telling him of Ambushes and other dangers: so as Canutus had leisure to pass over into Essex, but thither also King Edmund followed him, where at Abdon three miles from Saffron Walden, another Battle was fought, in which the Danes being at the point to be overthrown, the traitor Eadric, with all his forces revolted to their Iude; by which treachery the English lost the day. There died of King Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Godwin, Duke Athelwald, Duke Athelstan, Earl Stur, Canute Bishop of Lincoln, Wilfey Abbot of Ramsey, with many other. The remembrance of which Battel is retained to this day, by certain small hills there remaining, whence have been dug the bones of men, armour; and horse-briddles. After this at Dereberef, near to the River Severn, another Battel was ready to be fought: when suddenly, a certain Captain steps forth, and for saving of blood, used great perusations, that either they should try the Battel by single Combat, or else divide the Kingdom betwixt them: Upon this the Combat is agreed on, and the two Princes entering into a small Iland called Alney, adjoining to the City of Gloucester, in compleat Armour attailed each other; at first on Horseback, and after on foot: when Canutus having received a dangerous wound, and finding himself overmatched in strength, desired a Compromise, and with a loud voice used these words. What necessity should move us, most valiant Prince, for obtaining of a Title to endanger our lives? were it not better to lay malice aside, and condescend to a loving agreement? let us therefore become fnwon Brothers, and divide the Kingdom betwixt us. This motion was by King Edmund accepted, and thus was the Kingdom divided between these two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part which lies upon the Coast of France, and Canutus the rest. But now Duke Eadric hath his laft and greatest act of treachery to play; for King Edmund being required to place for natures necessit, he slighted from under the draught a sharp Spear into his Body, and then cutting off his head preferred it to Canutus, with these flattering words, All hail, thus sole Monarch now of England, for here behold the head of thy Co-partner, which for thy sake I have adventured to cut off. Canutus though ambitious enough of sovereignty, yet abashed at so dilatory a fact, replied and vowed, that in reward of that service, his own head should be advanced above all the Peers of his Kingdom; which soon after he performed; for by his command the false Eadric's head was cut off, and placed upon the highest Gate of London. Matthew of Malmesbury relates this murder to have been atfeted by Eadric's own Son, at the commandment of his Father: William Malmesbury writeth that the King was killed by two Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber, hired by the same diloyal Eadric; notwithstanding Roger Howenden reports, that he died a natural death at London. The death of this King in this manner, some say, was acted at Oxford; others, that he died of a natural sickness in London; but howsoever he came to his death, his reign was but only seven months, and his body was buried at Chalfettum, near to his Grandfather King Edder. This King Edmund left by his Wife Algafl, two Sons; the eldest named Edmund, farnamed the Out-law, because he lived out of England, in Hungary, as a banished man, for fear of King Canutus: but when his Uncle King Edmund the Confessor had obtained the Crown, he was recalled, and honourably entertained till he died. He married Agatha, Sister to Queen Sophia, Wife to Solomon King of Hungary, and Daughter to the Emperor Henry the Second; by whom he had Edger farnamed 0stiving, the right Heir of the English Crown, though he never enjoyed it. The second Son of Insolence was called after his Fathers name Edmund. King Edmund had also two Daughters, Margaret and Christian, of whom the younger became a Veyled Nun at Ramsey in Hampshire; the elder Margaret, after she was Heir to the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcom, the third King of Scotland, from which princely bed in a lineal Decent, our High and Mighty Monarch King James the first, both in his moit Royal Person, unite the Britains, Saxons, Normans, and Scottisr Imperial Crowns in one.

Canutus being poftell of half the Kingdom given by composition with King Edward, now after his death feised upon the whole, and to prevent all further question, he called a Council of the English Nobility, wherein it was pronounced, whether in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claim of Title to the Crown had been referred for King Edmunds Brethren or Sons; to which (not daring to spy otherwise) they absolutely answered no, and thereupon took all of them the Oath of Allegiance to Canutus. Being thus cleared of all opinions, he prepared with great solemnity for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Leveings farnamed Bifbane, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1017. being the first Dane that reigned Monarch of England. But Canutus not thinking himself sufficiently

He marries Queen Emma, the Relic of King Ethelred, by which match he procured to himself three great benefits: one that he won the love of the people by marrying a Lady whom they fo intirely loved; another, that he gained the Alliance of the Duke of Normandy, a neighbouring Prince of great power; the third, that by marrying the Mother, he secured himself against the Sons: as likewise Queen Emma was not unwillingly persuaded to the match, upon agreement to make her Infe, if he had any by her, to inherit the Crown of England. And to win the love of the people more, he caufed great numbers of his Dames, who preferred the Country, to return home, befowing amongst them for their satisfaction, four score and two thousand pounds. And to win the love of the people yet more, he now fent himself to the making of good Laws, in a Parliament at Oxford; wherein, for a pattern of those times, fome that concern Religion, may not unfitly be here related. First, for the celebration of Divine Service, it was ordained, that all Ceremonies tending to the en- crease of Reverence and Devotion should be used as need required. Secondly, that upon the Sabbath day, all publick Fairs, Markets, Sy- nods, Huntings, and all peculiar actions should be forborn, unless the urgent necefsity should require it. Thirdly, that every Christian should thrice in the year receive the bleft Sac- rament of the Lords Supper. Fourthly, that if a Minister of an Altar killed a man, or com- mitted any notorious crime, he fhould be deprived both of his Order and Dignity. Fifth- ly, that a married woman convict of Adultery, fhould have her nose and ears cut off. Sixthly, That a widow marrying within a twelve month after her Husband's deceafe fhould lose her Joynture. These and many other good Laws were made, whereby the Kingdom remained during all his time, in a moft peaceable state and government. In the third year of his Reign he heard how the Vandals, taking advantage of his abfence, had cutted Denmark, and annoy- ed his Subjects; whereupon with a great Ar- my of English he pafled over the Seas, and gave them Battel, but with ill success the firft day; when preparing for the next day's Battel, the Earl Godwin who was the General of the Eng- lish, secretly in the dead of the night, set upon the Vandals Camp; and with a great flough of their Souldiers, made their two Princes, Usfin and Anlave, to fly the Field. In the morning it was told Conraid that the English were fled, for that their Station was left, and not a man of them to be found, which did not a little trouble his patience. And going in-person to fee the truth, found the great Army of the English had given, for which service elsewhere he held the English, and especially the Earl Godwin, in great estimation. After this, returning home, he made a prosperous expedition against Mal- caline, King of Scots; and at last, in the fifteenth year of his Reign, wearied with the honourable troubles of the world, and out of a devotion, he took a Journey to Rome, to vifit the Sepul- chre of St. Peter and Paul, from whence he wrote to the Bishops, and Nobility of England, that they should carefully administer Justice, and never seek to advance his profit by any un- due ways, or with the detriment of any man. At his return from Rome, he built in Eijfe the Church of Aflan, where he got the Victory against King Edmund; in Nofull, the Abbey of St. Benetis, which Saint he greatly reverenc- ed; and in Nofull the Monastery of Saint Edmund, which Saint he deadly feared. To the Church of Eijfe he gave many rich J ewels, whereof one was a Cross, valued to be worth as much as the whole revenue of England, amounted to in one year. To Coventry he gave the arm of the great St. Anfaia, which he bought at Pavia in his return from Rome, for which he paid an hundred Talents of Silver, and one of Gold. One strange act is recorded, which he did for convincing his fawning Flatterers, who used to tell him that his powers were more than humane; For being one time at Southampton, he commanded that his Chair of State should be fet on the floor when the Sea began to flow, and then lifting down there in the presence of his many attendants, he fpoke thus to that Element: I charge thee that thou prefume not to enter my Land, nor wet these Robes of thy Lord that are about me. But the Sea giving no heed to his command, but keeping on his usual course of Tyde, ftreight did his skirts, and after his thigh was dunce to by the flood, he thus fpoke in the hearing of them all: Let all the worlds Inhabitants know, that vain and weak is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy of the name of King, but he that keeps both Heaven and Earth and Sea in obedience. After which time he would never fuffer the Crown to be fet upon his head, but prefently Crowned therewith the Picture of Christ on the Crofs at Winchester; from which example arose perhaps the Cufom, to hang up the Armour of worthy men in Churches, as Offerings consecrated to him who is the Lord of Battel. When he had reigned nineteen years he deceased at Shaftesbury in the County of Dorset, the twelfth of November, in the year 1035. and was buried in the Church of the old Monastery at Winchester; which being after new built, his bones with many other English Saxon Kings, were taken up, and are preferred to

Of the second and third Danish Kings in England.

King Canute dying, left his Kingdom of Norway to his eldest Son Sweyn, and his Kingdom of England, to his youngest Son Hardiknut, whom he had by his Wife Emma; but he being at the time of his Fathers death in Denmark, Harold his elder Brother by a former Wife, taking advantage of his absence, layes claim to the Crown. For determining of which Right, the Lords assembled at Oxford, where Queen Emma pleaded for her Son Hardiknut, urging the Covenant of Canute at their Marriage, and his last Will at his death; as also Earl Godwin of Kent did the like, being left Guardian of her Children, and keeper of his last Will. But Harold's presence, together with the favour of the Londoners, Danes, and Northumbrians, fo won the Lords, that the absent Hardiknut was neglected, and Harold was proclaimed and crowned King at Oxford, by Eltham Archipoll of Canterbury, in the year 1035.

Harold having now attainted the Crown, was not so jealous of his Brother Hardiknut, as of his Mother-in-law Queen Emma, and her Sons by King Ethelred, who were beyond sea; and therefore how to secure himself against these was his first care: For effecting whereof, he framed a Letter, as written by Queen Emma, to her two Sons Edward and Alfred; initating them to attempt the Crown usurped by Harold, against their Right: to which Letter, coming first to the hands of Alfred, he supposing no fraud, returned answer, that he would shortly come over, and follow her counsel. And thereupon with a small Flee, and some few Souldiers led him by Baldwin Earl of Flanders, he took the Sea for England, where coming to shore, Earl Godwin met him, and bound himself by Oath to be his guide to his Mother Queen Emma, but being wrought with for Harold, he led him and his company a contrary way, and lodged them at Guilford, making known to King Harold what he had done; who King Harold being dead, the Lords to make amends for their former neglect, sent now for Hardiknute, and offer him their Allegiance, who accepteth their offer, and thereupon taking Sea, arrived upon the Coast of Kent, the sixth day after he had set sail out of Denmark; and with great pomp conveyed to London, was there crowned King by Eltham Archipoll of Canterbury, in the year 1040. His first act was to be revenged of his deceased Brother Harold, whole body he caufed to be digged up, and thrown into the Thames, where it remained till a Fisherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of St. Clement without Temple Bar; commonly called St. Clement's Danes, because it was the burying place of the Danes, as some write. But towards his Mother and half Brother Prince Edward, he bestowed great repair and affection, inviting them both to return into England, where he received them with all the honour, that from a Son or Brother could be expected.

But now, as the King Harold, for his swiftness in running, was summoned Harofoot to this King for his intemperance in dyes, might have been summoned Swinemouth, or Besco di Porece; for his Tables were spread every day four times, and furnished with all kinds of curious dishes, as delighting in nothing but gormandizing and swilling; and as for managing the State, he committed it wholly to his Mother Queen Emma, and to the politicall Earl of Kent, Godwin; who finding this weaknesses in the King, began to think himself of aspiring; and to make the better way for it, he fought by all means to alien the Subjects hearts from the Prince; amongst other counsels he caufed him to lay heavy Taxes upon them, only for Shipmoney to pay his Dames, amounting to two and thirty Of English Kings again, and first of Edward the Confessor.

Edward the Confessor succeeded Hardwicke.

KING Hardwicke dying without issue, as having never been married, and the Danish line being extinct, Edward, for his Piety called the Confessor, half Brother to the deceas'd Hardwicke, and Son to King Ethelred by his Wife Queen Emma, was by a general consent admitted King of England, and was Crowned at Winchester by Edwine Archbishop of Canterbury, on Easter-day, in the year 1042, being then of the age of forty years. He was born at Ship near to Oxford; and after his Father's death, for safety went into France, to the Duke of Normandy, his Mothers Brother, from whence he now came to take upon him the Crown of England. His Acts for gaining the peoples love, were first, the remitting the yearly tribute of forty thousand pounds, gathered by the name of Danegeld, which had been imposed by his Father, and for twenty years together paid out of all mens Lands, but only the Clergy; and then from the divers Laws of the Merchant, West Saxons, Dene, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one body certain, and written in Latin, being in a sort the Fountain of those which at this day we term the Common Laws, though the forms of pleading, and process therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquerors. The Reign of this King was very peaceable, only in his fifth year the Danes Pirates entered the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-coasts of Essex they spoiled, and then in Flanders made merchandise of their prey. As likewise the Irifies, with thirty Ships entered Severn, and with the assistance of Griffith King of Southwales, burnt or flew all in their way, till at last Reife the Brother of Griffith was slain at Balnamore, and his head presented to King Edward at Gloucester. His Domestic troubles were only by Earl Godwin and his Sons; who yet after many contentions and affairs were reconciled, and Godwin received again into great favour as before. But although King Edward forgave his Tremaines, yet the Divine Providence did not; for soon after he faid at Table with the King on Easter-Monday, we was sudenly stricken with death, and on Thursday following dyed, and was buried at Winchester. Some make his death more exemplary, as that justifying himself for Prince Alfred's death, that he should pray to God, that if he were any way guilty of it, he might never swallow down one morsel of bread, and thereupon by the just Judgement of God was choked by the first morsel he offered to eat.

In this Kings time such abundance of snow fell in January, continuing till the middle of March following, that almost all Cartel and Fowl perished, and therewith an excelleldearth followed.

Two Acts are related of this King, that seem nothing correspondent to the general opinion had of his Virtue, one concerning his Mother, the other touching his Wife: That concerning his Mother Queen Emma was this, that because after King Ethelred's death, she married the Danish King Canute, and seemed to favour her sister, in more than her Issue by King Ethelred, therefore he disposifed all of her all her Goods, and committed them to custody, in the Abbey of Wawrel; and more than this, so far hearkened to a suspicion cast upon her, of uncharle familiarity with Wynwine Bishop of Winchefter, that for her Purgation, she was fain to pafs the tryal of Fire, which was in this in this manner; nine Plow-shares red hot were laid in unequal distance, which she must pafs bare-foot and blind-fold, and if she paffed them unhurt, then she was judged Innocent, if otherwise, Guilty. And this tryal she paffed, and came out fairely, to the great astonishment of all beholders. The other touching his Wife was this; he had married Editha the beautiful, and indeed virtuous Daughter of Earl Godwin, and because he had taken displeasure against the Prince, he would fiew no kindness to the Daughter, if he had made her his Wife, but conuered not without her, but only at board, but not at bed, or if at bed, no other than then David with Abigail, and yet was content to hear her accused of Incontinency; whereof if she were guilty she could not be Innocent. So as, what the virtues were, for which after his death he shou'd be reputed a Saint, doth not easily appear. It seems he was chaste, but not without injury to his Wife; Pius, but not without ungratefulnes to his Mother; Juf in his prefent Government, but not without neglect of Poftie- rity; for through his want of Providence in that point, he left the Crown to fo doubtful succession, that soon after his decease it was tranflated out of English into French, and the Kingdom made fervile to a fourth Foreign Na- tion. One ability he had which raised him him above the pitch of ordinary Kings, and yet at this day is ordinary with Kings, that by his only touching and laying his hand upon it, he secured a Dience, which from his curing is cal- led, The Kings-Orde, his Mother Queen Em- ma, in memory of the nine Plow-shares she had paffed in her Tryal, gave nine Mannors to the Minifter of Winchifter, and himselfe remembering the wrong he had done her, bestowed on the fame place, the Island of Portland in Dorset- fhire, being about feuen miles in compass. He made made also of a little Monastery in the West of London, by the River of Thames, a most beautiful Church, (called of the place Westminster) where he provided for his own Sepulture; and another dedicated to St. Margaret, standing without the Abbey. This of Westminster he endowed with many rich Revenues, and confirmed his Charters under his Broad Seal, being the first of the Kings of England, who used that large and flately impression in their Charters and Patents. He founded also the College of St. Mary Ottery in Devonshire, and gave unto the Village of Ottery, and removed the Bishops See from Ottington to Exeter; as a place of far more dignity: and when he had resigned the space of three and twenty years and six months, he ended his life the fourth of January, in that room of his Palace at Westminster, which is now called the Painted Chamber, in the year 1066. and was buried in the Church at Westminster, which he had built.

King Edward the Confessor, being himself without issue, had in his life time sent into Hungary for his Nephew Edward called the Outlaw, the Son of Edmund Ironside, with a purpose to design him his Successor in the Crown, but he dying soon after his coming into England, King Edward then gave his Son Edgar the name of Atheling; as to say, Prince Edgar, meaning to design him for his Successor, but being prevented by death, before the Succession was fully established, and Edgar Atheling, though he had right, yet being young, and not of power to make good his right, Harold the Son of Earl Godwin steps into the Throne, and never standing upon Ceremonies, set himself the Crown upon his own head, wherein, though as a violator of Holy Kites, he offended the Clergy, yet not any either of Clergy or Laity, durst oppose him, as being at that time the most martial man in the Kingdom; and such a one, as the scale of the Realm stood at that time in need of; and besides his own worthines had the assisstance of Edwin, and Har- chan, the two great Earls of Yorkshire and Chefter, whose Sitter Algibe he had married. It is true withal, that King Edward had appointed the Crown after his own decease, sometime to William Duke of Normandy, sometimes to Edgar Atheling, and sometimes to this Harold, so as he was Crowned by Aldred Archbishop of York, as not coming in by intretion or wrong, but by the appointment of King Edward; though that appointment of King Edward, was rather to make him Regent, during the minority of Edgar, then to make him absolute King: but however being once in the Throne, he was then able to make his own Title, and to make Prince Edgar some amends, he created him Earl of Oxford, which was indeed to use him like a Child, take away a Jewel, and please him with an Apple. Yet Harold having once gotten into the Throne, he carried himself with great Valour and Justice, for the time he fare in it, which was but very short (only nine months) as being indeed but tothering from the very beginning, and that chiefly by means of his own Brother Tostwine, who by diverting his Forces to supprefs a Rebellion, made him of lefs force to retell an Invasion. But now that we have shewed how Harold entered the Throne, we must forbear to shew how he was call out, till we come to him that call him out; who because he was not only of another Family, but of another Nation, we must necessarily take the beginning from a deeper root; and indeed, seeing in him we shall joy our Island to the Continent, which is a larger world, our Kings hereafter will afford a larger Extent for matter of Discourse then heretofore they have done.

KING WILLIAM

THE FIRST,

Called the CONQUEROUR.

His Parentage and Descent.

Here were six Dukes of Normandy in France, in a direct line succeeding from Father to Son. The first was Robert, who of a private man in Denmark, coming forth with the exuberancy of his Nation, wrested by force of Arms from Charles the Simple, King of France, to be made Duke of Normandy. The second was William his Son, called Long-Eyset, or Long-Sword. The third was Richard his Son, called the Hardy, who had Richard, and a Daughter called Emma, married to Edward King of England, Father of Richard the Confessor. The fourth was Richard the second, his Son, called (as you). The fifth was Richard the third, his Son, who by a first Wife had three Sons, Richard, Robert, and William; and by a second two other Sons, William Earl of Arques, and Menger Archbishop of Rouen. So as Richard his eldest Son by his first Wife, succeeded him by the name of Richard the fourth, and dying without issue, the Dukedom descended to Robert his second Son by his first Wife: which Robert was Father to our William the Conqueror, of whom it is thus recorded; that riding one time abroad, he happened to pass by a company of Country Maids that were a dancing, where having a while to look upon them, he was so taken with the handomest and graceful carriage of one of them whose name was Arlette, a Skinner's Daughter (from whence as some think our word Harlot comes) that affection commanded him, and authorily her, he caufed her that night to be brought to his Bed; where being together, what was done or said between them, is no matter for History to record, though some Historians have recorded both; making her no fomodeft as was fit for a Maid: only ten months after it appeared, that at this time our Duke William was begotten; who proving a man of extraordinary spirit, we may attribute it to the heat of affection in which he was begotten. Neither did there want before, and at his birth fore-running tokens which prefaged his future greatness; for his Mother Arlette being with him, had a dream like that of Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus the first Persian Monarch; namely, that her bowels were extended and dilated over all Normandy and England. Also as soon as he was born, being laid on the Chamber floor, with both his hands he took up rushes, and shutting his little fists, held them very fast; which gave occasion to the Gospling Wives to congratulate Arlette in the birth of such a boy, and the Midwife cry'd out, the child would prove a King.

It appears by many examples, that Bastardy in those days was no bar to succession, till a law was afterward made to make it a bar. It brought some disgrace, where the Mother was mean, but no impediment where the Father was Noble; and even his Bastardy seemed to have some alloy, if it be true (as some write) that his Father took the said Arlette afterward to be his Wife: and yet perhaps he had not the Duke dom so much by succession, as by gift. For when he was about nine years old, his Father calling his Nobility together, caufed them to swear Allegiance to this base Son of his, and to take him for their Liege Lord after his decease. Neither was this in those days unfrequent, for Princes to confer their Principalities after their own deceases upon whom they pleased, counting it as lawful to appoint Successors after them, as Substitutes under them; even in our time and Kingdom the Duke of Northumberland prevailed with King Edward the fifth, to exclude his two Sitters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to appoint the Lady Jane Grey, Daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him.

His Education and Tuition in his Minority.

His Father having declared and appointed him to be his Successor, went soon after (whether out of devotion, or to do Penance for procuring his Brothers death, whereof he was suspect) into the Holy Land, in which Journey he died, having left the tuition of his young Son to his two Brothers, and the Guardianship to the King of France, in whose Court for a time he was brought up. A strange confidence, to commit the tuition of a Son that was base, to pretenders that were legitimate, and to a King of France, who aimed at nothing more more, then to re-annex this Dukedom to his Crown. But it seems his confidence was grounded upon the proximity of blood in his Brothers, and upon the merits of his own service formerly done to the King of France; which though it proved well enough with him, yet is not to be taken into example to follow.

His troubles in his Minority.

First, Roger de Treasy, who derived his Pedegree from Rolle, and had won much Honour by his valour in the Wars, (notwithstanding the Oath of Allegiance he had formerly taken) takes exception to his Bastardy, and invites complices to affit him in recovering the Dukedom to a legitimate Race: a fair pretext, if the Fate of Duke William had not been against it; who thought he was himself but young, and could not do much in his own person, yet the Divine Providence raised him up friends that supplied him with Affiance, and particularly Roger de Beaumont, by whose valor this Roger de Treasy, with his two Brothers, was defeated and slain. After Roger de Treasy, William de Argus his Uncle lays claim to the Duchy, and affifted by the King of France comes to a Battel, but by the valor of Count Gifford, the Dukes General, was likewise defeated; and these were troubles before he arrived to seventeen years of age. After this, one Guy, Earl of Burgundy, Grandchild to Richard the second, Duke of Normandy, grew sensible of his power to the Dukedom, and joyning with Villiain, and the Earl of Blessin, two powerful Normans, confpired Duke William's death, and had effect; it, if a certain Fool about him had not flown away in the night, to the place where the Duke was, and never left knocking and crying at the Gate, till he was admitted to his presence, willing him to fly for his life instantly, or he would be murdered. The Duke considering, that being related by a Fool, it was like to be the more palpable, and that there might be danger in staying, none in going, rode instantly away, all alone, toward Falaise, his principle Castle, but meeting his way, he happened to pass, where a Gentleman was standing at his door, of whom he asked the way, and was by him, as knowing him, directed; which he had no sooner done; but the Conspirators came presently inquiring if such a one had not pass'd that way, which the Gentleman affirmed, and undertook to be their guide to overtake him; but leading them of purpose a contrary way; the Duke by this means came safely to Falaise, and from thence journeys to the King of France, complaining of his injuries, and imploring his aid, as one that was his homager, and committed to his care by his ser vant his Father. The King of France moved with his distress, and remembrance of his Father's merits, though he wished he was less then he was: yet he fo aided him, that he made him greater then he was: for himself in person, suffering much in the Battel, procured him the Victory. By which we may fee, that Folly, and Fortune, and even Enemies themselves, are all affillants to the Deftines; or to say better, indebted to the Divine Providence. Many other affronts were offered him, some by meaner Princes, some afterwards by the King of France himself, who was now grown jealous of his Greatness; all which he encountered with such dexterity, that made his Battardy, as it were, become Legitimate, and Virtue her self grow proud of his person.

His Carriage afterwards in Peace.

By this time he was come to the age of two and twenty years; and whereas all this while he had shewed himself a valiant General in Wars, he now began to shew himself a provident Governor in Peace, composing and ordering his flates; where in he so carried himself, that as his Subjects did both fear and love him, so his neighbouring Princes did both fear and hate him; or if not hate him, at least emulate him.

His Incitements for invading England.

Duke William had Incitements to invade England, and some few of a Tide. To understand this more fully, we will reflect upon some passages tranfacted between the two former Kings, Edward the Confessor, and Harold the Son of Earl Godwine. And this recapitulation will give some light, and is very pertinent to our intended purpose.

Earl Godwine falling out with King Edward, the brawls was carried with such heat on both sides, that the Earl and all his Hitherto a mere a manner banished the Realm. Godwine makes his refuge to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Harold his Son into Ireland, Emma the Kings Mother decealing, they both return with a great Navy, and strong Army. The Nobility fearing a Civil War, labour for a Reconciliation between the King and the Exiles; but Edward jealous of Godwine arts and treachery, would by no means hearken unto it. At last upon conditions they are restored to the Kings favour and their Country: Hostages are delivered; Helen the Son of Godwine, and Harono his Grandchild, whom the King for more security finds into Normandy, there to be detained by Duke William his Kinsman. After the death of Godwine, Harold succeeds him, Earl of Kent, who craves leave of the King to go to Normandy, and bring back his Brother and Kinsman; The King in this manner answers him, Harold you may do your pleasure, and I may permit, though will not confent; for I do foresee, that if you undertake this Journey, it will prove to the ruine of the Kingdom, and your own confusion. Harold notwithstanding, obfinate in his resolution, after a tempestuous voyage, arrives in France, where he is taken prisoner by the Lord of Pontios, and at the command and threats of Duke Williams dismiss'd; and though first rob'd of his Treasures, and choicest things he transporte'd, as last sent into Normandy; where relating the cause of his Journey, he was honourably entertain'd, and fairly promised, unless himself were the obstacle, all things should succeed as he wish'd. After some time the Duke taking his opportunity entered into private discourse with him, and told him, that King Edward Edward being brought up in his youth together with him, had faithfully promised him, that if ever he came to be King of England, he would make him his heir, and settle the Kingdom on him. Wherefore Harold (quoth the Duke) if you will affit me in gaining that Crown, when I come over into England, you shall have your Brother and Nephew; and to make our eye of friendship the stronger, you shall promise to take one of my Daughters for Wife, and send your Sister hither, whom I will bestow on one of my chief Lords: you shall also promise me to secure the Castle of Dover, for my service: and I promise you that when I am King of England, I will deny you nothing, which in reason you shall demand. Harold having heard the Duke, was much perplexed: but seeing himself in such straits, that he must either venture on a promise, or hazard an imprisonment, condescends to all the Duke demanded; and for more security, with a solemn Oath confirms his agreement: and returning into England, acquaints Edward with all these passages, who replied, Did not I know William's disposition, and foretell thee how much mischief this Journey would bring upon England? Duke William having the Word of Edward, and the Oath of Harold, had sufficient obligations to expect the Kingdom: but hearing of the death of Edward, and that Harold was Crowned King, he thought himself no more forgotten by Edward than wronged by Harold; and therefore sent a messenger to put him in mind of King Edward's Promise, and his own Oath. Harold returns answer that he could not fend his Sister over, because he was dead; but if William would have his Carcasses he should. Secondly, that he could neither promise, nor dispose of Kingdom, which was none of his own. Lastly, he should be injurious to his own Nobility, if he should without their consent and advice take a stranger for Wife. William having heard his answer, was as yet patient, and again sending to Harold mildly, demands of him at least to take his Daughter for his Wife and Queen; otherwise by force of Arms he would recover that Kingdom, which was his own by the promise of King Edward. To this Harold peremptorily replies, that he feared not the one, so by no means would he do the other. Duke William thus flighted by Harold, endeavours to make him honest by force, and affur'd himself he should finde him a weak Enemy, who had proved so perfur'd a Friend. There were the incitements which caus'd William in his declining age to undertake this expedition: but who can think himself too old for a Kingdom, when Galba, above 73 years of age buckled on an Armour on his unwieldy limbs for the attaining of a Roman Empire?

Duke William accused with Harold's answers, acquits the Nobility with his purporle, who with some do confedent to aid him, as likewise many other great Lords of France, but specially Baldwin Earl of Flanders, whose Daughter he had married; and who be ing at that time Guardian of the young King of France, procured aid from him also; and to make the Enterprize the more successfull, Pope Alexander the second sent him a Banner, with an Agnus of Gold, and one of the hairs of St. Peter. So as the preparation of the Duke both by Sea and Land, was very great, having three hundred sail of Ships, and as some write 890, and as one Norman above a thousand, and one Gemineticus, three thousand; and though Harold had likewise provided a Warlike Fleet to encounter him, yet it was at that time un fortunately diverted another way. For Tancred his Brother being then in Rebellion in the North, and Harold Horfager King of Norway, at the same time invading those parts, and perhaps upon a bruit, that the Dukes Fleet was not yet ready to come forth, removed both his Fleet and Army thither; where through he goe the Victory at Stamford, with the death both of his brother Tancred, and of the King of Norway: yet it made way for the Duke to land quietly, and he entr'd the Kingdom as easily as one may enter a hoeuse, when the doors are all left open. By this means King Harold's Shipping (the belt wall of defence to an Island) was utterly frustrate; and as for his Land Forces, they were by his Battel at Stamford, exceedingly both weaken'd and impaired: yet hearing that Duke William was landed at Penney, not far from Haftings in Suffolk, he repar'd thither with all speed, and gathering together his broken Forces, and increasing them by all the means he could, made himself ready to give the Duke Battel. Duke William in the mean time, as soon as he had landed his men, sent his Ships presently away, that there might be no thinking of any thing, but either Death or Victory. And when going himself on Land, it is said, his foot slipped, and he fell down; which some that bydoy, taking it for an evil sign, No (faith he) I have by this take possession of this Land. And indeed prefaces are, but as Animulus eis qui praefagis, as in this Dukes fall it afterwards fell out. The like confidence of spirit fhewed he not long after, when the Armies were ready to joy; for he that put on the Dukes Armour, whether out of hate, or out of perturbation of minde, putting the forepart behind, and the back part before, the Duke feeing it, merrily said, I fee now by this invercion of my Armour, that my Duke-dom will be turned into a Kingdom: taking that for a goud Omen, which some other of weaker spirits would have taken for a bad. Many ways of composition between Duke William and King Harold were propounded, yet Harold would have it none, as nothing doubting of success, and perhaps thinking it a disgrace to capitulate for that, when now his own: and when one of his Brothers called Gyth, being less interested, and therefore clearer fighted, intreated him to consider, what a fearful thing it was to break an Oath, which he fo solemnly had sworn, Harold seem'd to conceive, that nothing which he did being a private man, could be of force to bind him, now being a Prince: and for on the fourteenth day of October, being Saturday, in the yeer 1066. (which day he liked the better, because it was his Birth-day, hoping that the day of his Birth Birth, would not so much degenerate, to prove the day of his Death, though this also even bred no good blood to the action; for the Souldiers of Harold, thinking thereby to honour their Kings Birth-day, spent the night before in revelling and drinking, where the Souldiers of the Duke out of consideration of their next day's work, spent the night in quietness and devotion; they joyed Battel, (the Kingmen being placed in the fore-front, as by an ancient custom is their due, and King Harold with his Lordaers, leading the main Battel) where though their Armies were not much unequal in number, (for they were each of them near about threescore thousand men) yet there was great odds in the expertness of their Souldiers, and more in the advantage of their weapons; for, the Duke had with him all the flower of France and Flanders, where King Harold had lost his best men, in his late Battel; and for advantage of Weapons, the Normans had long Bows and Arrows, which among the English at that time were not at all in use. What marvel that the Normans got the Victory, though King Harold losing his life, yet lost no reputation; and though the English Souldiers shewed no less valour, in being conquered, then the Normans did in conquering? One circumstance may not be omitted, that King Harold as an expert General, had ordered his men in so firm a Body, that no force of the Normans could disorder their Ranks, till Duke William used a stratagem, commanding his men to retire, and to counter-feit flight; by which he drew the English on, upon a hollow ground covered with earth; where into many of them fell and perished, and beside into an ambush of his Horsemen, which unexpectedly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. Withal, there seems one great error to have been committed (at least, if it were an error; and not rather a necessity) that there was not a supplemnetal Army provided, (as his Brother Grjth would have had it) which might have come on if the first had failed; and would have been of great advantage against a weared Army. But when Sic utum of fapi- entiam, sine force weak and in danger with fland, all tells the Providence is untoward, and cannot prevent. It is true, Duke William that day fought so valiantly, that he had three Horfes killed under him; but King Harold shewed no less valour in killing many Normans with his own hands: so as the fight continued doubtful along time, till at last, King Harold being struck into the brains with an Arrow, fell down dead: upon whose falling, a bafe Norman Souldier, cut off one of his Thighs, while he was yet breathing; which Duke William hearing, was so much offended, that he caused the Souldier to be disarmed, and with shame caftered. The body of King Harold, his Mother Thyra offered a great summe; to have it delivered to her; but the Duke out of the nobleness of his mind, would take no money; but delivered it freely, and then it was buried in Waltham Abbey; which himself had begun to build, at least, to repair. But here Gryaldus Cambrai-ensis tells us a strange story, that Harold was not slain in the Battel, but only wounded and lost his left eye, and then escaped by flight to Chester, where he afterwards led a holy Anchors life, in the Cell of St. James, falt by St. John's Church.

A s his Valour won him the Victory, so his Victory won him a Crown; that now of an old Duke, he was suddenly became a young King: and indeed, nothing so much rennes life, and makes the years in a manner young again, as addition of honour, especially when it is the fruit of merit. First therefore, having given publick thanks to God for his happy successes, he led his Army towards London, not the direct way (perhaps doubting of some new encounter) but coaing about through part of Kent, through Sussex, Surrey, Hampshire, and Berkshire, where at Wiltford he paffed over the Thames; and then through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, until he came to Berkamsfield, where there came unto him Alded Archbishop of York, Wolcen Bishop of Wescfet, Wil- fere Bishop of Hereford, and many other Prelates, accompanied with Edgar Atheling, with Earl Edwy and Marcher, Brothers, and men of the greatest force in the Kingdom, and others of his Nobility. It is true, upon the defeat at Hastings, Earl Edwy and Marcher, had a purpose to set up Edgar Atheling, as next Heir of the Royal blood; and Grandchild to Edward Ironside, and so beloved of the people, that he was called their Darling: but considering his young years, and other infirmities, but especially finding the minds of the Bishops, (who at that time bare all the way) to be other wife inclined, they desisted from that course; and thus the Duke without any opposition, coming to London, was received by Bishops and Lords, and all, with great joy, though small gladness: and if he had not their hearts, yet he had their knees, for in most humble manner they submitted themselves to him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign Lord; and upon Christma's day after, he was Crowned at Westminster by Alded Archbishop of York, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Stigand, not being admitted to do that office, for some defect in his Investiture; and perhaps for some asfersion in his manners.

Though he hath had the name of Conque- rour, yet he used not the Kingdom as gotten by Conquest; for he took no man living from himnor disposed of any of their goods, but each only, whose demerit made them unworthy to hold them; as appears by his Act to one Warren a Norman to whom he had given the Cattle of Sherborne in Norfolk. For when Sherborn, who was owner of it, acquainted the King, that the Cattle was his, and that he had never born Arms against him, he presently commanded Warren, to deliver it quietly up unto him. Only vacancies of Offices, and filling up the places of those who were dead or fale, were the present means he made use of, for preferring his Followers. One special preferment we cannot omit, that where one Heron a Noble man in Normandy, had married He with his conquest moderately. married his Mother Arlette, and had by her a Son named Hugh Lupus, he gave to the said Hugh, the Earldom of Chester, to hold of him as freely by his Sword, as himself held England by his Crown, by virtue of which Grant, the said Hugh ordained under him four Barons, Nigel, he made Baron of Halton, Maltbank, Baron of Naustwich: Eustace, Baron of Mansfield, and Vernon, Baron of Shipbrook: Such an honour, as no Subject before or since ever enjoyed the like. Also he gave to his Nephew Alan Earl of Britain, all the lands which sometimes belonged to Earl Edwin: and this Earl of Britain, the better to secure the Kings gift, built him a strong Castle near to his Mannor of Gillingham, and named it Richmond: from which Castle the Earls of Richmond bear their Titles of Honour.

What means he used for securing himself in the Kingdom.

Befides the Oath of Fealty, which he took of all his Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, at his Coronation; in Lent following going into Normandy, he took along with him the greatest part of the great men of the Kingdom, of whom Edwin and Marchar, the two Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, Edgar Atheling, Waltheoff Son to Syward formerly Earl of Northumberland, and Agelastus Abbate of Glastonbury, were the chief: leaving the care of the Kingdom in his absence to Ode, Bishop of Bayeux, his Brother by the Mother: and to William Fitz Osborne, whom he had made Earl of Hereford: and to abate the greatness of the Prelates, which at that time was grown in a manner unlimited, he ordained that from thenceforward they should not command with any Temporal Authority whatsoever. And because the common people are no less to be feared for their number, then the Nobility for their greatness, he first took from them all their Armour, to the end, that leaving them without arms, they might afterward be but Drons. And because there is feldom any danger from fingular numbers, but all the danger ariseth from plurality: therefore to prevent Conspiracies and Combinations, which are commonly contrived in the night, he commanded that in all Towns and Villages a Bell should be rung at eight a clock in the evening, and that in every house they should then put out their Fire and Lights (which was called Courre fen) and go to bed. And for more security he erected Castles in the most doubtful places of the Kingdom, one at York, another at Lincoln, a third at Nottingham, (at that time called Nottingham) and a fourth at Halsting, where he first landed. By these means the Kingdom was quiet all the time of his being away at Normandy, having only that Edric the Forester in the County of Hereford, calling into his aid the Kings of Wales, made some small disturbance. And indeed all the States of the Kingdom might in his very perfon finde something to make them apt to tolerate his Government. For first, the people might think themselves in a fort advanced, being now made members of a greater body; when the Dukeedom of Normandy should come to be annexe to the Kingdom of England; and by experience of his good Government being a Duke, they might well hope, he would not govern worse being made a King. And the Nobility might be well content, as having a King of their former Kings choosing; and though a stranger, yet no Alien, as having in him many veins of the same blood, and therefore likely also to have some veins of the same goodness of their good King Edward. But specially the Clergy could not chuse but be content, as having a King who came command to them, by a commanding as strong as a commanding, the Popes Benediction.

BUT the body of a State being more obnoxious to cruelties and ill humours, than the state of a Natural Body, it is impossible to continue long without diptemors; notwithstanding any prefervatives that can be applied. And therefore in the second year of his reign, brake forth the discontentment of Edgar Atheling, justly the first, as having most cause, being the next of the late Royal Blood, and therefore the most apt to be endar of servitude; who taking along with him his Mother Agatha, and his two Sisters, Margaret, and Christine, stole secretly away to Sea, with intention to pass into Hungary, the Country where he was born: but by contrary winds was cast upon the coasts of Scotland, where the King Malcolm, not only most kindly entertained him, but for a firther bond of kindnefts took his Sifer Margaret to wife, by whom he had many Children, out of which, in the feft Generation after, a match was found, by which in the perfon of King Henry the fcond, the Saxons and Normans blood were conjuned, the union whereof continues in the race of our Kings of England to this day. Not long after to Edgar in Scotland, came the two great Earls, Edwad and Marchar, brothers to Agatha the late King Harolds Wife; also Hereward, Gispatrick, and Syward, with many other Lords; and shortly after Stigand and Adred Archbishops, with divers of the Clergy. And thefe Lords being together in Scotland, did but watch opportunity, to recover that, which for want of taking opportunity they had loft: And affifted by the Scots, they invade the North parts, spoiling the Country, and killing many for the fault they had themselves committed, but all they could do, was but to forrage the Country, and fo return.

After this, in the third year of his Reign, the two fons of Swayne King of Denmark, Harold and Canute, with a fleet of 240 Ships, entered Humber, and invaded the North parts, with whom the English Lords in Scotland joined, and forraged all the Country, till they came near to York. When the Normans that were in the Town, to save the City, set fire on the Suburbs; but the fire not so contended, by affiftance of a violent wind, took hold of the City it self, burning a great part of it, and which perhaps was more worth then the City, a Library of excellent Books; and the Normans that were left in defence of the City, to the number of three thousand, were all slain. King William hear-hearing hereof was so much incensed, that with all speed he raised an Army, and entered Northumberland, wanting the Contryhe that already lay waste; and yet for all this great rage, was contented with a great sum of money, to purchase the Damet departure. By these devastations in many Shires of the Kingdom, but especially in Northumberland, so great a Disturbance was made, that the Downey, and doggs, cats, and rats, and what else is most abhorrent to nature, and between York and Durham, the space of 60 miles, for nine years together, there was so utter defolation, as that neither any house was left standing, nor any ground tilled. Many other insurrections there were in his Reign, as at Exeter, at Oxford, in the Isle of Ely, and many times by the Scots in the Northern parts. The most dangerous of all the Conspiracies, and most disquieted of him, were the King Fliz-Ambro, Earl of Hereford, Ralph Warber Earl of Norfolk, and Suffolk, Walbeff Earl of Northumberland, with Preface Earl of Boheme, (lent purposely, as it was thought, by the King of France into England, to incite and join with the Conspirators.) Ralph Warber married the Sister of Roger the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the express commandment of King William; at the felonization of the same, the sees Lords confpire to keep the King now in Normandy, and dispoife him of his Sovereignty, which to perform, they agreed to join theirs with the Downey Forces, whom they intended to call in. This was the most dangerous combination of all, it happening when he was out of England, at the siege of Dover, a Caval in Britain belonging to Ralph Warber, and defended against him by the King of France; and at such a time as almost all Christendom had declared their jealousies of him, and ill affectations towards him. The King of Scotland, and Princes of Wales ready to affit the Rebels at home; Swayne King of Denmark invading England with a Navy of 200. sail, to which Drone King of Ireland added 65. Ships. How much such an action did disturb and offend him, may be conjectured, by that most of these great Noblemen were either his Kinfmen, or in affinity nearly allied to him: But William's forces secure him as well at home against Traitors, as in the field against his Enemies. This grand conspiracy is discovered by Walbeff to Lamfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, who per- swades the Earl to go over to King William, and inform him in what danger he was. Notwithstanding this discovery, Roger and Ralph perlift in their intentions, raise Forces to prosecute their designs: but by the diligence of Odo the King's Brother, Bishop of Bayeux, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Abbot of Evesham, were fo prevented, that they could never unite their forces. Ralph flies into France, Roger Earl of Hereford is taken, put in prifon, and as some report, to death; Walbeff, of all lamened, behead: But all these were eaily suppress'd, for they were but scatter'd Forces, Et duas flagit paginae seta tur, vincentur; whereas if they had united themselves into an Army, they might perhaps have made it a War, which now were little more then Routs and Killoes. Yet some write, that King William granted Cumberland to Malcolm King of Scots, to hold from him conditionally, that the Scots should not attempt any thing prejudicial to the Crown of England; for which grant King Malcolm did him homage.

The greatest and lait was an Insurrection raised in Northumberland, by his Son Robert, the more dangerous because unnatural; for by the instigation and affiance of Philip King of France, (emulous now of King William's great concessions to England) he entered Normandy, and claimed it as in his own right. His Father indeed had made him a promise of it long before, but Robert impatient of delay, as counting so long staying to be little better then disheartening endeavoured by strong hand to wrest it from his Father. But his Father King William hearing hereof, with a strong Army palfeth over into Normandy, where in a Batel meeting hand to hand with his Son, he was by him unhors'd, and hurst in the arm: but his Son perceiving him by his voice to be his Father, suddenly leapes off his horse, takes up his Father, calls himself down at his tear, and humbly intreats his pardon; which as a Father be cailly grants, embraces his Son: and ever after, the Son from the Father had fatherly love, and the Father from the Son a filial obedience. But though his Father did thus pardon him, yet it seems there is a Nemesis, or to say better, a Divine Providence, that great mutable pardon him; for after this, it is observed he never prosper'd in any thing he undertook. It cannot perhaps be discovered, whether the Kings severity begot his Subjects Insurrections; or his Subjects Insurrections the Kings Severity: but which of them sooner was the mother, it is certain they were Nurses each of them to other. Yet after this, King William so far trusted his Son Robert, that he sent him with an Army against Malcolm King of Scotland, who had invaded Northumberland: but at the commend; of Duke Robert retirer. At which time Duke Robert began the foundation of a Castle upon the River of Tyne; whereof the Town of NEWcastle did after take both beginning and name, which before this time was called Monroe. In his twentijth year in Whitsun-week, he honoured his Son Henry, with the order of Knighthood, wherein what Ceremony he us'd, it is not certainly known: but it is worth observing, that before his time, the custom among the Saxons was first, he who should receive the order of Knighthood, confessed himself in the evening to a Priest; then he continued all that night in the Church, watching and applying himself to his private devotions: The next morning, he heard Mafs, and offer'd his Sword upon the Altar. After the Gospel was read, the Sword was hallowed, and with a benediction put about his neck. Lastly, He communicated the Mysteries of the blessed Body of Christ; and from that time, remained a perfect Knight. But this custom of confecrating Knights, the Normans abhorred.

Certainly there is no such goodness of nature, as spares to be reconcili'd; of which verum it seems King William had a large pro-

In the thirteenth year of his Reign, he subdued Wales, and made it tributary to him, as before in the seventh year of his Reign, he brought Malcolm King of Scotts to do him Homage, and thereupon to give him hostages; that England made him greater then he was before, a King of a Duke; he no les made England greater then it was before, three Kingdoms in one.

As his Taxes were many in number, so they were various in kind, not always bringing in money directly, but sometimes obliquely having it: The first Tax he laid upon his Subjects was in the first year of his Reign, after his return out of Normandy; a grievous Tax all Writers say, but none what it was. In the third year of his Reign he ranfacked all Monasteries, and all the Gold and Silver of either Chalices or Shrines, he took to his own use. Moreover, whereas many of the more principal, and richer persons of the Realm, fearing King William's cruelty, and infaustible desire of moneys, depoited their Tresurers, Jewels, and chiefest commodities, in the Monasteries and Abbeys, as in firm Sanctuaries to be safely kept for their owne use, the King violently seiz'd on all for himself, neither regarding the sanctity of the places, nor what injustice he did to his own Subjects, but as a Conquering Tyrant made their poverty his own security. Likewise he seiz'd all Bishops and Abbots what number of Souldiers they should find to serve him in his Wars; also the Frangers which he maintained in Pay, he dispers'd into Religious houses, and some also among the Nobility to be maintained at their charge. Many other Taxations he made, but laft of all in the eighteenth year of his Reign, by the advice of Roger Earl of Hereford, he cauf'd the whole Realm to be describ'd in a Centennial Roll (whereof he took a Precedent from King Alfred) so as there was not one Hyde of Land, but both the yearly rent, and the owner there-of was therein fet down: How many Plough- lands, what Patumes, Pens or Marishes, what Woods, Parks, and Tencements were in every Shire, and what every one was worth: Also how many Yeomen every man had, what every one had, what Cartel, what Fees, what other goods, what rent or commodity his Possessions did yield. This Book was call'd the Roll of Winton, because it was kept in the City of Winchester. By the English it was call'd Doom-day book, either by the reason of the generality thereof, or else corruptly, in stead of Donnus Dei book, for that it was laid in the Church of Winchester, in a place call'd Donnus Dei. According to this Roll Taxations were imposed, sometimes two shillings, and at this time six shillings upon every Hyde of Land, (a Hyde containing, as some account it, twenty Acres, but as Master Lambert proveth, a hundred Acres.) In all those Lands which he gave to any man, he reserv'd Dominions in chief to himself, as also a yearly rent, and likewise a Fine whenever the Tenants did alien or die. Thereof were bound to him by Oath of Fealty and Homage, and if any died, his heir being within age, the King received the profits of his Lands, and had the custody and disposing of the heirs body, until higeh of one and twenty years. To be short, his greediness of money, was so great, that he feared not his own Brother Odo, but found accusations against him, to the end he might seifie upon his Treasure, which was infinite great, and which he had gather'd in hope to buy the Papacy. Only one kind of profit he forbore to meddle with, that is, Vacancies of Abbeys and Bisbishops; which he al- ways reserv'd for the Successors; but then he took another course of far greater profit, for he compell'd all men to make new Fines at his pleasure, for confirmation of any Grant or priviledges formerly granted by any Prince of the Realm; by which device he got into his possession the greatest part of all the riches of the Land, as well of the Clergy, as of the Laity. And one particular may not be omitted that is reported of him, which was this: The Monks of Ely, to purchase their peace, agreed to give him seven hundred Marks, when coming to pay it, there was want of a great in the weights (for in those days greater sums were not paid by tale, but by weight) which the King understanding, delayed them all composition for Peace, until with much fust he was intreted to accept of a thousand Marks more.

Of his Laws and Ordinances, and Courts of Justice creat'd by him.

Although at his Coronation he had taken an Oath to observe the Laws of King Edward then in use, yet afterwards (perhaps counting his Coronation Oath but a matter of course) he abrogated many, and in their stead brought in the Laws of Normandy, commanding them to be for a great weight wanting, thousand marks exc- elled.

For a great weight wanting, thousand marks excelled.

He brings the: Laws of Normandy and consisteth them to be written in French.
he be written in French; and also that all Causes should be pleaded, and all matters of Forms dispatched in French; upon a pretence to distinguish the French tongue, but with a purpose to imprison men through ignorance of the language, as indeed it did: or perhaps to make the Norman language predominant in the Kingdom as he had made their persons: which yet was so far from effecting, that there is not so much as any footsteps remaining of the Norman language in the English tongue. Forms of Judgement, and trials by Fire and water, called the Fire and Water Law, were in force when the Conquest dissolved, and in the end utterly abrogated by the Pope, as derived from Paganism. That of Combat continued longer, but of no ordinary use: and all actions both criminal and real, began now to be wholly adjudged by the Verdict of twelve men, according to the custome of Normandy, where the like form is used, and called by the name of Enquet, with the fame caution for the Jurors, as it is here continued to this day; Though by the Laws of EiBfeld it appears, that the trial by twelve men was in use long before his time. And where before the Bishop and the Aldermen were the absolute Judges to determine all busines in every Shire, and the Bishop, in many Cases shared in the benefit of the Malters with the King, now he confined the Clergy within the province of their own Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, to deal only in matters concerning rule of souls, according to the Canons, and Laws Episcopal. And where the Cautes of the Kingdom were before determined in every Shire, and by a Law of King Edward, all matters in question were upon special penalty decided in their Gnome, or Convocation held monely in every Hundred: now he ordained that four times in the year, for certain daies, the same busines should be determined in such places as he would appoint, where he continued Judges to attend for that purpose. Also he decreed there should be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Judges of Peace for punishment of Malefactors. Finally, he ordained his Council of State, his Chancery, his Exchequer, (Scaccarium, corruptly called fo, of the word Statuarius, or rather of the board or Table; where the Officers sat;) also his Courts of Justice, which always removed with his Court. These places lie furnished with Officers, and allowed four Terms in the years for determining cases, as he appointed; and the place of these Courts was Westminster, where King William Rufus afterwards built a faire Palace. Now for his Provisonary Revenue, the Kings Tenants, who held Lands of the Crown, paid him no money at all, but only Corn and other Virchures; and a just more of the quality and quantity of every mans ratement, was taken throughout all the Shires of the Kingdom, and levied every daier, for maintenance of the Kings house. Only the Kentish men procured the continuance of their ancient Laws by a trick; for King William riding towards Dover, at Swanfood, two miles from Gravesend, the Kentish men methyl, but in the form of moving a Wood, by reason of the great boughs they had cut, and carried in their hands, and compelling the King about, they only made suit for the continuance of their Laws, and Customs; of which one special was, that the Tenure of their Lands was Greatkind; by which they descended not to the eldest alone, as in other Countries, but were partible between all the Sons: and the Privileges which the owners of such Lands enjoyed were chiefly these: Not to forfeit them for Felony: Not to be subject to services before the Justices: Not to be challenged for Villains. So the Conqueror considering, that he might as well allow them, as his other Kings had done before him, easily condescended to their request, and did see the levity of thefe Kentish men, so hazard themselves more for the preferring a simple Custom; then for preferring the Liberty of themselves, and their Country: But such is the violence of conceit, till it be mated by time, or rather so very a Changeling is Humane Reason, that what they cut down great Woods to defend, they have since been content to see abolished, without cutting down so much as a twig. But one Law especially he made, extremely disaffected to all the Gentry of the Land, for where before they might at their pleasure hunt, and take Deer which they found abroad in the Woods; now it was ordained under a great penalty, no leas then putting out their eyes, that none shold presume to kill, or take any of them, as referring them only for his own delight. And indeed so great delight he took in that kind of sport, that he depopulated a great part of Hampshire, the space of thirty miles, where there had been (Bifhops Caftes) six and twenty Towns, and four-foe Religious Houles, and made it a habituation for such kind of Beasts: which was then, and to this day is called the New Forre. But the lamentable disafters that have happened to this Kings issue, do plainly shew, that there is Power, that observes all our Actions, and which we may know to be Materm Fandiique Ne- fandi. But in the first year of this Kings Reign, he granted to the City of London, their first Charter and Liberties, in as large for a, as they enjoyed them in the time of King Edward the Confeffor, which he granted at the fun of William a Norman, Bishop of London; in gratefull remembrance whereof, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, upon the solemn daies of their re- port to Pani, do still use to walk to the Grave- Rone, where this Bifhop lies interred. Also this King was the first, that brought the Jews to inhabit here in England: as likewise he made a Law, that whosoever forced a woman should lose his Genitals; and in his time, a Baoe came first into use in England, which as they were the weapons with which France under this King conquered England: so that the weapons of which England under After-Kings, conquered France as it were not enough for us to bear them, if we did not beat them with their own weapons. This King also appointed a Confable of Dover Castle, and a Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, with Immunities, as they are at this day. And to be short, this King ordained fro good Laws, and had them so well executed; that it is said a girl might carry a bag of Money all the Country over without danger of robbing; and in his time, the feting Seals to Bonds and Writings was first n the Church in his Reign.

I n his time, Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was for divers causes deprived of his dignity, and kept private all his life after in the Castle of Winchester: after whom succeeded Lan franc, an Italian, in that see: who in the twelfth year of this Kings Reign, held a Synod at London: there among other things he removed the Bishops Seats from small Towns to great Cities, as from Slinnary to Cheafier; from Kyreton to Exeter; from Warwife to Bathes: from Shirley to Salisbury; from Darcher to Lincoln: and from Leichfield to Chester, and from thence again to Coventry: and not long before, the Bishoprick of Lindsifern, otherwise called Holy Land, upon the River Tweed, had been tranflated to Durham. In the fifth year of his reign, a controversy arizing between the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, they appealed to Rome, and the Pope remitted it to the King and Bishops of England. Here upon a Synod is holden at Windsor, where sentence was given on Lanfranc's, then Archbishop of Canterbury: side: That in matters of Religion, the Archbishop of York, should ever be subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury: Only at Rome it was decreed, for matter of Title, that the See of York should be flyed; Prima Anglia; and the See of Canterbury, Prima tertia Anglia, as it is at this day. And as the Archbishop of York oweth obedience to the Archbishop of Canterbury; so all the Bishops of Scotland owe obedience to the Archbishop of York, as to the priuate of Scotland. It shall not be amiss here to write the journey of Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury to Rome: who in the fifth year of King William's Reign made Bishop of Canterbury, went to Rome to obtain the Pall, due to Archbishops, taking for his companions Thomas Archbishop of York, and Remigius Bishop of Lincoln; arrived at Rome, and admitted to the Popes presence, Pope Alexander stole from his feast, and generally fatiating him, with all this, This honour I do not give, as due to your Archibishop, but as due to my Master; to whose labour I must acknowledge to be due what learning I have. The next day having audience he accused the two companions of his journey. But as this King took down the Prelates in Temporalities, for he ordained they should exercise no Temporal Authority at all: so in Spirituallities, he rather raised them, as may be seen by a passage between Aldred Archbishop of York and the King; at that time, upon the repulse of a certain trait, the Archbishop in great discontentment offered to depart, when the King in awe of his displeasure, stayed him, fell down at his feet, deified pardon, and promised to grant his suit. The King all this while being down at the Archbishops feet, the Nobleman that were present, put him in minde that he should cause the King to rise: Nay (faith the Archibishop) let him alone, let him finde what is to anger Saint Peter. And as by this story we fee the infuling pride of a Prelate in those days, so by another, we may see the equivoquing fall시hood of a Prelate at that time; For Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury would often Iweary, he had not one penny upon the Earth, when under the Earth it was afterwards found he had hidden great Treasure. Also it is memorable, but scarce credible of another Bishop, who being accused of Simony, and denying it, the Cardinal before whom he was to answer, told him that a Bishoprick was the gift of the Holy Ghost, and therefore to buy a Bishoprick, was against the Holy Ghost, and thereupon bid him say, Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost: which the Bishop beginning, and oft affaying, could never say [and to the Holy Ghost] but said it plainly when he was put out of his Bishoprick. And yet was not the Church in that age so barren of vertue, but that it afforded some good Bishops, as William Bishop of Durham, Founder of University-Colledge in Oxford, but especially Bishop Wulfon: whom upon Lanfranc's reporting to be insufficient for the place, for want of Learning, the King commanded to put off his Pontificall Robes, and to leave his Bishoprick: when suddenly out of a divine Insipiration, Wulfon answered, A better then you, O King, beatlowed these Robes upon me, and to him I will restore them. And thereupon going to St. Edward's Shrine, who had made him a Bishop, and putting off his Robes, he struck his Staff, upon St. Edward's Monument, which stuck so fast in the stone of it, that by no strength it could be drawn forth, till he drew it forth himself: which so terrifi ced both Lanfranc and the King, that they interceded him to take his Robes again, and keep this Bishoprick. Also Osuald Bishop of Salisbury, who devised a form of Prayers to be daily used in his Church, and was used afterwards in other Churches, from whence proceeded the common saying of Secondo nmium Sarum. In this Kings time was Bereangarius, who denied the true body of Christ to be in the Sacrament: Also in his time, Pope Gregory the seventh, removed married Prelats from executing Divine Service, whereof great troubles arose in England: also in his time was instituted the Feast of the conception of the Virgin Mary: also in his time, Pope Gregory the seventh, in a Synod held in Rome, ordained that none should be called Pope but only the Bishop of Rome, where before all Bishops were called Popes.

Works of Ditty, by him and others, in his time.

His King founded the Abbey of Bathel in Saffex, where he overcame Harold, as a monument in memory of his Victory; but there succeeded a greater monument in memory of this Battel, if it be true which Newbrigus faith, that after every small rain, the Grass where the Battel was fought, shews to be of the colour of blood, and had continued to do so, to his dayes, who lived in the time of King Stephen, almost an hundred years after the Battel was fought. The Abbey of Sele in Yorkshire; and a third near London, called St. Saviours. He founded founded also the Priory of St. Nicholas at Exeter; and gave great privileges to St. Martin's le Grand in London; which Church was founded before the Conquest, by Inglodinus and Ermardus his Brother, Counsins to King Edward the Confessor. He also builded the Tower of London: namely the great white and square Tower there. These were this King's works of Pride in England; but in Normandy he founded also an Abbey at Caen, where his Wife Matilda built also a Monastery of Nuns. He gave also to the Church of St. Stephens in Caen, two Manors in Devonshire, one Manor in Devonshire, another in Essex, much land in Berkshire, some in Norfolk, a Manor in Woodstreet, London, with many Advowsons of Churches; and even he gave his Crown and Regal Ornaments to the said Church, being of his own Foundation; for the redemption whereof, his Son Henry gave the Manor of Blythstein in Devonshire. In this King's time the Bishops, Sainte, Hildesde and Luce, founded the Priory of Newfiead: Henry Earl Ferrers founded a Priory within his Castle at Taunton; Alwyn Childe, a Citizen of London, founded the Monastery of St. Simons at Bermondssey, in Southwark, and gave the Monks there divers Rents in London: Also in this Kings time, Maurice Bishop of London, after the firing of the former Church of St. Paul in London, began the Foundation of the New Church, a work to admirable, that many thought it would never have been finished. Towards the building of the East end whereof, the King gave the choicest Mones of his Castle at the West end of the City, upon the bank of the River Thames: which Castle having been at that time fired; in place thereof Edward Klawery Archibishop of Canterbury, did afterwards found a Monastery of Blackfriers. The King also gave the Manor of Stowe, to the same Maurice, and made his Son, to his Successors in that See; after whose decease, Richard, his next Successor bestowed all the Rests of his Bishopric to advance the building of this Church, maintaining himself by his private Patrimony: and yet all he could do, made no great Fiew, but the finishing of the work was left to many other succeeding Bishops. In the fifteenth year of this Kings reign, William Bishop of Durham, founded University-College in Oxford; Also one Gillers a Norman Lord, founded the Abbey of Merton in Surrey, seven miles from London: and Thomas Archibishop of York, first builded the Minster of York. In this Kings sixteenth year, his Brother Duke Robert being sent against the Scots, builded a Fort, where at this day standeth New Castle upon Tyne: but the Town and Walls were builded afterward by King John. Also in this Kings time Lede Castle in Kent was builded by Croceken, and the Castle of Oxford, by Robert d' Onyor: two Noblemen that came into England with him. Of which Bishop of Suffolk builded the new Church there: Also Henry Earl of Shrewsbury, builded two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury; and another at Wenlock.

The Life and Reign of William the First. 29

Gate to the East Gate, it consumed Houses and Churches all the way, and amongst the rest the Church of St. Paul, the most grievous fire that ever happened in that City. Also this year, by reason of disinformation of weather, Thunders and Lightnings, by which many men perished, there infused a Famine, and afterwards a miserable mortality of Men and Cartel, and which is very strange, Hans, Peacocks, Geese, and Ducks bred in, and accustomed to houses, fortook their wonted hives, and turned wild. (Math. Woffmnn, Anno Dom. 1067.) Also this year in the Province of Wales, upon the Sea-shore, was found the body of Gwenfrith's Son to Arthur, the great King of the Britains, reported to be fourteen foot in length. Also in this Kings time, a great Lord fitting at a Feaft, was set upon by Mice; and though he were remved from Land to Sea, and from Sea again to Land; yet the Mice still followed him, and at last devoured him.

He had to Wife, and her only, Matilda, or Maud, Daughter to Baldwin Earl of Flanders. Shew was Crowned Queen of England, the second year of his reign: the seventeenth year of his reign she died. A Woman only memorable for this, that nothing memorable is recorded of her, but that she built a Nunnery at Caen in Normandy, where the less buried. By her had four Sons and five Daughters. His Sons were, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry: of whom Robert the eldest called Court-caye of his short Thighs, or Court-hose, of his short Breeches, or Courtois, of his courteous behavior, (for so many are the comments upon his name) succeeded his Father in the Ditchy of Normandy. Richard his second Son was kill'd by his own son, hunting in the New Forest. William his third Son, called Rufus, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England. Henry his youngest son, called Beauclerk for his learning, had by his Fathers will five thousand pounds in money, and the Inheritance also of his Mother: His Daughters were Cicelie, Constance, Adela, Margaret, and Eleanor, of whom Cicelie was Abbess of Caen in Normandy, Constance was married to Alan Earl of Brittain, Adela to Stephen Earl of Blois, Margaret affinanced to Harold King of England; but never married, and died young. Eleanor betrothed to Achmed, King of Galilea, but desiring to die a Virgin, she had her wife, spending her time so much in Prayer, that with continual kneeling her knees were brawned.

He was but mean of stature, yet big of body, and therewith so strong, that few were able to draw his Bow; growing in years he was bold before; his beard was always shaven, after the manner of the Normans; and in his younger time, he was much given to that infirmity of Youth, which grows out of strength of Youth, Incontinency. After he was once married, whether out of facy, or out of Grace, he was never known to offend in that kind. Of
for his Arms, he gave three Lions passant Gold in a Field Gules; which have ever since been used as peculiar to the Crown of England; to which three Flore de Lys were added by King Edward the Third, by reason of his claim to the Crown of France.

His Death and Burial.

Towards the end of his Reign, he appoint for his health, that he was never sick, till that sickness whereby he died. Of a stern countenance, yet of an affable nature: In War as expert as valiant: In Peace, as Provost as prudent: and in all his Enterprizes as fortunate, as bold and hardy. Much given to Hunting and Feasting, where he was no less pleasent than magnificent. He made no great proficiency in learning, as having had his Education in the licentiousnes of the French Court; yet he favoured learned men, and drew out of Italy, Langfrank, Anselm, Durand, Turborne, and divers others, famous at that time for Learning and great Piety. Very devout he was, and always held the Clergy in exceeding great Reverence. And this is one special honour attributed unto him, that from him we begin the Computation of our Kings of England.

His Places of Residence.

HIS Christmas he commonly kept at Glocester, his Ester at Winchester, and his Whitfastitl at Westminster, and once in the year at one of these places would be new Crowned; as though by often putting on his Crown, he thought to make it fit the faster upon his head. And for the houses which the Kings of England had in those days in London; I find that at Westminster was a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England, from the time of Edward the Confessor; which in the Reign of King Henry the Eight, was by casual fire burnt down to the ground. A very large and stately Palace this was, and in that Age, for building, incomparable. The Remains whereof are the Chamber of assembling the High Court of Parliament, and the next unto it; wherein anciently they were wont to begin the Parliament, called St. Edward's Painted Chamber, because the Tradition holdeth, that the said King Edward died in it. Adjoining to this, is the White-hall, wherein at this day the Court of Requiets is kept: Beneath this, is the Great Hall, where Courts of Justice are now kept: This Hall which we now have, was built by King Richard the second, out of the ground; as appeared by his Arms engraved in the stone work: (when he had plucked down the old Hall, built before by William Rufus) and made it his own habitation. But the aforesaid Palace, after it was burnt down in Anno 1512. lay desolate, and King Henry the Eight shortly, after translated the Kings seat, to a house not far off, built by Cardinal Wolsey, and is called White-hall. The Tower of London was anciently used by the Kings of England to lodge in. Other houses they anciently had; one where Bridewell now standeth, out of the ruins whereof, the now Bridewell was built. Another called the Tower Royal, now the Kings Wardrobe. Another in Bucklersbury, called Sermon Tower. Another where the now Popes-head Tavern is, once against the Old Exchange, thought to have been the Kings House; also another in LimeStreet, called the Kings Articke. Also another in the Old Jury; and oft-times they made use of Baynard's Castle. But these are all long since demolished, that we may see Palaces and Places have their fates and periods as well as men. And as the Knight rising the next morning, looked out; but could see nothing: whereupon, he blamed his spirit Orthon, for not keeping his word with him. Orthon answered, he had kept his promise: for both he, by the gentleman's own words, was to have the first view of the thing; and in doing the task, he had not been forgetful of him. Then the Knight, beholding himself, remembered he had seen two straw tops upon the ground, rumbling upon one another: Why (said Orthon) that was. Then the Knight desired he might see him in such a shape, as that he might take notice of him. Well, then, said Orthon, to morrow morning when you rise, the first thing you see they shall be. So the next morning, the Knight rising, and looking out of his Chamber Window, the first thing he saw was a Sow, so lean and deformed, that he could not abide to see it: and therefore, he caused his men to set Dogs upon it, to drive it away; which being done, the Sow vanish ed away; after this his spirit Orthon never came to him any more. And this relation Froif- fard had from the Knights own mouth: and by such a like means, it might perhaps be, that the death of King William was known at Rome, the very day he died, or, though a thousand miles aunder. And now to go on with the story: William the Conqueror in all the time of his life, that returned to the very last his memo ried speech; and shewed many demonstra tions of his Devotion, and true conversion, espe cially for his fervency, used towards the English. And thus he who was a Conqueror of men, was conquered himself by death, the ninth day of September, when he had reigned twenty years, and near eleven months, in the three score and fourth year of his age: Malmes bury, faith in the fifty ninth. I may well say he was conquered by death, seeing death ufed him more delightfully, than ever he living ufed any whom he had conquered: For no sooner was the breath out of his body, but his attendants, purloning what they could lay hands on, for took him and fled, leaving his body almo st naked upon the ground. Afterwards, Willi am, Archbishop of Rome, commanded his body should be conveyed to Caen, but his command was lit tle regarded: till at last, one Herveyng, a Coun try Knight, at his own charges caited his body to be Embalmed, and conveyed thither; where the Abby and Monks meeting the corps, suddenly in the midst of their solemnities, a violent fire brake out in the Town, with the fright whereof, every man left the place; and this was his body the second time left forlorn. In the end a few Monks returned, and accom panied the Herse to the Abbey Church; but when the Divine Office was ended, and the body ready to be laid in the Grave, one Astin Fitz Arthur, stood up and claimed that ground to have been the Floor of his Fathers house, which King William had violently wrested from him, and therupon charged them, as they would answer it before the dreadful face of God, not to cover his Body with the earth of his Inheritance. Whereupon after some pause, agreement was made with him, and three pound was paid in hand for the ground broken up, and an hundred pounds more afterwards for the ground it fell, paid him by Henry, the Kings youngest Son, who only of all his Sons was present at the Funeral. And yet this was not all, but when his body was to be put in the earth, it happened that the Sepulchre of Rome which stood within the Grave, was broken somewhat too far for his fat belly, so as they were fain to press it down with some violence, with which, whether his bowels burst, or whether some Excrements were forced out of their natural passage, such an intolerable stink proceeded from him, that none were able to incline it, but made all the haste they could to be gone. And yet neither was this the last of his miseries, for in the year 1563, when Cavillifon took the City of Caen, certain dissolutive Souldiers opened his Tomb, and not finding the Treasure he expected, threw forth his bones with great detestation, whereof some were afterwards brought into England. So that if we consider his many troubles in life, and after his death we may well think, that notwithstanding all his greatness, every mean man would hardly he persuaded to change fortunes with him. He bare the fame Arms peculiar to the Crown of England; which all succeeding Princes have used: namely, Three Lions parted Gold in a Field Gules: for as for the three Flower de Luce, they were added by King Edward the third, upon his claim of the Crown of France.

Men of Note in his time.

Men of Learning in his time, were but rare in this Island, yet some there were, particularly Mariana Scotus, a Histo riographer, and Alphredus a Monk of Beverley, whose writing also of Historical Argument. And as for the men of Valour, they are not to be expected in a time of servitude, but as if all the English valour were now remaining in the Kent men, they only made relish, when all other Countries had submitted. Yet it is memorable in this time, what a private Norwegian Souldier did, who himself alone upon a Bridge, reftified the whole Army of the England, blew forty of them, and maintained the place for divers hours together, till one getting under the bridge, found means to thrust up a Spear into his body and killed him.

KING WILLIAM
THE SECOND.

WILLIAM the second, called Rufus, second Son to William the Conqueror, appointed Successor for by his Fathers Will; was upon the fifth of October, in the year 1087, by Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, Crowned at Westminster King of England. Wherein his Father seems to have followed the example of Jacob, who gave to his younger Son Joseph, the Land which he had taken with his Sword and his Bow: for with his Sword and his Bow, had King William gotten the Land of England; and therefore might justly be thought on which of his Sons he pleased. And besides, there was cause enough, why he should shew this Son of his some extraordinary favours, seeing in the Rebellion of his Brother Robert, Yet he stood firmly for his Father; and in his quarrel incurred no small hazard of his life, as wherein he received divers wounds; and perhaps aby, his Father thought the rough disposition of this Son, fitter to braid the insurrections of the English, than the softly disposition of his Son Robert.

But though he have thus quietly gotten the Crown, he must not look to keep it so; and indeed at his very beginning is assaulted with two troubles in one: for both his Brother Robert prepares to recover it from him, and the Lords of the Kingdom combine with Robert to affit him in it. The first mover of this trouble was Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Uncle, who finding himself not to bear the sway he expected, and specially for anold grudge he bore to Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, and by whose means, in the former Kings time he had been imprisoned, the Archbishop telling him, that though he might not imprison a Bishop, yet he might imprison an Earl of Kent (as this Odo was made not long before) he draws many other Bishops and Temporal Lords to join with him, in half of Duke Robert against the Kings but though the storm were violent for a while, yet it soon past over that indeed of his Lords, with more difficulty: but that of his Brother Robert with more cost: for it was at last agreed, that Rufus should pay him three thousand marks a year, during his life, and leave him the Kingdom after his own decease. But there was difficulty in repelling his Rebel Lords by reason of their spreading themselves abroad in many quarters. For Odo fortified himself in Kent, Roger Mountgomeri, Earl of Shrewsbury, in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire; Hugh de Grandman, in Leicestershire, and Northamptonshire; Robert Moubray Earl of Northumberlad, possifeth himself of Bifbop; William Bishop of Durham, of the North parts of the Realm; and divers other of the Clergy, and Nobility, fortifie themselves in Herefordshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and all the Countreys adjoining to Wales, thinking by this means to draw from the King that he should not know where to begin, nor whither to turn him. But this course, as it made it hard to repel them suddenly, so it made it easy to repel them at leisure; for being thus divided, they were but as fingle sticks, that are easily broken; where if they had united themselves, as into a Faggot, they might have made a strength of far greater reliquence. But the King having Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Bishop of Worcestershire, firm of his fide: partly by their Authority and love amongst the people; but chiefly by his own promises, to restore their ancient Laws, and to allow them liberty of hunting in his Forests, he so firmly won the hearts of all unto him; that some of the Rebel Lords he reconciled with fair words: as Robert Montgomery, a principal fiew of the Faction, some again he maftered by strong hand; and Odo the chief Engineer of all the work, he besieged in the Castle of Rochester, took him Prisoner, and forced him to abjure the Realm. And thus this great Rebellion was suppreffed: In which it is observable, that though so many hot bloods were up, yet there was but little blood Spilt. A happy rebellion for the English; for the Rebel Lords and Bishops being all Normans, the King had none to truft to, but the Englishmen, whom for their faithfulness to him in this service, he ever after repefted more then he had done before.

This year died Lanfranc, after he had been Archbishop of Canterbury eighteen years, who had brought the Monks to some good order, that before his time followed hunting and hawking, dicing and carding, to the great difcredit of their profession. After this storm was over in the South, there ariseth another in the North; For now Malcolm King of Scots, thinking it a fit time to do some feats when King William was troubled at home, invades Northumberland, and having burnt and spoiled the Country, returns home laden with booties: Which King William hearing, he takes his brother Robert along with him, and with a mighty Army enters Scotland, brings Malcolm to acknowledge his ancient homage: and upon Faith given, returns to London. After this, Duke Robert finding his brother King William not to keep his promise, in paying his Pension, complains to the King of France, and with his aid, aid, affaults and take some Towns, which he be fore had delivered in pawn for money to his brother King William; who hearing of it, ha sten to Normandy with an Arm; and by the mediation of money takes off the King of France, and makes his brother, being left deli tute of affiance, to ask him pardon; a wise and merciful course in King William; for to buy his peace with the King of France, did cost him but money, where to have purchased it by War, and tes besides money, have cost the lives of many.

After this Malcolm, King of Scots, came in kindness to visit King William at Glastonbury; but the King not vouchsafing to meet him, for him, pred him into great indignation, that turnun ing home, he makes ready an Army, invites Newkirk and land, making great spoil, and getting great spoils, but by Robert Monmouth, the King Lieutenant there, was taken in ambush, and to together with his chief Son Edward, defeated and slain. This King Malcolm was a most valiant Prince, as may appear by an Act of his of an extraordinary strain; for hearing of a conspiracy plotted to murther him, whereof one was An twice, whose name is not recorded, he dissembled the knowing of it, till being abroad one day a hunting, he took the fellow apart from the com pany, and being alone, said unto him: Here now is a first time and place, to do that manfully, which you have intended to do treacherously; draw your weapon, and if you kill me, none being present, you can inore no danger; with which speech of the King, the fellow was so tound that he fell down at his feet, confessed his fault, humbly asked forgiveness, and being granted him, was ever after servicable and faithful to him. The death of King Malcolm and his Son, was formidable, and so grievously taken of Margaret his Queen, the Sifter of Edgar A sheiling, that she made it her Prayer, and had it granted, not to over-live them, and so within three days after died. Awoman as full of ve Veres all her lives at this time of sorrow, whom yet I should not break order to mention, but one Pious Act of hers, in causing a most barba rous cutome of Scotland to be abrogated, that when a man married, his Lord should tie the first night with his Bride. Which cutome by her endeavour was altered to a payment in money.

After these troubles were ended in the North, a new struggle ariseth in the West; for now the Wlih men hearing of King William's distrac tion, center upon the English borders, making spoil and havoc of men and Towns whom King William went with an Army to encounter, but could do no good upon them, till he was fain to re volve to London, and provide him a stronger Arm. A bout this time also Robert Monmouth Earl of Nor thumberland, by whom Malcolm King of Scots was in King William's service, and being, on finding his service not rewarded as he expected, nters into conspiracy against the King; but the King being informed of the practice, fetheth sud itly upon many of his Complices; and himself, af her many devices and flights for flight, is taken and put in Prison, in the Castle of Windsor. Af this, King William to take a further revenge of the West, and so make an absolute conquest of that unquiet people, with a far greater Army than ever before, enters Wales, and thinks with new device of Castles and Forts, utterly to subdue them, but they defending themselves, with their Wood and Mountains, pausing, tire and weary out the King and his Army, so as he leaves the business to two Hughis, the Earl of Saltp, the other of docher, who first invaded and took Anglesey, (their Island of refuge) where they u all sorts of cruelty, pulling out of eyes, and cutting off hands and limes; in prosecuting of which business, Hugh Earl of Saltp was slane, Hugh Earl of Chester, entered Wales, and in the end the laughter of Rufus, the last King of England, was an absolute conquest of the West. For after this, when they had often re beled, yet they were in a true subjection. And these for the most part, were all the troubles of his reign, where we may observe, that none of them did overtake him, but still he met them and from nine of them he was dislodged, but was still the purer, and yet so firmly as might well have taken away the comfort of a Crown, and have made him willing to change his Diadem for a pair of Beads: but that ambition, though someti weary, yet never tires.

His Excellences and Courtesies for raising of Money.

In the second year of his Reign, Lanfranc, the Archbiscop of Canterbury dyed, who had kept the Kingdom and King in good order; but soon as he was dead, the King, as though he were then got loose, ranged without reins, in all licentiousness, preying especially upon the Clergy, as amongst whom he found the rich Burseys. When Bisnopricks or Asbeyes were vac ated, it was familiar with him to settle them into his own hands, as this of Lanfranc, he kept to his own use four years together, and beaker would have kele it, if a sicknes of his body had not healed this disease of his mind: For finding him self in some hazard of death, he then conferred the Archbiscoprick of Canterbury upon Anzelm, and the Bisnoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Riet, two eminent men of that time; but although as he was well again, he repented him of that he had done, and he was not quiet, till he had drawn from the said Robert, five thousand pounds, and from Anzelm also good funds of money. For he repeated not more in time of sickness for the evil he had done in health, then being in health he repeated of the good he had done in sickness; that it may in a manner be said, there was nothing made him sick but health, and nothing made him in health but sickness. But this preying upon the Clergy was grown into such a cutome with him, that he kept in his hands at one time, three Bisnopricks, Canterburty, Wincheiter, and S bilibury, and twelve Asbeyes; all which he left to Funt and received the profits; and from this King William keeps Abbys and Bisnopricks vac ent, in his hands.
William the Second.

ord was brought him as he sat at dinner, that his City of Mans in Normandy was betegeed, and in great danger to be taken; if not preffently relieved: whereupon the King asked which way Mans lay; and then caufed Mafons preffently to take down the Wall, to make him paffe the next way, and fo rode inland to¬wards the Sea. His Lords about him, advising him to flay till his people were ready, No (faith he) such as love me I know will follow me. And being come on Shipboard, and the weather growing very tempestuous, he was advifed by the Master of his Ship, to flay for some calmer fea: No (faith he.) Fear nothing, I never yet heard of any King that was drowned. And thereby coming to Mans unexpe ted, preffently dispersed the Befiegers, and took Hilcas, Count de la Fiefde, who had been Author of the tumult, prifoner; who vaunting to the King, and faying, Now indeed you have taken me by a wife; but if I were at liberty again, you should finde me to do other kinds of fervice: at which the King laughing, Well then (Said he) go your waies and do your worde, and let us fee what fervice you will do. Being reconciled to his Brother Robert, he affifted him to recover the Fort of Mount St. Michael, which their brother Henry did formerly hold in Normandy: during which fiege, flaying one time alone upon the fhore, he was feft upon by three Horfemen, who affail ed him fo fiercely, that they drove him from his faddle, and his faddle from his Horfe; but he taking up his faddle, and withall drawing out his Sword, defended himfelf till rescue came: and being afterward blamed for being fo obfinate to fave his faddle, he anfwered: It would have angered me at the very hearts, that the knives fhould have bragged they had won the faddle from me.

In what he was juft in keeping his word, in what he was falling.

His vertue efpecially was commended in him, and he would oftey, That even God himfelf was obliged by his Word. But if we observe the course of his life, we fhall finde that howsoever he might keep his word in small matters, yet certainly not in great: For he kep not his word with his brother Robert, to whom he promifed to leave his Kingdom of England after his deceafe; but perforned it not. Nor he kept not his word with his Subjects, for in the rebellion of the Norman Lords, he promifed the English, if they would now ftick to him, they fhould have their ancient Laws restored, and be allowed liberty to hunt in his Forrests; which promise he kept not at all, or at laft foon brake. Nor he kept not his word with God himfelf; for being fick at Glouceffe, and in some hazard of his life, he made a felemn vow, that if he recovered he would lead a new life, and give over all his diforderly courfes: but being recovered he grew more diforderly than he was before; and if denomination be made from the greateft actions, it cannot be truly faid, that he was juft of his word. But fuch is the priviledge of Princes over their Subjects, that if they make a promise, it must be believed; and if they break it, it muft not be questioned.

Uch is fpoken of his lafcivious life in general, but nothing in particular; for neither is mentioned any violence he ever offered to any; nor is any woman named to have been his Concubine; and Princes Concubines are feldom concealed. It is true, he was never married and of a ftrong confitution of body, and pro- bable he might be inclined to that vice: but probabilities are not alwayes concluding; and therefore whether it be a true accufation, or that a flander, it may well be doubted; only one fad Suri is fpoken of, called Bertranus, whom he advanced in honour, and matched in a Noble

Family,
Family. But why should we look more for particulars of his Incontinency, then of his Prodigality? for he was taved no less for being Prodigal, then for being Incontinent; and yet for his Prodigality there is not so much as one instance recorded, unless we take this for an instance; that when his Chamberlain brought him a pair of hose, which because they were new, he asked what they cost? And being told they cost three shillings, in a great chafe he threw them away; asking him, If he thought a pair of hose of 3. s. to be fit for a King to wear? Get thee gone (faith he) and let me have a pair of a Mark. His Chamberlain went, and bringing him another pair scarce so good as the former, and telling him they cost a Mark; I marry (faith the King) there are something like, and was better satisfied with hearing what they cost, then with seeing what they were worth: and yet was this no imputation to his wisdom, for to try the truth, it is no defect of wisdom in a King to be ignorant what his clothes are worth.

He appointed a disposition to be held between Christians and Jews, and before the day came, the Jews brought the King a Prentice, to the end they might have an indifferent hearing; The King took the Prentice, encouraging them to quit themselves like men: and swore by St. Luke's face (his usual oath) that if they prevailed in Disputation, he would himself turn Jew, and be of their Religion. A young Jew on a time was converted to the Christian Faith, whole Father being much troubled at it, presented the King his Marks, begging him to make his Son to return to his Judaism; whereupon the King sent for his Son, commanding him without more ado to return to the Religion of his Nation: But the young man answered, he wondered his Majesty would use such words; for being a Christian, he should rather persuade him to Christianity: with which answer the King was so confined, that he commanded the young man to get himself out of his sight. But his Father finding the King could do no good upon his Son, required his money again, Nay (faith the King) I have taken pains enough for it; and yet that thou must see how kindly I will deal, thou shalt have one half; and the other half you cannot in confidence deny me. There were fifty Gentlemen accused for hunting and killing the Kings Deer, which they denied, and were therefore condemned to the trial of fire, which by God's merciful judgement they passed through untouched: the King hearing it, and deceived of the confiscation expected, is said in a great chafe to say: How happens this? Is God a just Judge in suffering it? Now a murrain take him that believes it. It seems also he doubted in many points of Religion, then in credit; For he would often protest, that he believed not that Saints could profit any man in Gods sight, and therefore neither would he, nor any other that were wise (as he affirmed) make Intercession either to Peter, or to any other for help.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

The King claimed the Investiture of Bishops to be his right, and forbad Appeals and Intercourse to Rome: for Appeals had been forbidden till Anselm in this Kings reign appear to the Pope; upon whose complaint the Pope was about to Excommunicate the King, but having a little before Excommunicated the Emperor Henry the fourth, he forbade at that time to do it, lest by making Excommunication common, he should make it illighed. At this time great contentment arose between the King and Archbishop Anselm; and Anselm not yielding to the King in any point prejudicial to his own Prerogative, (which were points indeed incomparible) the contention continued long and hot, and the better, because there were at that time two Popes on foot at once; one elected by the Conclave, called Urbanus the second; another set up by the Emperor called Clement the third: for Anselm held with Urban, the King with Clement: and thus for agreeing in a third, it was impossible they should agree between themselves. And this contention, they palliated with a thousand inventions, sometimes of one side, sometimes of the other; yet brake out again, and was renewed both in this Kings time, and in the time of many Kings after. Anselm often threatening his going to Rome, the King told him plainly he would not thrust him out of the Realm; but if he would go without his leave, he would then keep him out during his pleasure, and besides, he should carry nothing out of the Realm with him. Yet Anselm ventured it, and the King performed it; for William Warenswafst was sent to rife him in his pottage at Sea, of all he had, neither was he suffered to return as long as the King lived; during all which time, the King took the profis of his Archbishopsrick to his own use. It may not be amiss to shew a paffage here concerning the first cause of content on between the King and Anselm, which some fay was this; The King required a thousand Marks of him for having preferred him to that See, which Anselm refused to give, as judging it no lesf for the King to give after the preferment then before: but yet afterward offering five hundred pounds, the King refused to accept it, as being worth (he said) five times as much; whereupon Anselm told him, Your Grace may have me, and all that is mine, to serve you in a friendly manner: but in the way of servitude and bondage, you shall neither have me nor mine; Which words so angered the King, that they could never after be reconciled. In this Kings Reign Pope Urban exhorsted all Christian Princes to join together for recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land: and by the soliciting of Peter an Hermite, there assembled for that enterprise, under the conditio of Godfrey of Bulking, to the number of three hundred thousand men; among whom was Robert Duke of Normandy who so valiantly carried himself in the action, that after Jerusalem was won, the Kingdom of it (as some write) was offered to him; but he looking more after the Kingdom of England; and therefore refusing it, it was observed he never prospered all his life after. In this Kings reign, although he had no command in Ireland, yet their Bishop of Dublin was sent over to Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, The Reign of King William the Second.

T his King enlarged the Tower of London, and compacted it with new walls; he also built the great Hall at Westminster, being 270 feet in length, and 74 in breadth; but thinking it too little, he intended to have built another Hall which should have stretched from the Thames to the Kings street. He repaired the City and Castle of Carlisle, which had been walled by the Danes two hundred years before; and because it had but few Inhabitants, he brought a Colony thither out of the Southern parts. He finished New-Castle upon Tyne and many other Castles erected or repaired upon the borders of Scotland; many also upon the Frontiers, and within the very Breath of Wales.

Cesadities happening in his Reign.

I n the fourth year of his Reign, on St. Lukes day, above six hundred houses in London were thrown down with tempest, and the roof of St. Mary Bow Church in Cheapside, was so rafied, that in the fall fik of the beams being 37 foot long, were driven so deep into the ground (the trees being nor then paved with stone) that nor above four foot remained in sight, and yet flood in each rank and order as the workman had placed them upon the Church. Also in this Kings Reign all the Lands in Kent, sometimes belonging to Earl Godwin, were by breaking in of the Sea covered with Sands, and are called Godwins Sands to this day. In his eleventh year, at a Town called Finchamstead in the County of Berks, a Well call out blood, as before it had done water; and after by the space of fifteen days, great flames of fire were seen in fundry places, and at fundry times.

H e was but mean of stature, thick and square bodied, in his belly swelling somewhat round, his face was red, his hair deep yellow, whereof he was called Rufus, his forehead four square like a window; his eyes footed, and not one like another; his speech unpleasent, and flammering, especially when he was moved with anger. Concerning the qualities of his minde, they may be best known by looking upon the actions of his life; in which we shall finde he was never more affured, then when he was least sure, never less dejected, then when most ex- treme; being like a Cube, that which way so ever he fell, he was still upon his bottom. For his delights to pase the time, there was none in more requet with him then hunting, a delight heretofore to him; which was the cause that as his Father had begun the great new Foresit, so he enlarged it to a far greater extent. Other delights of his we finde not any, unlefs we shall reckon his Wars for delights; for though they were oftentimes forced upon him, when he could not avoid them: yet sometimes he entered into them when he needed not, but for his pleasure. And in general, it may be said that one of his greatest virtues, was that which is one of the greatst virtues, Magnanimity; and his worlde vice, was that which is the worst of vices, Irre- ligion.

Prosages that preceded his Death.

A t Finchamstead in Berks, near unto A-lington, a fiery call up liquior for the space of fifteen days, in substance and colour like to blood. The night before the King was kild, a certain Monk dreamed, that he saw the King saw the image of Christ crucified with his teeth; and that he was to bite away the legs of the same Image, Christ with his teeth spurned him down to the ground: and that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, with abundance of smoke. This being related to the King by Robert Fitz Marmion, he made a jest of it, saying, This Monk would fain have something for his Dream: Go, give him a hundred shillings; but bid him look that he dream more auspicious Dreams hereafter. Also the same mine, the King himselfe dreamt that the veins of his arms were broken, and that the blood issues out in great abundance: and many other like passages there were, by which it seems he had friends somewhere, as well as Julius Caesar, that did all they could to give him warning; but that, as Caesar, his malus Genius would not suffer him to take.

King William having kept his Christmas at Glastonbury, his Easter at Winchester, his Whitsun at Westminster; notwithstanding forewarned by many signs of some great disaster toward him, would needs the day after Whitsun, go a hunting in the New Forest; yet something reserving the many prefages, he stayed within all the forenoon. About dinner-time, an Arishtfer came and brought him six Cross-bow Arrows, very strong and sharp; whereas four he kept himself, and the other two he delivered to Sir Walter Tyrel, a Knight of Normandy, his Bow-bearer, saying, Here Tyrel, take you two, for you know how to shoot them to purpose; and so having at dinner drank more liberally than his custom, as it were in contempt of prefages, out he rides into the New Forest, where Sir Walter Tyrel, shooting at a Deer, at a place called Charingham, (where since a Chapel hath been erected) the arrow glanced against a tree, or as some write, grazed upon the back of the Deer, and flying forward, hit the King upon the breast: with which he instantly fell down dead. Thus it is delivered by a common consent of all; only one Sugerius a Writer that lived at that time, and was a familiar acquaintance of the said Tyrel, against the current of all Writers, affirms that he had often heard the said Sir Walter swear that he was not in the Forest with the King all that day, I have been the longer upon this point, because a more pregnant example of God's Judgment remains not any where upon record. For not only this King at this time, but before this, a Brother of his named Richard, a young Prince of great hope; and also a Nephew of his, the Son of his Brother Roberts, came all in this place to violent deaths; that although King William the Founder of the Forest escaped the punishment in his own person, yet it was doubled and trebled upon him in his issue. Thus died King William Rufus, in the three and fortieth year of his age, and twelfth and some months, of his reign. His body was drawn in a Colliers Cart, with one Horse, to the City of Winchester, where the day following it was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Swithin, and was laid there in the Quire under a Marble Stone; till afterward it was translated, and laid by King Canutes bones.

Men of Note in his time.

For men of Valour, he must stand alone by himself: for men of Learning, there was Lanfranc, a Lambard, but Bishop of Canterbury; also Robert, a Luvian, who Epitomized the Chronicle of Mariani Sulii: also Turgayn an English man, Dean of Durham, who wrote the Annals of his own time, and divers other works; but especially Osmand Bishop of Salisbury, who composed the ordinary Office; or Book of Prayer.
Although Henry came not to the Crown, as his Brother William did, by the gift of his Father, yet he came to it by the Prophecy of his Father; for when his Father made his Will, and divided all his Estate in Land between his two Eldest Sons, giving to Henry his Youth only a portion in money; which division he perceived him to be much discontented, he paid unto him, content thy self Henry, for the time will come, that thy self shall be served as well as theirs. And now the time was come that his Prediction was accomplished, for on the fifth of August, in the year 1100, he was Crowned King of England at Westminster by Maurice Bishop of London, (as Dean of all the Bishops of England, and therefore might do it without any prejudice to the Archbishop of Canterbury, though he had been present, who was indeed at this time in exile.) But though it appears suffice in Fatus, to be decreed by the Divine Providence that it should be so; yet it would not have been so, if his own endeavours had not been concurrend. And therefore being in the New Forest, when his Brother King William was killed, he never stayed to complement the Defalter, but rode pretently to Winchester, and there, not without some opposition of the keepers, seiz'd upon his Brothers Treasure, as knowing Treasure to be the means of getting of Friends, and Friends the means for getting the Crown; and having now gotten the first means, he made use of it for the second; and both of them together brought him to this he is yet withal there were circumstances in his own person that conducted to it; his Brother was born, when their Father was but a Duke, he, when he was a King; Robert but a Foraigner, being born in Normandy, himself a Native, born at Selby in Yorkshire; and it was not the least circumstance, that he was called Beamelor, as much as to say, a good Scholar, having been bred in Cambridge: not perhaps that his learning was so great, but that it was great, either in respect of that age, which had but little, or in respect of his Brothers, who had none at all: and the people having been oppressed before, by the ill Government of two Kings that were illiterate, could not chuse but he glad to come under the Government of a King that was learned. And though his Brother Robert, as being the eldest, hid right unto it; yet he as out of The Reign of King Henry the First.

Henry pretend, who had his Portion given him in money? Besides, it was an agreement with his Brother William, with confent of all the Lords of the Realm, that the survivor of them should succeed. With such-like intrigues, and withal affurring him, there were many in England would take his part; he easily perfwaded the Duke to that, from which he could hardly have dissuaded him. Who thereupon with a convenient Army puts to Sea, and lands at Portsmouth, while Henry waited for his coming about Hafvings; and being landed there, much people returned to him, that it was like to have been a bloody busines; but by mediation of friends, working upon the flexible nature of Duke Robert, it was brought at last to this agreement, that King Henry should pay to Duke Robert, three thousand marks yearly, and Duke Robert should succed him in the Kingdom, if he survived. And thus this cloud, that threatened so great a storm, brought with it rather Sun-shine, and fair weather; for now to his possession of the Kingdom, there was added a right, and he might now justify his being a King, without any scandal or usurpation. After this another little cloud arose, but was soon differed; for Robert de Brus, Earl of Shrewsbury, a man of disposition, but more through discontentment, though discontented for nothing, but that having a great estate, he was not a King as well as some others, forfified the Town of Shrewsbury, and the Castle of Bridgnorth, and got many Welfemont affit him: but the King coming with a mighty Army, so terrifed the Welfes, that they abandoned the Earl, and left him a prey to the King in his person, and more in his estate; for the King feized his estate into his hands, but for his person he only banifhed it the Realm. For as yet the shedding of blood, and putting to death, though for great Treasonable Practices, was not much in use: Policy of State was not yet grown to that height of severity. The like attempts, and upon the like occasion, was made by William Earl of Morlabague in Normandy, and Henry Counte de Cornualles in England. Uncle to the King, only for depriving him the Earldom of Kent, which because he could not obtain, he entered into Treasonable practices, by which he lost the Earldoms he had before. But these troubles were but as the labour of a woman that is safely delivered: painful for a time, but ending in joy: and indeed for the most part this King had the fortune to be a gainer by his lobbies.

After this Duke Robert came in kindnese into England, to visit his Brother Henry; where he was so well pleased with his entertainment, that in requital thereof, and to do favour to the Queen, that was his God-daughter, he releas'd to King Henry, the three thousand marks, which he was yearly to pay him. But returning into Normandy, and considering better what he had done, he so repented him, that he spared not to give out, that his Brother had directly confened him. Which coming to King Henry's ear, so incend'd him, that he presently lent over a mighty Army, which forsook the Country, and won many Towns, and Cities, and soon after went over himself; where he so prevailed, that he left Duke Robert but only Reams in all Normandy to put his head in; and this done, returns into England. And now Duke Robert begins to be sensible of his own weaknesses, and therefore comes over into England to try the uttermost of his Brothers good nature. Himself had sent him a Tun of Wine to refresh him withal, when in a siege he was ready to perish for want of water: and it cannot be, but that gratefulness and natural affection, meeting together, must needs work something in the mind of a Brother. Thus resolved, he prefers himself to the King, referring both his Dukedom and himself, and all differences and debates to his will and pleasure. But whether incensed with the scandalous words Duke Robert had given out of him, or whether aspiring to join Normandy to England, as his Father had done before, King Henry scarce vouchsafed to hear him speak, at least vouchsafed not to make him any answer, but in a fallen manner turned away, and so left him: which scornful usage put the Duke into such indignation, that he resolved to set his whole Rate to stake, and either to redeem his disgrace, or to forfeit his life. So returning into Normandy, he ufeth all his force in raising of Forces; but King Henry suspected his intentions, and not being to give Instructions of time to ripen, came upon him so suddenly with a mighty Army, that he drew him to a Barret before he was half ready to fight. In which Barril King Henry received sundry Stripes on the heads at the hands of one William Crispine, Count de Evreux; so as the blood burst out of his mouth: yet nothing abashed, he struck down divers of his enemies, and particularly the said Crispine who was there taken prisoner at the Kings feet. And now desire of revenge so animated the Duke, and the Duke his Souldiers, that never Barril was more fiercely fought; and the Normans seemed as if to have the better, till King Henry shewed himself in the Army, put such courage into his Souldiers, that they quickly made good the advantage they had in number, and King Henry obtained a compleat Victory, both in slaughter of men, (of whom there were slain above ten thousand:) and in taking of Prisoners (to the number of four hundred:) amongst whom, besides other great ones, as the Earl of Morlaige, William Crispine, and William Frevde, was Duke Robert himself, whom the King (having frist taken order for all things, in his new State of Normandy) brought over with him into England, and committed him to the Castle of Cardiff in Wales, where he remained a Prisoner till he died, used for a time with reasonable Liberty for Recreation, till attempting to make an escape, it was thought fit to put out his eyes; which though it increased his misery, yet it shortened not his life, for he lived many years after, in all, from the time of his first imprisonment, eight and twenty. And thus this great Duke, who in his birth was the Joy of Nature, in this life was the Icarn of Fortune; and it is not unworthy the observing, that the English won Normandy, the very fame day fortieth year, the Normans had won England. Such Revolution of Fortune there are in Kingdoms, and so unalterable is the Iare of all worldly greatness. He died; Anno Dom. 1134, and lies buried at Westminster.

ceter. Marsh, Westminster, writes that King Henry his Brother sent him according to his custom, a Robe of Scarlet; and putting it first on himself, perceived the Caponck to be somewhat slack; whereupon he said, Carry this Garment to my Brother, for his head is left then mine. The messenger delivering the Robe, Duke Robert demanded if any had worn it, and being told him the King had first afflicted it, and what speeches he had used, the Duke replied, I have now too long prostrated a miserable life, since my Brother is so injurious to me, that he sends me his old cloaths to wear; and from that time would never eat any meat, nor receive any comfort.

And now is King Henry as great as ever his Father was; and a great Yus draws away, as much envied as ever his Father was; and as envy makes enemies, as much opposed as ever his Father was. For now Luke Earl of Angiers, and Baldwin Earl of Flanders, upon small occasions and Lewis the Gras, King of France, upon none, but such as envy suggested, seeking to place William, Son to Duke Robert, in his Right to Normandy, assaulted the Dukes Domions, perhaps to try whether greatness had not made him unworthy; but King Henry, to show that greatness had made him more active, went over into Normandy with a mighty Army, and at Nice encountered the French King, where a bloody Battel was fought, with exceeding violence on both sides; but at last King Henry repelled the French Kings, and recovered Nice, and after many other Confllicts between them, with variety of Fortune, at last the King made peace with the Earl of Angiers; confirmed by a marriage of the Earls Daughter with his Son William, and upon this also the two Kings grew to a peace, in which William, Son to King Henry, being about seventeen years of age, was invested into the Dutchy of Normandy, doing homage for the same to the King of France. From whence it is afterward a custom, that the King of England's eldest Son (long as he lived in the hands) was made always Duke of Normandy. After this, Charles Earl of Flanders, being slain at Brussels by a conspiracy of his own people, and leaving no issue behind him, Lewis King of France invited William, Son to Duke Robert, in the Earldom of Flanders, defended from Earl Baldwin, whose Daughter Maud was Wife to King William the first, and Grandmother to this William. So as William now having gotten this step of advancement, seeks to go on, and to recover Normandy, and was thereof by the affnte of the King of France in a fair possibilty, when in a certain light colour, receiving a wound in his hand, the thread of his fair possibilty was upon a sudden cut off; and of that light wound he shortly after died.

King Henry now in perfect peace abroad, was not without some little disquiétions at home, and marching through Peas-Land in South Wales to repress some Insurrections of the Welsh, he came to certain straites, where his main Army could not pass, in which place the King was sit nestled with an Arrow full upon the breast, whereat he flew by our Lord's death (his usual Orth) that it was no Welsh arm had shot that Arrow; yet in his distress, for a thousand head of Cartel, he had the paffage left open, and came safely off. And there were his troubles of Arms, both at home and abroad, during all his reign.

His Taxes and ways for raising of Money.

Towards the marriage of his Daughter Maud with the Emperor, he obtained at his first Parliament at Salisbury, three Shillings upon every Hide of Land, throughout the Kingdom; which was afterwards drawn into a custom, to receive aid from the Subjects, whenever the King gave his eldest Daughter in marriage. Besides this he had no more in all his reign, but only one supply for his Wars in France, but he kept Bishoprics, and Abbeyes, void in his hands; and that of Canterbury, five years together. By an Act of Parliament, or rather by a Synod of Bishops held at London, he was authorized to punish marriage, and incontinency of Priests, which the Bishops afterwards repeated; for he suffered Priests to have Wives for Fines, or rather took Fines of them, whether they had Wives or no; because they might have them if they would. Punishments which before his time were mutilation of Member, he made Pecuniary. And the Provisions of his house, which were used to be paid in kind, were in his time rated at certain prices, and received in money. By this Chapper and the next before, it appears there were in this Kings dayes, but few troubles at home, nor but few Taxations, whereof the one may be thought to be cause of the other; the first perhaps of the second, but certainly the second of the first.

Laws first instituted in his time.

He first instituted the form of the High Court of Parliament; for before his time, only certain of the Nobility, and Prelates of the Realm were called to consult, about the most important Affairs of State: but he caused the Commons also to be assembled, by Knights and Burgesses of their own appointment, and made the Court to confit of three parts, the Nobility, the Clergy, and the Common People, representing the whole body of the Realm, and appointed them to sit in several Chambers; the King, the Bishops, and Lords of the Realm in one Chamber, and the Commons in another; to confer together by themselves. Other Orders of that Court he Ordained, as they are in use at this day. The first Council of this Fort was held at Salisbury, on the 19. day of April, in the 16. year of his Reign. He forbade the wearing of long Hair, which at that time was frequent, after the manner of the French. He commanded Robbers upon the High-way, to be hanged without redemption; of whom a famous one at that time was one Dunshe, and of him, the place where he most used, by reason of the great Woods thereabout, is to this day called Dunshe, where the King built the Borough as now it flandeth.

flaineth. Counterfeitors of money he punished with pulling out their eyes, or cutting off their privy members; a punishment both les then death, and greater.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

At his first coming to the Crown, he for bore his claim to the investitures of Bishops; but after he had been King some time, he claimed that both to invest Bishops, and to allow, or hinder appeals to Rome, belonged to him. In thefe Anfelm Archbishop of Canterbury, who was now returned into England, opposed him; affirming that both of them belonged to the Pope. The contention at laft was brought to the Pope, to whom King Henry lent William Warlespoff, elect Bishop of Exeter, who lay ing to the Pope; that his Matter would not for the Crown of his Realm, lose the Authority of investing his Prelates; the Pope flarted up, and anfwerd, Neither will Archbishops of Spiritual Prerogatives in England, for the Kings head that wears the Crown; before God (fai d he) I wouw, So the contention grew long and hot, and many meffengers were fent to and fro about it: The conclusion was (which proved no conclusion) that the King fliould receive homage of the Bishops elect; but should not inveft them by Staff and Ring; to which the King faid nothing for the pretenf; but for borne not to do it ever the lefs. For five years after the death of Anfelm, Ralph Bishop of Ro chefter, was by the King made Archbifhop of Canterbury; and notwithstanding all former Decrees and Threatnings of the Pope, he received his Investiture of the King. About this time a Council of Bishops was held at London, at which the Temporal Lords were prefent; to the end that the Decree of the Council might be confirmed by both Orders. If any man defire to know more of the Affairs between the King and Anfelm; and of the many great virtues of Anfelm, I let him read Eadward a Monk of Canterbury, who was his Secretary, and hath written of purpose to fet forth his praires. About this time a Canon was made ag aint the marriage of Priests, to which purpofe Johannes Cremuffius, a Prieff Cardinal, by the Kings licen cie came into England, and held a solemn Syn nod at London; where inveighing sharply against it, affirming it to be no better then profef Adultery, he was himfelf the night following taken in bed with a common Harlot. Even Anfelm himfelf, the molt earnifh enforcer of fingle life, dyed not, it feems, a Virgins; for elfe he would never in his writings make fuch lamenta tion for the losf thereof. A little before this, Anfelm being at Rome, Brunincius one of the chief Princes that had been at Jerufalem, came thither; and among other holy Rigius, gave un to him certain hairs of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which Anfelm held always in great ve nation; and my elf heaving the custody of them committed to me, I have by experience great holines to be in them. About this time Anfelm Archbishop of Canterbury, held a Council at Wifminifter, where divers Constitutions, were made; of which there were two, That Priests fliould no more be suffer'd to have Wives: and that there fliould be no more buying and selling of men in England, which was hitherto accustomed, as if they had been King or Oxen. Anfelm about this time dying at the age of 76 years, Redulph fucceeded in the See of Canterbury, but not till five years after the death of Anfelm; and Thomas dying, Thurflane succeeded him in the Archbishopsrick of York, between which two Prelates there arose great contention. Redulph would not Confecrate Thur flane, unlefs he would provefs obedience; Thur flane was content to embrace his Benediftion, but provefs obedience he would not. In this contention the King taketh part with Redulph, the Pope with Thurflane; after many fallages, in the bullines, upon the Popes threatning to Excommunicate the King, Thurflane entred upon his Bifhoppick, and the King connived. In the tenth year of his reigne, the Abbey of Ely was made a Bifhoppick, and Canterbury likewise; for the Pope, anfwering the petition of the Prelates of England, had conferred the Bifhoprick of Canterbury, in recompence of the manner of Spaulding. This King alfo created a Bifhoppick at Carlifte, and endow ed it with many honours. In his time, the Order of the Templars began, in the 27. year of his reigne, the Grey-Friers by the procuration of the King, came first into England, and had their first house built at Canterbury. Also in this Kings time, the first Legat to supply the Popes room came into England, but as yet not admitted. I may here have leave to tell two stories of Church-men, for refreshing of the Re ader. Gamond the Kings Chaplain, observing that unworthy men for the molt part were advanced to the beft Dignities of the Church; as he celebrated Divine Service before him, and was to read these words out of St. JAMES, [It rained not upon the Earth, 31 years, and 6 months] he read this, it rained not upon the Earth, one, one, one year, five one months. The King observed his reading, and afterwards blamed him for it; but Gamond answer ed, that he did it of purpose, for that such Readers were fooner preferred by his Majesty. The King smiled, and in short time after preferred him to the Government of St. Frifes sides in Oxford. The other is this, Thomas Arch bishop of York falling fick, his Physicians told him, that nothing would do him good, but to company with a woman; to whom he answered, that the Remedy was worse then the Diseafe, and so dyed a Virgin. This King granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to Wilhams and his succedors, the custody of Conitable-ship of the City of Rochester for ever. In this Kings time the errors of Gilbertus Porresus, were condemned in a Council helden at Rhinims, by Pope Calixtus; also in his time Innocentus and Anacletus contended for the Papacy, whereby a great Schism arose in the Church.

Workers of Pity done by this King, or by others in his time.

His King founded and ered the Priory of Dunstable, the Abbey of Cernefet, the Abbey of Reading, the Abbey of Hidse, without the Walls of Winchester, the Abbey of Shifham. He also new built the Cattle of Windsor, with a Colledge there: He made also the Navigable River between Tees and Lindsay, a work of great charge, but greater use. His Wife Queen Maud, passing over the River of Lune, was somewhat endangered; whereupon he caufed two Stone-Bridges to be built, one at the head of the Town of Stratford, the other over another stream there, called Channel-Bridge, and paved the way between them with Gravel. She gave also certain Mannors, and a Mill called Wyggan Mill, for repairing the same Bridges, and Way. These were the first Stone-Bridges that were made in England, and because they were Arched over like a Bow, the Town of Stratford was afterward called Bow. This Queen also founded the Priory of the Holy Trinity, now called Briths Church, within the East Gate of London called Aldgate; and an Hospital of St. Giles in the Field, without the Welt part of the City. In this Kings time Jordan Brife Baron, founder of the House of St. John of Herrifdown near to Woff in London, and gave 14. Acres of ground, lying in the field next to Jerkenhead, to build thereupon a Houfe of Nuns, wherein he with Amyrid his Wife, were buried in the Chapter Houfe, Robert Fife, who came out of Normandy with the Conquerour, founded a new the Church of Teesbury, and was there buried. Herbet Bishop of Norwich, founded the Cathedral Church there. The Priory and Hospital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, was founded by a Miniftrait of the Kings, named Reier, who became first Prior there. Before this time Smithfield was a Loyalit of all ordure and filth, and the place where Felons were put to Execution. Hugh Lucy founded the Monaftery of St. John at Lanbury near to Gloufher. Jaga Reynard, Lady of little Donam, founded the Church there, and gave to maintain it half a Hide of Land. This Lady Jaga was late Wife to Baynard, that first built Beyards Castle in England. Emily the Kings Sever, founded the Monaftery of St. John at Colfhef, other Colfhef Canons, and thofe were in their Order in England. Simon Earl of Northampton, and Manue his Wife, founded the Monaftery of St. Andrew in Northampton. In the twentieth year of this Kings Reign, the first Canons entered into the Church of our Lady in Southwark, called St. Mary Overy; founded by William Peniflght Knight, and William Dancie, Normans. Robert the first Earl of Gloufher, the Kings fife Son, built the Caftles of Briflam and Corbyf, with the Priory of St. James in Briflaw; and his Son Earl William began the Abbey of Kenfiti. Geoffry Clefton, Treasurer and Chamberlain to the King, founded the Priory at Kefworth, of Regular Canons. Henry Earl of Warwick, and Margaret his Wife, founded the Colledge of St. Mary in the Town of Warwick; and Roger de Belmond, his Son, and Elyine his Wife, tranflated the fame Colledge into the Caftle of Warwick, in the year 1123. Roger Bishop of Bathury built the Caftles of the Nutham and Shifham, he repaired the Caftle of Salisbury, and environed it with a Wall; he also built the flately Church of Salisbury; deuoted to a longer life then any of his other works.

Ralph Bishop of Darkom began to build the Caftle of Northam, upon the bank of the River Tweed. In the 32. year of this Kings Reign, the Priory of Northam in Cheffere, was founded by one William the Son of Nychel, and the Abbey of Cawkermere, in the fame Shire. The Colledge of Secular Canons also in the Caftle of Leicester, and the Abbey without the North gate of the same Town, called St. Marys de Prauto. Alfo in the Kings Reign was founded the Monaftery of Plimmou in Devonfhire, with the Cathedral Church of Exeter; the Priory of Merton, the Hospital of Kepper, the Priory of Oneyfey over Oxond, by Robert de Orlye Knight: and the Hospital of St. Crofs near Winchfhefere, by Henry Blof Bishop there: also Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Meridum; and indeed fo many in his time were built, that one would think the Inhabitants of Englund to be all Carpenters and Masons, that were able to finish fo many great Buildings in fo short time as this Kings Reign.

In this Kings days all the four Elements were guilty of doing much mischief, but chiefly the Water: For King Henry returning into England after his conquest of Normandy, left his Son William with his Sister Mary, Countefs of Perche, Richard his Son by a Concubine, the Earl of Cheffer with his Wife Lucy, the Kings Neece by his Sister Adelaide, and other Lords and Ladies, and passengers to the number of 180. to follow after him; who taking shipping (and the boat Ship the King had) whether by carelefsnefs, or drunkennefs of the Sailers were all drowned. The Prince indeed was got into the Ship-boat, and out of danger; but hearing the lamentable cries of his Sister, compaflion wrought fo in him, that he turned about his Boat, and took him in, which over-charged with the multitude, over turned, and they all perifhed: none escapd but one Sailor, who had been a Butcher, who by wringing all night upon the Mafft, came safe to Land. An accident not more grievous then exemplary; for amongst other conclusions, from hence we may gather, that no State is so uncertain as prosperity; no fall so sudden as into adversity; and that the Rule [He that stands, let him take heed he fall not] cannot always be observed, because a man happens sometimes to fall before it is possible for him to take heed. Another great mischief was in this Kings days wrought by the water; for by the breaking in of the Sea, a great part of Flanders was drowned: whereupon on a great number of Flemings being fitters to King Henry for some place to inhabit; he affigned them a part in Wales near the Sea, called Pembroke; where they have inhabited to this day: the King by this one action, working two good effects, both shewing compassion to afflicted Strangers, and putting a bride upon unhappy Nations. But the water had another way to do mischief, as much by defect, as this was by excess; for upon the tenth of October, the River of Medway many miles togethcr did come to fail of water, that in the midit of the Chan-net, the smallest Vessels could not pass: and the same day also in the Thames between the Tower of London, and the Bridge, men waded over on foot for the space of two days: also at another time the River of Trent at Nottingham was dried up a whole day. Now for the Earth, though naturally it be without motion, yet it moves sometimes when it is to do mischief, specially being afflieted by the Air; as in this King's days, it moved with so great a violence, that many buildings were shaken down, and Malmesbury faiths, that the homine wherein he sat, was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time fell set again in the proper place. Also in divers places it yielded forth a hideous noise, and cast forth flames at certain risfes many days together, which neither by water, nor by any other means could be suppofed. But yet the active Element of Fire was buift of by the flood. Chichefet, with the micuclent Monaftery was burst down to the ground. From Wolf Cheap in London to Adelgate, a long tract of buildings was confused with Fire: Water for alfo and Rochefer, even in the Kings prefence; and Winchefter, Bath, Gloucefter, Lin- coln, Peterborough, and other places did alfo partake of this calamity, that there could be no charging the fire with any partiality: and to speak of one foreign caffuality, because a strange one; in Lombardy this year was an Earthquake that continued forty days, and removed a Town from the place where it stood, a great wayoff. In the thirteenth year of this King, many prodiges were seen; A Pig was farrowed with a face like a Child, a Chicken was hatch- ed with fourlegs; and the Sun was so deeply eclipsed, that by the reason of the darknes, many stars did plainly appear. In this King's time Gerard Archbifhop of Tork, a man though learned, yet of many ill parts, feeping one day in his Garden after dinner, never waked again, but was there found dead.

Of his Wives and Children.

At his first coming to the Crown, he married Matild or Maud, Sifter to Edgar then King of Scotland, and Daughter to Malcolm by Margaret the Sifter of Edgar Atheling. This Matild, if she were not a veiled Nun, she was at leaft brought up in a Nunnerie, and thereby grown to overeight from Marriage, that when the motion was first made her to marry with King Henry, the utterly refuited it, as resolved, though perhaps not vowed to die a Virgin; till at leaft importuned, and even forced by the Au- thority of her Brother, the rather yielded then confented; for she did it with fo ill a will, that it is faid, the prayed, if ever she had issue by the Marriage, that it might not prosper: and indeed it prospered but uncowardly, as will be feen in the sequel. But though the made this imprécation before the knew what it was to be a Mother, yet when the came to be a Mother, she flewed her felf no lefs loving and tender of her Children, then loyal and obfuscuous to her Husband. And to make amends for this seeming impiety towards her Children, there is a story related of her real

Of his Inconstancy.

O f this enough hath been said, in saying he had so many children barely begotten: but if comparison be made between this his Brother Kynes and him, it may be said, that however they might be equal in looseness of life, yet in that looseness William Rufus was the safer, and King Henry the more noble; for King Henry had certain selected Concubines, to whom he kept himself constant, whereas King William took only such as he found: constant to the pleasure, but not to the persons.

His course for establishing the succession in Mind and his Issue.

He married his only Daughter Maud, being but five years old, to the Emperor Henry the Fourth; but he leaving her a Widow without issue, he married her again to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Son to Eulphe, Duke of Anjou; not the greatest Prince that was a Seducer for her, but the fittest Prince for King Henry's turn; for Anjou is neighbouring upon Normandy, a great security to it; if a friend: and as great a danger, it an enemy. And having thus placed her in marriage, he now considers how to establish her incession in the Crown of England; whereupon he calls his Nobility together, and amongst them David King of Scots, and caufeth them to give their Oaths of Allegiance to her and her issue: and as thinking he could never make her incession sure enough, he caufeth her Lords the year after again to take the like Oath, and after that a three time also, as conceiving that being doubled and trebled, it would make the tie of Allegiance the stronger: wherein nothing pleased him so much, that he Stephen Earl of Blia was the first man that took the Oath, because he was known to be, at least known he might be a pretender. But the King should have considered that Nulla fide Regei, and therefore no Oath, though never so often reiterated, sufficient to warrant Loyalty in perfons to deeply interested, as Stephen was: yet Providence could do no more, and the King was well satisfied with it; especially when he saw his Daughter a Mother of two Sons: for this, though it gave him not assurance; yet it gave him assured hope to have the Crown perpetuated in his Poeternity.

Of Ireland in his time.

The King of England as yet had nothing to do with Ireland, the Country was governed by its own Kings; and the people of both Nations, though they were neighbours, yet divided by a rough Sea, but little acquainted: but now began entercourse to be more frequent, and Mercaderch, chief King of the Irish, bore such awful respect to King Henry, that he would do nothing but by his counsel, and with his good liking.

Whom King Henry used as his Minister in his absence.

He was absent sometimes in Normandy, three or four years together; during which times, he committed commonly the care of the Realm to Roger Bishop of Salisbury, a politicke Prelate, and more as fit to be the second in Government, as King Henry to be the first.

His Personage and Conditions.

He was a person tall and strong, broad breasted, his limbs well knit, and fully furnished with flesh, his face well fashioned, his colour clear, his eyes large and fair, his eyewrows large and thick, his hair black and somewhat thin towards his forehead, his countenance pleasant, specially when he was disposed to mirth. A private man, widifed, and thought to have but little in him; but come to the Crown, never any man fowed more excellent abilities, to true is the saying, Magiftratus indicam vivum. His natural affection in a direct line was strong, in an oblique but weak; for no man ever loved Children more, nor a Brother less. Though a King in act, yet he always acted not a King; but in Battels sometimes the part of a common Soldier, though with more then common valour: as at a Battle in France, wherein he so far hazarded himself, that though he loft not his life, yet he loft his blood. He delighted much in Battles of Foreign Countries; and in Lions, Leopards, Camels, and such like, for which he inclofed a place at Woodstock, of purpose to keep them.

Of his Death and Burials.

A Diffcontent of mine upon some differences between him and his Son in law, the Earl of Anjou, brought upon him a discontent which encreased by eating against his Physicinian advice, of a Lepreary, a meall always pleasing to him, but never agreeing with him, cast him into a Fever, which in few days put a period to his life: So certain it is, that one intemperate action is enough to overthrow the temperance of a whole life; as of this King Henry it is said, that he seldom did eat but when he was hungry, never did drink but when he was a thirst: yet this but once yielding to his final appetit, made him forfeit all benefit of his former abstinence, though some write he took his death by a fall of his Horse. He dyed upon the first of December at night, in the year 1135, when he had reigned five and thirty years, lived three score and seven. His Bowels, Brain, and Eyes, were buried at Roam in Normandy where he dyed: the rest of his body was stuffed with Salt, wrapped in Oxe Hides, and brought over into England, and with honourable Exequies buried in the Monastery of Reading, which himself had founded. The Physicinian that took out his Brains, with the intolerable stench shortly after died. In this King Henry ended the Line of the Normans, as touching the Heirs Males; and then came in the French by the title of Heirs General.
Men of note in his time.

Men of Learning in his time were many; first, Stephen Harding, a Benedictine Monk, who was founder to the Cistercian Order. Then Aelred, Archbishop of Canterbury, who besides his services in matters of State, wrote many great and learned Books.

Then Walter Calne, Archdeacon of Oxford, who delivered a History written in the English tongue, from Brut to Cadwalader, to Geoffrey of Monmouth to translate; and added forty years of his own time. Also Florantius a Monk of Worcester, who wrote De rebus Gestis Anglo-Roman. Also Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who besides other works, wrote the History of his own time, under the two Williams, and Henry the First.

What course he took to establish himself in the Kingdom.

I

T is a true saying, ISIEMI omnes servator Imperii, quibus paratur; and this was Stephen's course, he got the Kingdom by promises, and he established it by performances: He pleased the People with eating them of Taxes and Impositions: He pleased the Clergy with forbearing to keep Bishoppricks and Abbeys vacant, and with exempting them from the Authority of the Temporal Magistrate; He pleased the Nobility with allowing them to build Castles upon their own Lands; he pleased the Gentry with giving them Libery to hunt the Kings Deer in their own Woods; and besides with advancing many of them in Honours: and for his brother Theobald, who being the elder, was before him in pretence to the Crown, he pleased him with a Grant to pay him two thousand Marks a year; and then to strengthen himself abroad no less then at home, he married his Son Ennue to Constance, a Daughter of Lewis King of France, which alliance alone might be thought a sufficient security against all opposition. And yet one thing more, which establish'd him more then theu, at least thee the more for this, that he had field upon King Henry's treasurie, which amounted to one hundred thousand pounds; besides Plate and Jewels of inestimable value, which he spent nor in vain riot, but employed to his best advantage, both in procuring of Friends, and in levying of Souldiers out of Brittany and Flanders.

Of his Troubles in his Reign.

Here may well be made a Chapter of the troubles of his Reign, seeing his whole Reign was in a manner but one continued trouble, at least no longer intermission, then as to give him breath against new encounters; till at last, when he grew towards his old, he rather left to be in trouble, then was quiet, being forced to make his adversary his Heir; and to leave his Crown to him that had fought his life. For he was no sooner set in his Chair of State, but he was presently disquieted and made to ride, by the provocation of David King of Scots, who solicited by some Lords of England, but chiefly by Mande the Emperors (whose right he had sworn to defend,) with a mighty Army entered Northumberland, took Carlisle and Newcastle, and was proceeding further, till King Stephen with a greater Army coming against him, yet rather bought his peace then won it; for to recover Newcastle out of his hands, he was left to let King David hold Cumberland, and his Son Henry the Earl of Huntingdon, as their Inheritance, for which, the Father would not for his, as being engaged, but the Son for his as being free, did Homage to King Stephen.

No sooner was this trouble over, but he was presently under another; for being false somehow what ill at ease, it was brutish abroad that he was dead; which so disheartened men, that every one thought it wisdom to shif for himself; and the great Lords made a contrived use of Caftles, to that which King Stephen intended, when he gave liberty to build them, for the King intended for them his own defence against his Enemies, and they made use of them in their own defence against the King; for now Hugh Biga Earl of Norfolk, poiffcfit him of Norfolk, Baldwyn Rivers of Oxford, and Robert Quegumas of other Caftles. In these difficulties King Stephen, though he could not in person be in all places at once, yet in care he was; and there moit, where was moit danger, employing others against the rest. Against Baldwin, he went himsclf, whom, driven before out of Oxford, and gotten to the Isle of Wight, the King followed and drove him also from thence, and at last into Exile.

And now England afforded him once again to take a little breath, but then Normandy presently begins with him affairs. For now Geoffrey Plantagenet Duke of Aquitain, in right of Munde his Wife enters upon his Townthere, and seeks to get possession of the Country; when King Stephen paffeth over with an Army, and arrefts his proceedings; and after some small defeats of his Enemies, brings the matter at last to a peucuiary Composition: He to pay the Duke five thousand Marks a year, and the Duke to relinquish his claim to Normandy. This done, he returns into England, where new commotions are attending him. For the Lords in his absence, refraining his breach of promise, which they had admitted, and the half of the Crown, make use of every one of their Caftles, and stand upon their Guard: The Lord Talbot held Hereford; Earl Robert Monds Brother, Brifon; William Lovell, the Caftle of Croy; Paganel, the Caftle of Ludlow; William Moone, the Caftle of Dunfer; Robert of Nichol now called Lincoln, the Caftle of Warham; Enfrace the Son of John, the Caftle of Melsor; William the Son of Alan, the Caftle of Sherwood; and withall David King of Scots, never regarding his former agreement, enters Northumberland with an Army, committing to great cruelty, in ravishing of Maids, murthering of Infants, slaughtering of Priests, even at the altar, that never any barbarous Nation committed greater. Thus the Kingdom from the one end to the other was in combustion; that if the King had had as many hands as Brismo, there would have been work enough for them all. Yet all this dismay'd not the King, but as having learned this lesson, Tu ne cede malis, fed contra cantenter ise, grows more in the confidence, the less he was in assurance; and as if danger were the fucell of courage, the more ered in himself, the less he was upheld by others: and so, venturing what his Rebels at home would do in his absence, he

He goes in person against David King of Scots; as being most dangerous, and therefore the first to be repressed: but finding it hard to draw him to a battle, and impossible without a battle to do any good upon him, he leaves the care of that quarrel to Thurnsfe Archibishop of York, and returns himself home, if it may be called home, where he scarce had a safe place to put his head. But though many Lords were rebellious against him, yet some there were that stuck firmly to him, by whose assistance and his own industry, partly by intemcement, partly by inforcements, he reduced most of them to obedience, and all of them to submission. When in the mean time Thurnsfe Archibishop of York, and in his lieutenants, Ralph Bishop of Durham, assisted with William Earl, of Aumeres, William Pippereil of Nottingham, and Hubert de Lucy, fought a memorable battle against David King of Scots; wherein though King David himself, and his Son Henry performed wonderful Acts of Providence, yet the English got the Victory, with the slaughter of seven thousand Scots in the Field, besides many other taken in the flight; where of the English none of account were taken, but only a Brother of Hubert Lucy's, and some small number of common Soldiers. This Victory infinitely pleased and comforted King Stephen, who not long after to make an absolute suppression of the Scots, paffeth again with an Army, and inforceth King David to demand a Peace, delivering his Son Henry into King Stephen's hands for a pledge; and coming home- ward, by the way he beleaguered Ludlow one of Rebels's tents, where Prince Henry of Scotland had been taken Prisoner, if King Stephen in his own Person had not rescued him.

After this, once again the King got a little breathing time, but it was but to prepare him for greater Encounters. For now Munde the Emperor hisself in Person comes into play, in whom the breach before taken was to have its trial; for till now neither so really intended, yet it could not possibly be performed; for how could they receive her Queen, who came not in place to be received? but now that the came in Person, was now the time of trial, how the Oath would work; and work it did indeed with many, and that strongly. For Munde coming into England with Robert Earl of Gloucester, her base Brother was most joyfully received at Arundel Castle, by William de Auido, who had married Ade Жца the Queen Dowager, of the late King Henry, and had the said Castle and County assigned for her Dower. King Stephen having intelligence hereof, cometh to Arundel Castle with an Army, and besiegeth it; but either diverted by counsel, or else finding the Castle to be inexpugnable, he left the siege, and suffered the Emperors to pass to Brifon.

The King hearing, that Randolph Earl of Chester, Son in Law to Robert Earl of Gloucester, had poffcfit himself of the City of Lincoln, thither he goeth with an Army, and besiegeth it: thither also came the said Earl of Chester, and Robert Earl of Gloucester to raise the siege; at which time a most fierce battel was fought between them upon Candlemas-day; wherein as it is memorable what wonders of valor King Stephen performed, For when all men about him were either either fled or slain; yet he kept the field himself alone, no man daring to come near him, but overmastered at last by multitude, he was taken Prisoner, and brought to Maidst the Emperors, who sent him to be kept in safe custody in the Castle of Brifton, where he remained till Abstinence after.

And now the Emperors having gotten King Stephen into their hands, they took their journey to London; received in all places, as they went, peaceably, and at London joyfully. Where Queen Matilda made humble amends unto her for the liberty of King Stephen her Husband, and that he might but be allowed to live a private life; the Londoners also made suit to have the Laws of King Edward restored; but the Emperors not only rejected both their suits, but returned them in harsh and insulting language: Indeed most unfeasonably; and which gave a stop to the current of all her fortunes. For Queen Matilda finding thereby how high the Emperors' pulses did beat, sent presently to her Son Ensfate, being then in Kent, to raise Forces with all speed, with whom the Londoners, as much disinclined as she, do afterwards join; and Henry Bishop of Winchester, as much disinclined as either of them, fortifies his Castles at Waltham and Eanbrook, and especially Winchester, where he lays himself, attending upon what Cost the next wind of the Emperors would blow. Of all these things the Emperors had intelligence, and thereupon secretly in the night she fled to Oxford, sending straight charges to have King Stephen more narrowly watched, more hardly used, but (as some write) in Petters, and fed with very bare and poor commons; with fine fare to her Uncle David King of Scots, to come unto her with all speed possible, who coming accordingly, they fall into consultation what is first to be done. The lot falls upon Winchester, as being their greatest Adversary, now, no less in appearance then in power: so Winchester he besiege which Queen Matild hearing, she with her Son Ensfate and the Londoners, came presently to the succour, where a fierce battle being fought, the end was, that the party of Queen Matild prevailed, and the Emperors to make her escape, was fain to be laid upon a Horseback in manner of a dead Corp, and so conveyed to Glocefe; while Earl Robert her Brother dairing to file, was taken Prisoner, whom Queen Matild caused to be used the more hardly in retaliation of the hard usage which the Emperors before had shewed to King Stephen. Things standing in these terms, propositions were made by the Lords for pacification; but such were the high spirits of the Emperors and her brother Robert, that no conditions would please them, unless the Emperors might enjoy the Crown. But after long debate, whether by accommodation between themselves, or by convivance of the Keepers, both King Stephen and Earl Robert got to be at liberty. When the first thing King Stephen did, was to look out the Emperors to requisite the kindred she had shewed him in Prison; and hearing her to be at Oxford, he layes siege to the Town, and brings the Emperors to such distress that she had no way to free her self but by flight; and no way to file but with manifest danger: yet she effected it by this device. It was in the Winter season, when frost and snow covered all the ground over; she therefore clad her self, and her four servants that were with her in white clothes, which being of the colour of snow, made her pass the Watches without being discerned, and by this means came safe to her friends at Walthingham. Yet Malmebury, who lived at that time, confessed he could never learn certainly by what means she made her escape. But howsoever she escaped this present danger; yet it left such an impression of fear upon her, that she never had after any mind to appease upon this Subject of War: but left the prosecution of it to her Son Henry, who was now about sixteen years of age and being forward of his age and able to take arms, was by his great Uncle David King of Scots knighted to make him more forward.

It was now the ninth year of King Stephen's Reign, when Ralph Earl of Chester, keeping possession of the City of Lincoln, was in night time assaulted by the King; but the Earl perceiving the King Forces to be but small, suddenly issued forth, and repelled the King with the slaughter of fourscore of his men. Yet two years after this, the Earl was reconciled to the King; and came of his own accord to wait upon him, when peradventure he was detained by the King, and not set at liberty, till he had surrendered in to the Kings hands all the Castles that were in his possession: though which though he brought the King some present benefits, yet it wrought him a greater future loss; for it lost him his credit with all men, and no man afterward would trust his word.

Now was Duke Henry come to the age of nineteen years, and was in possession of the dukedom of Aquitaine, by the death of his Father Geoffrey Plantagenet; and not long after this, he married Eleanor, the Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Gnom, by whom he had that Darchy, and also the Earldom of Poitou Normanby he had by his Mother; but more by the peoples inclination. So as being poffiff now of four great Principealities, this greatnesse of Eftace adding to the greatnesse of his spirit, made him aspired to recover his right in England; and once he comes bringing with him but small Forces, but promising himself great, from the people of this Kingdom. And many indeed referred to him; with whom he felt prefently, and besieged Mariemore; but by the Kings greater Forces was repelled.

After this, their Armies continued in the field still; rather watching advantages to be doing, then doing anything; sometimes advancing when no Enemy was near, and then retiring when the Enemy came; till at last it was like come to a fet Battel, when suddenly Enfate King Stephen's only Son unfortunately dyed: Unfortunately for himself, but fortunately for the Kingdom; for now King Stephen being left destitute of issue to succeed, was the more easily drawn to conditions of Peace, as likewise the Emperors Mand, having lately lost her Brother Robert Earl of Glocefter, and Miles Earl of Hertford (her two best Champions) was no lefs willing then he which being furthered by the Lords of both sides, was at last concluded upon these conditions, The Reign of King Stephen.

Of his Taxations and ways of raising of Monies.

Of Taxations in his time, there is no mention made; for Taxations indeed, are properly drawn from a body of State when it is entire, whereas the state all this Kings time was altogether in Faction. But what he wanted in Taxations, he supplied with Confiscations, which by reason of the many revoltings of men of all sorts, could not chuse but fill his Coffers, every Rebellion being in nature of a purchase to him; for whatsoever became of the persons, their Lands and Goods were sure to be his. And if it happened at any time, that Confiscations came in but slowly, he had then devices to hallow their pace; for upon light suggestions (not so much oftentimes as just suspicions) he would call men into question, and seize upon their Goods, as in the case particularly of Ralph Bishop of Salisbury; and it may not be unpleasing to hear from what beginning this Bishop grew to such a height of greatnes, which was thus. In the time of King William Rufus he was a poor Priest, serving a Cure in a Village near to Caen in Normandy, when the Kings younger Brother Henry chanced to pass that way, and to make some stay in the said Village, who being desirous to hear a Mass, this Roger being Curate, was the man to say it, which he dispatched with such celerity, that the Souldiers (who commonly love not long Maffes) commended him for it, telling their Lord, that there could not a finer Priest be found for men of War then he. Whereupon Henry appointed him to follow him; and when he came to King, preferred him to many great places, and at last to be Chancellour of England, and Bishop of Salisbury. You have heard his rising, now hear his fall. When King Stephen came to the Crown, he held this man in as great account as his Predecessour King Henry had done, and perhaps in greater; for being a great benger of Suits, the King would lay of him, If this man wil never give over asking, neither shall I ever give over giving. Yet this great Prelate fell first through pride into envy, and then through envy into ruine. For King Stephen having given a liberty to the said Caffles, this man did so far exceed all others in magnificence (for he builded the Caffles of Salisbury, the Pey, Sherlaw, Malmesbury, and Newark, to which there were no Structures comparable in the Kingdom) that the Lords out of envy put it into the Kings head, that these Caffles of his were built thus magnificently for entertainment of Made the Emperors. Which so possest the King, or he would be thought to be so possest, that taking this for a juft caufe, he seised them all into his hands, and forty thousand Marks besides, which he had in money; and not conented with this, he took the like course allo with Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, only because he was his Nephew; and of his near kindred. Another way he had for gaining of Money; for in the first year of his Reign, having given liberty to hunt in his Forests, he afterwards at Oxford caused many to beimpleaded for that liberty: a trick which perhaps he learned from Hunting, first, to give men leave to do a thing, and then to fine them for having done it. But this is the priviledge of Princes, that their leave must be interpreted by him that gives it, and not by him that takes it.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

He gave licence to the City of Norwich to have Coroners and Bailiffs, before which time, they had only a Sergeant for the King to keep Courts; and after this, in the 37. year of King Henry the Third, they had licence to inclose the Town with Ditches.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

Upon the Kings seeling into his hands, the Bishop of Salisbury Caffles, and Goods, which was as usual, and a Synod was called by the
the Bishop of Winchelsea, the Popes Legate, to rigit the Bishop, where the King was credited to appear; who sending to know the cause, answer was made, that it was to answer for his imprisoning of Bishops, and depriving them of their Goods, which being a Christiun King, he ought not to do. The King Replies by his Lawyer, Autoris de Vir, that he had not arrested the Bishop: Satisfy as a Bishop, but as his Servant that was to make him revenge of his Employment. To this the Bishop answered, that he was never Servant or Accomplices to the King. And many Alegations and Protests were urged to and fro, but in conclusion the Synod brake up, and nothing was done. The Bishops durst not Excommunicate the King without the Pope's provocation; so in the end they fell from Authority to submission; and in the Kings Chamber fell down at his feet, beseeching him that he would pray the Church, and suffer difference to be between the Kingdom, and the Priesthood. And this was no small manifestuity in the King, that he was able to pull down the high tombs of the Prelates in that time. In the eighth year of his Reign, a Synod was held in London by Henry Bishop of Winchelsea, where it was decreed, that whatsoever should lay violent hands upon any Clergyman, should not be absolved but by the Pope himself; and from this time forward, Clergy men were exempt from the secular power. In the tenth year of his Reign, by the soliciting of Saint Bernard, many took upon them the Cross, for a supply to the Holy Land, amongst whom some English Lords also.

Work of Diety by him, or by others in his time.

He founded the Abbeys of Croyland in Essex, of Norreys in Lancashire, of Harewood and Fotherham in Kent; at Heigham in Kent, a lord of black Nuns, also an house for Nuns at York. His Queen Matilda builded the Hospital of St. Katherine's by the Tower of London; a Knight called Sir William of Mount Fitchet, founded the Abbey of Stratford Langthorn, within four miles of London; William of Yorke founded Buxley Abbey in Kent; Robert Earl of Rivers founded the Abbots of Merbury in Worcestershire, and in the same Shire, Robert Earl of Gloucester, the Abbey of New Ecton. Thomas Archbishop of York founded the Monastery of Petec in Yorkshire. Also by others were founded the Abbeys of Tilney, of Retail, of Netheravon and Beddulc, of Garedon in Leicestershire, of Kirkstall in Yorkshire; and divers others in other places: so that more Abbeys were erected in his days, than had been within the space of a hundred years before.

Of Causethhappening in his time.

Embassy and also Huntingdon reporteth of one Raymond, a wicked M miller of a more wicked Abbot, that croffing the Seas with his Wife, he so with his inquisition outweighed the Ship, that in the midst of the Stream, it was not able to Hör; at which the Mariners alighted, fell fast, and the lot fell upon Ray-nersus: and left this should be thought to happen by chance, they calt the lots again and again, and still the lot fell upon Raymond: whereupon they put him out of the Ship, and presently the Ship as eaid of her burthen, failed away. Certainly a great Judgement of God, and a great Miracle; but yet recorded by one Numeigts, that is no fabulous Author. In this Kings time also, there appeared two Children, a Boy and a Girl, clad in Green, in a signal unknown, of a strange language, and of a strange dier; whereof the Boy being Baptized, dyed shortly after, but the Girl lived to be very old; and being asked from whence they were, she answered, They were of the Land of St. Mary's, where there are Christian Churchs erected; but that no Sun did ever rise into them: but where that Land is, and how the came hither, she her self knew not. This I the rather write, that we may know there are other parts of the World, then those which we are known: and this story I should not have believed, if it were not testified by so many, and so credible witnesses as it is. In the fifteenth year of this King, the river of Thames was so hard frozen, that Horfe and Cart paffed over upon the Ice. In this Kings time lived Iohannes de Temporalis, of whom it is recorded, that he lived three hundred sixty and one years. He was one of Charlemagne the Emperors Guard, and died in the Reign of Conrade the third, Anno Dom. 1139.

He married by his Uncle King Henry means, Matilda, Daughter and Heir of Euface, Earl of Baxen, a Woman made for the proportion of both fortunes: In Adversity not dejected, in Prosperity not elated. While her Husband was at liberty, a Woman; during his durance as it were a Man; acting his part for him when he was restrained from acting it himself; not looking that fortune should fall into her lap, but industrious to procure it. By this Queen he had only one Son named Eusace, a Prince more than of hope, for he lived to the blossoming of much value, though it came not to maturity, as being cut off at eighteen years of age, some say by drowning, and some by a stranger accident. But strange Relations must not always be rejected, for though many of them be forgot, yet some no doubt are true; and who knows but it may be of this kind, which some Writereferate of this Prince, That being at the Abbey of Bury in Norfolk, and denied some money he required to have had, he presently in a rage went forth, and set fire on the Corn Fields belonging to the Abbey; but afterwards sitting down to dinner, at the first morsel of bread he put into his mouth, he fell into a fit of madness, and in that fit died. Certainly, the persons of Princes are for more observation than ordinary people: and as they make Examples, so they are sometimes made Example. This Prince Eusace was so beloved of his Father, that he had a parpoze to have joyed him King with himself, but that the Pope upon the Bishops complaining to him of it, diverted him from it. Howsoever being dead, he was buried in Peterbom Abbey, where his Mother.
Mother was buried a little before. Other legitimate issue King Stephen had none; but by a Concubine he had a Son named William, whom he made Earl of Norfolk; which honour was confirmed upon him, by a special Article, in the agreement made between King Stephen and Duke Henry; only a French Chronicle speaks of another Son of his, named Geruaf, made Abbot of Welfmünster; and that he died in the year 1160, and was there buried.

He was tall of stature, of great strength, and of an excellent good complexion. Concerning the qualities of his mind, there was apparent in him a just mixture of Valour and Prudence; for if he had not both, he could never have held out with such weak friends as he did, against such potent adversaries as he had. And specially it must be confest, he was of an excellent temper for a Souldier, seeing he never kill'd any enemy in cold blood, as Anthony did Cicero; nor any friend in hot blood, as Alexander did Clitus. What he would have been in Peace, we are left to judge by only a pattern, the short time between his agreement with Duke Henry and his death. Which seeing he spent in travelling to all parts of the Realm, and seeking to stitch up the breaches which the violence of War had made, we may well think that if his life had been continued, he would have given as good proofs of his Justice in Peace, as he had done of his Valour in War. For of his extraordinary good nature we have a sufficient example in one action of his, which was this: Duke Henry being on a time, in some feights for money, sent to his Mother Maud the Emperefs, desiring her to furnish him, but the answerer that she was in as great strait her self, and therefore could not do it; then he sent to his Uncle Earl Robert to furnish him, and he answerer he had little enough to serve his own turn, and therefore could not do it: at last he sent to King Stephen, and he though an Adversary, and standing in terms of opposition, yet sent presently, and supplied him with it. He was withal a great oppugner of superstition, which made him on a time to ride into Lincoln with his Crown upon his head, only to break the people of a superflitious opinion they held, that no King could enter into that City in such manner, but that some great disaster would fall upon him. One special Virtue may be noted in him, that he was not noted for any special Vice, whereof if there had been any in him, Writers certainly would not have been silent.

Of his Death and Burial.

A S a Fifth cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Destiny of this King, to live out of trouble. As soon as he came to enjoy quietness, he left to enjoy life. No time left him between his agreement with Duke Henry and his Death, but only so much as might reasonably serve him to take his last leave of all his Friends: For it was but from January to October; and the last friend he took leave of was Theodorek, Earl of Flanders, whom he met at Dover, and as soon as he had dismissed him, he was suddenly taken with the black Poxion and with an old Disease of the Emrods; and died in the Monstery there, the fifth and twelfth of October, in the year 1154, when he had reigned almost nineteen years, lived nine and forty, and was buried in the Abbey of Faversham, which he had founded.

Men of Note in his time.

O F Clergy-men there was Tho:stone, Arch-bishop of York, and Henry Bishop of Winchester the Kings Brother; also William another Arch-bishop of York, whom we may finde in the Calendar of Saints, as likewise St. Bernard, who lived in this time, though not of this Country. And if we may reckon strangers, there lived at this time Peter Lombard, Master of the Sentences; Peter Comestor, writer of the Ecclesiastical Story; and Gratian, Compiler of the Canon Law, all three Brothers, and all three Ballards: also Action, Aerottus, Meisier, and Rabbi Solomon were in this time famous. Of Military men, there was Ranulphe Earl of Chester; Renold Earl of Cornwall, Robert Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk; but especially Robert Earl of Gloucester, the Kings bafe Son, whose prais, if any desire to hear founded out to the full, let him read William of Malmesbury, who writ the History of these times, of purpose to be his Trumpeter. Of the Writers of our Nation, there was this William of Malmesbury, Henry Huntington, Simon Dunelmus, William Russell, and Geoffrey of Monmouth, Bishop of St. Asaph in Wales. Also Hugo Carbinianus, a Burgundian, but made Bishop of Lincoln here in England.
The LIFE and REIGN of

KING HENRY

THE SECOND.

ING Stephen being dead, Henry Duke of Anjou, by his Father Geoffrey Plantagenet, succeeded him in the Kingdom of England, by agreement, whom he preceded by right, as being Son and Heir of Maud, sole Daughter and Heir of King Henry the first; and was Crowned at Westminster, by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, on the seventeenth of December, in the year 1155, and was now a greater Prince than any of his Ancestors had been before. And indeed the Kingdom of England, the Dukedom of Normandy, and the Duchy of Anjou in his own right, and in the right of his Wife Queen Eleanor, the Duchy of Guyenne, and the Earldom of Poitou, being all united in his person, made him a Dominion of a larger extent than any Christian King had at that time.

He was born at Mort in Normandy, in the year 1132, a great joy to his Father Geoffrey, Duke of Anjou, a greater to his Heire Maud the Emperess; but of great to his Grandfather King Henry, the first, that it seemed to make amends for his Son William, whom unfortunately he had lost before by Shipwreck. The years of his childhood were spent at home under the care of his Parents. At nine years old or thereabouts, he was brought by his Uncle Robert Earl of Gloucester into England, and placed at Bristan, where under the tuition of one Matthew his Schoolmaster, to instruct him in learning, he remained four years; after which time he was sent into Scotland to his great Uncle David King of Scots, with whom he remained about two years, initiated by him in the principies of State, chiefly of his own Estate. And being now about fifteen years of age, was by him Knighted, and though a young sapling before its time, was mellowed under the Discipline of his Uncle Robert, one of the best Souldiers of that time. And now the Duke his Father not able any longer to endure his absence, sent with great instance to have him sent over to him; for satisfying of his loving longing, Earl Robert provided him of palace, and conducted him himself to sea side, where he took his last farewell of him. Being come into Anjou, his Father perhaps overjoyed with his presence, not long after died, leaving him in present possession of that Duchy, being now about nineteen years of age: when shortly after he married Eleanor the late Wife of Louis King of France, but now divorced. A year or two after, he came again into England, where after some revolutions with King Stephen they were at last reconciled, and his succession to the Crown of England, ratified by Act of Parliament. Not long after he went again into France, and presently fell to besiege a Castle which was detained from him by the French King. In the time of which siege, news was brought of King Stephen's death, which one would have thought should have made him hasten his Journey into England; yet he resolved not to stir till he had won the Castle. Which resolution of his being known to the Defendants, they surrendered the Castle; but yet no sooner, but that it was six weeks after before he came into England, when he was now about the age of three and twenty years.

His first Act after he came to the Crown.

He began his Reign as Solomon would have begun it, if he had been in his place. For first he made choice of wife and discreet men to be his Counsellors; then he banished out of the Realm all strangers, and especially Flemings, with whom the Kingdom swarmed: as of whom King Stephen had made use in his Wars, amongst whom was William of Trast, lately before made Earl of Kent. Castles which by King Stephen's allowance had been built, he caufed to be demolished, (of which there were said to be eleven hundred and fifteen) as being rather nur-eries of Rebellion to the Subject, than of any safety to the Prince. He appointed the most able men of that profession, to reform abuses of the Laws, which disorder of the Wars had brought in. He banished many Lords, who against their Oath had assisted King Stephen against him, as thinking that men once perjured would never be faithful; and to the end he might be the less pressing upon the people with Taxa-tions, he dismissed all such Lands belonging to the Crown, which had any way been aliened or usurped, as thinking it better to disperse a few then many; and many other things he did, which in a disjounted State were not less profitable and expedient, then requisite and necessary.

His troubles during his Reign.

He had no Competitors, nor Pretenders with him for the Crown; and therefore his troubles at first were not inCopies, which not at the root, as King Stephen's did; but were only some certain disturbances at inferior parts, till at last he brought them himself into his own bow-elle. For what was the trouble in his first year But the rest of the family, did in great danger, can partly be stated. It is true, the Earl of Essex bore the King's standard, was so attainted by the "Wells," that he left the standard fall to the ground, which encouraged the "Wells," and put the English in favour, as formerly the King had been fain; but this was soon frustrated to the "Wells," and punished afterward in the Earl, by condemning him to be burned a monk, and putting into the Abbey of Reading, and had his lands feized into the Kings hand. And what was his trouble with Malevold King of Scots, but a work of his own beginning? for it he would have suffered him to enjoy that which was justly his own, Cumberland and Huntingdonshire, by the grant of King Stephen, and Northumberland, by the gift of his mother Maud the Empress, he might have stayed quietly at home, and needed not at all have stirred his foot: but he could not endure there should be such parings off from the body of his kingdom; and therefore went with an army into the North, where he won not, but took Northumberland from him, with the city of Carlisle, and the Castles of Newcastle and Bamborough, and meekly out of gratefulness, in remembrance of the many curtesies done to him before, by David King of Scots, he left him the County of Huntingdon; but yet his with condition to owe fealty, and to do homage to him for it. And what was his trouble with his brother Geoffrey, but a bird of his own hunting. For his Father Geoffrey Duke of Anjou, had three Sons, Henry, Geoffrey and William; and dying, he left his Dukeedom of Anjou to his eldestson Henry, but to hold no longer then till he should come to be King of England, and then to deliver it up to his second Son Geoffrey. And he made his Lords to swear, not to suffer his body to be buried, until his Son Henry had taken his oath to do it. Which oath Henry afterward, in reference to his Fathers body, did take; but as he took it unwillingly, so he willingly brake it, and sent presently to Arian the then Pope, for a dispensation of his oath. Which granted, he enters Anjou with an Army, and takes from his Brother Geoffrey, being little able to make resistance, not only the Dukeedom of Anjou, but some other Cities also, which his Father had absolutely given him for his maintenance: yet out of brotherly kindnes was content to allow him a Pension of a thousand pounds a year. Which brotherly kindness was so unkindly taken by his Brother Geoffrey, that it brake his heart; and within a short time after he dyed.

And thus these troubles began by Henry himself, were soon ended; but now a trouble is coming on, begun by Lewis King of France, and this is like to stick longer by him. For King Lewis not having yet digested King Henry's marriage with his divorced Wife Eleanor, sees all opportunities to express his spleen, by doing him displeasure, and at a fair opportunity was now offered. For there fell out a difference between Raymond Earl of St. Giles, and Henry King of England, about the Earldom of Toалes, which Raymond possessed, and Henry claimed: in this difference, King Lewis takes part with Raymond, as pretending to be the better title. Hereupon are great forces provided on both sides, and it was like to have come to a dangerous battle; but that by mediation of friends, a peace was made, and to make the Peace the firmer, a marriage was concluded between Henry, King Henry eldest Son, for seven years of age, and Margaret, Daughter of King Lewis, not part three, who was delivered to King Henry to bring up till for years for confirmation. This was then thought a strong link to hold them in friendship, but it proved after ward a cause to make a greater breach; and indeed when Son is once matched into a Family, the Father must never look from thence afterward to have a good wish; seeing the Daughter this matched can have no advancement, but by the advancement of her Husband, and he none at all, no so well, as by the rule of his Father: yet this brake not out till some years after. It was now about the sixteenth year of King Henry Reign and his Son Henry grown to be seventeen years of age, when it came into the Kings mind to have his Son Henry crowned King, and Reign with himself in his oown time, partly out of indulgence to his Son, but chiefly, as having found by his own experience, that Oaths for succession are commonly ended: but Oaths for particular allegiance, as being Verba praestantia, have no evaotion. And pleasing himself with this concерт, he acquaits his Lords with his purpose, and caufeth his Son Henry to be crowned King by the hands of Roger Archbifhop of York, and all the Lords to swear Allegiance to him. At the Featt of which solemnity King Henry to honour his Son, would needs carry up the first dith to his Table; whereupon the Archbifhop Roger standing by, and saying merrily to the new King, What an honour is this to you, to have such a waiter at your Table? Why (faith he) what great matter it is for him that was but the Son of a Duke, to do service to me, that am the Son of a King and Queen? Which the old King hearing began to repent him now it was too late, of that he had done. For indeed the honour which by Gods commandement, children are to do their Parents, is by such making them their equals, in a manner abolished; at least it gives them honours to take more upon them then is fit. But King Henry pulled it over, and meant to let the best side outward. Notwithstanding this ill success of King Henry, yet King Lewis of France soon after, did the like to his Son Philip, and caufeth him to be crowned King in his own life time, Paris, Anno 1779. And now King Lewis took displeasure, that his Daughter was not crowned as well as her Husband; and therefore to satisfy him in that point, King Henry fendeath his Son Henry and his Wife Margaret into England, and caufeth them both to be crowned by Walter Archbifhop of Rom, and shortly after, the young King Henry and
The Life and Reign of King Henry the Second.

The young King Henry ascended the throne by the death of his father, King Louis, and the Lords of France assented to him.

His wife went back to King Louis her father, and by him with great joy, and variety of sports were entertained. In the time of their being there, King Louis partly out his old spleen to King Henry, and partly to make his Son-in-law more absolute, filet its officer times into confederacies, and with his hot spirit to be firrer for such fire, tell him, it was his due that he should prefer himself to be made a late; have the title of a King, and not the authority; and that as long as he stood in such terms, that which seemed an honour was indeed a disgrace. With which words of King Louis, the young King Henry was set afloat, and from that time forward, stuck not openly to oppose his Father. Whereof his Father having intelligence, sent messengers to King Louis, desiring him from the King their Malter, to be a means to bring his Son to more moderation. But King Louis hearing the Embassadors name their Master King, with an angry countenance laid upon them; What mean you by this to call him King, who hath paffed his Kingdom over to his Son? and with this answer sent them away. To this evil, another worse was added: That Queen Eleanor his Wife went enraged with jealousy of her Husband's Companions, both incendiary her Son, Henry, & perjured also two other her Sons, Richard and Geoffrey, to joy to against their Father; telling them, it would be better for them that their Brother should prevail, who could not chuse but allow them better maintenance, then their Father did. With these perjusions they pafs over into Normandy, and joy with their Brother Henry, who emboldened by their affiduity, grows now more insolent then he was before; that when messengers were sent to him from his Father, requiring him to lay down his Arms, and to come lovingly to him, he proudly made answer, that his Father must not look he would lay down his Arms, unless himself first would lay down his authority, and reign the Kingdom. And now Louis King of France, calling together the great Lords of his Kingdom, and with them William King of Scots, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, Hugh Bigot, and others of his Sons party, they all take their Oaths to assist the young King Henry with all their power, and thereupon all in one day, the French invade Normandy, Aquitaine and Britain; the King of Scots, Northumberland; and King Louis the City of Veronil, which he brought to that duteous, that it was agreed by the Inhabitants, if it were not succour'd within three days, then to surrender it. King Henry hearing of this agreement, promised to succour them by that day. But here King Louis uter a trick, gets that by fraud, which he could not do by force; for he sends to King Henry, that if he were willing to have a peace with his Sons, he should meet him at a place appointed, at such a time, and he doubted not to effect it. King Henry glad of such an offer, and with that gladness perhaps blinded, and not suspecting any deceit, promised to meet; and coming to the place at the day, which was the day he should have succour'd Veronil, he stayed there all day looking for King Louis coming, who instead of coming, sent word to Veronil, that King Henry was defeated; and therefore their hope of succour was in vain. Whereupon the Citizens thinking it to be so indeed, because he came not according to his promise, surrendered the Town; which King Louis finding himself unable to hold, set it on fire, and so departed. But King Henry when he perceived the fraud, followed him with his Army, and took a bloody revenge of his fraud, with the slaughter of many of his men. At the same time also King Henry's Forces encountered Hugh Earl of Chester, and Robert Fulger, who had taken London in Britain, took them Prisoners, and brought them to King Henry. And about the same time likewise in England Robert Earl of Leicester thinking to surprize Reynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard Lucy, King Henry's Generals, at unawares, was himself by them overthrown, and the Town of Leicester taken; which only the fire of the place defended from being battered to the ground. Robert Earl of Leicester being thus defeated, pafeth over into France, and being supplied by King Lewis with greater forces then before, is together with Hugh Bigot sent back into England, to draw the country in to Henry the Sons party, who at first affault take Norwich; and then setting down before Berne, in a great battle, by Richard Lucy, and other of King Henry's Captains, overthrown with the slaughter of ten thousand men, and as many taken prisoners; amongst whom Earl Robert himself. Yet were not Roger Mowbray, and Hugh Bigot so daunted with this overthrow, but they together with David the King of Scots Brother, they gather new Forces, and invade Northumber-land and Yorkshire, when Robert Sucece, Ralph Granville, William Pe(e), and Barnard Bajold (of whom Baynard's Castle in London first took the name) Knights of those parts assembled together, and fighting a great battle with them, overthrown, and took the King of Scots prisoners, with many others. Yet is not Hugh Bigot daunted with this neither, but gathers new Forces and takes Norwich; and Robert Ferris, Nottingham. The news whereof, when King Henry the Son heard, he recovered new spirits, and obtaining now allaisance from King Lewis, prepares himself afeath for War which King Henry the Father hearing, returns speedily into England; and to appease St. Thomas Becket's Ghost, goes to visit his Tomb, and there asks him forgiveness. Thence one, he goes into Suffolk, and at Framingham Castle, which belonged to Hugh Bigot, forms with his Army, when suddenly moved, by what it inflict no man knows, (unless the appearance of Saint Thomas' Ghost did work it,) both Hugh Bigot delivers up his Castle into King Henry's hands, and likewise Robert Mowbray, Robert Ferris, and many others of that party, come voluntarily in, and submit themselves to the King's mercy. Hereupon King Henry returns to London, about which time he committed his Wife Queen Eleanor to prison, for her practices against him. In the mean time, King Lewis understanding that Normandy was but weakly guarded, together with his Son the young King Henry, and Philip Earl of Flanders, the belegizeth Ruan, which the Kings Forces valiantly defended, till he came himself in person; and thereupon King Lewis despairing of any good to be done, sends meilengers to King Henry.

Henry for a truce, and appointed a day to meet at Wyfors, where he doubted not to make a reconciliation between his sons and him; K. Henry agreed willingly, but at the meeting nothing was done. It seems it was but one of K. Louis his old tricks to come fairly off.

After this truce made with King Lewis, King Henry hearing that his Son Richard had in the mean time poifon'd himself of a great part of the Province of Poitou, goes thither with an Army, where Richard at last, after some hesitation, as doubting his Forces, submits himself to his Father, and asks his pardon; which his Father as freely grants, as if he had never committed any fault. And thereupon K. Henry imposes him to King Lewis, and his brother Henry, to persuade them to peace: who wearied now with the wars, were easily drawn, and so reconciliation on all parts is made. And to confirm the reconciliation between the two Kings, Henry and Lewis, his Daughter Adela is affianced to King Henry's Son Richard, as Earl of Aquitaine; and because the Lady was but young, she was committed to the care of King Henry, till she should be fit for marriage. Upon this King Henry fets Robert Earl of Leicester, and Hugh Earl of Chester, giving hostages and oath for their Allegiance, at liberty; and William also King of Scots paying a certain mulet, for which he delivered in pawn the strong Castles of Berwick, Rocherough, and Stirling to King Henry, and was fince to have the County of Huntingdon, and never to receive any Rebels into his protection. These things done, the King with his Son returns into England, where with all joyfulness they were received.

It was now the year 1179. when King Lewis began again to grow discontented with King Henry; because his daughter was not yet married to his Son Richard as was agreed: but King Henry making him promise to have them married within a few days, gave him satisfaction; though indeed he meant nothing less, for it was thought he kept her for himself, as with whom he had before that time, had unlawful familiarly.

The year 1184. was memorable for nothing, or for nothing so much as the death of the young King Henry, who died then, being of the age of one and twenty years: who Widow Margaret returning into France, was afterward married to Bela King of Hungary. Now King Henry's Son Richard, no longer having to have his marriage delayed, which his Father often promised, but would never suffer to be performed, falls into his old fit of discontentment. Wherein though he cannot perhaps be justified, yet he may justly be excused, for to be kept from a wife at that time of his age, for which a Wife was most proper; and especially having been affianced so long before, which could not chuse but make his appetite the sharper: much needs be, if not a just cause, at least a strong provocation to make him do as he did. Howsoever from this fit of discontentment, he falls into a relapse of a Rebellion, and infecting with it his Brothers John, and a great part of his Fathers adherents, they all take part with Philip, (now after the decease of Louis King of France), who willing to make use of their assistance, before the stream of filial awfulness should return i. to the natural Channel, takes them along with him, and befriendeth the City of Mentz, in which King Henry at that time was himself in person. Who apprehending the danger, and then resenting the mischief of falling into his enemies hands, gets him secretly out of the City, leaving it to defend itself, till he should return with greater forces for hearing afterward that the Town was taken, he fell into a greater distraction; and when he made him break out into these blasphemies, no doubt, I shall never hereafter love God any more, that hath suffer'd a City to dear unto me, to be taken from me but he quickly recollected himself, and repented him that he had spoken those words. Indeed Mentz was the City in which he was born. That to have this City taken from him, was as much as to have his birthright taken from him. And to say the truth, after he had left this City, he scarce seemed to be alive; not only because the shortly after died: but because the flate of Majesty which had all his life accompanied him, after this forsook him, for now he was fain to beg peace of his enemies, who often before had begged it of him; now he was glad to yield to conditions, which no force before could have wrested from him. It is memorable, and worth observing, that when these two Kings had meeting between Turnes and Avens, for reconciliment of differences, there suddenly happened a Thunderbolt to light up between them, with so terrible a crack, that it forced them for that time, to break off their conference; and afterward at another meeting, the like accident of thunder happened again, which so amaz'd King Henry, that he had fallen off his horse, if he had not been supported by those about him. Which could be nothing but drops left fall of the Divine anger, and manifest prefigurs of his future disasters. And thus this great Princes troubles, which began in little ones, and were continued in great ones, ended at last in so great a trouble, that it ended his life, and left him an example of downfall, notwithstanding all his greatnes; for taken of his friends, forsook of his wife, forsocken of his children; and if he were not himself, when he blasphemed for the losse of Mentz, forsocken of himself; which might be exemplar in this King, if it were not the common Epigogue of all greatnes.

Robert Fitz-Stephen was the first of all Englishmen after the conquist that entered Ireland, the first day of May, in the year 1170; with 590 men: and there took Waterford, in the behalf of Dermot, Son of Mesherdach, called Mac Murgh, King of Leinster. In September following, Richard Earl of Chepefen, surnamed Strong-bone, sail'd into Ireland with twelve hundred men, where he took Waterford and Dublin; and married Eccele the Daughter of Dermot, as he was promised. From these beginnings, King Henry being then at rest from all Hostile Arms, both at home and abroad, takes into his consideration the Kingdom of Ireland, as a Kingdom which oftentimes afforded assistance to the French: and therefore purposing with himself by by all means to subdue it; he provides a mighty Army, and in the Winter season sailed thither, taking Shipping at Pembroke, and landing near to Waterford. Where entering into consultation what course was fittest to be taken in the enterprise, suddenly of their own accord the Princes of the Country came in, and submitted themselves to him; only Roebuck, King of Connaught, stood out; who being the greatest, thought to make himself the only King of that Nation, but King Henry forbearing him for the preferment, who kept himself in the fadness of Bagg's and Wood's, and was not to be followed in the winter season, takes his journey to Dublin, the chief City of the Country; and there calling the Princes and Bishops of the Nation together, requires their consent to have him and his heirs to be their King; which they affirming they could not do without the Popes authority, to whom, at their first conversion to the Christian Religion, they had submitted themselves, the King sent presently to Adrian the then Pope, an English man, requiring his assent, which upon divers good considerations he granted; and hereupon the King built him a stately Palace in the City of Dublin; and having thus without blood poiffed himfelf of the Kingdom, the Spring following he returns joyfully into England. About four years after, Roebuck also fendis his Chancellor to King Henry, to offer him, with a tribute to be paid of every ten beaftions sufficient. After this, in the one and thirtieth year of his reign, he fents his Son John to be the Governor there.

Axations in his time, were chiefly once; when he took Efficage of English men, towards his wars in France, which amounted to 12,000 pounds; but confidations were many, he caused many Rebellions, and every Rebellion was as good as a fine, Alfo vacancies of Bishops and Abbeys, kept in his hands, as many as one or two times at a time, without fome. He re- fumed all all Lands which had been either sold or given from the Crown by his Predecessors; but a principal caufe that made him plentiful in money, was his Parfimony; as when he was en- joyed for a Penance, to build three Abbeys, he performed it, by changing Secular Priests into Regular Canons, only to spare cloth: And it was the leaft caufe of alienating his Sons from him, that he allowed them not maintenance answerable to their calling. And it could be nothing but Parfimony while he lived, which brought it to pafs, that when he died, there were found in his Coffers, nine hundred thousand pounds, besides Plate and Jewels.

In the beginning of his reign, he refined and reformed the Lawes of the Realm; making them more tolerable and more profitable to his people then they were before. In the one and twentieth year of his reign, he divided his whole Kingdom into six Circuit Courts; appointing in every Circuit three Judges, who twice every year should ride together, to hear and determine Causes between man and man: as at this day, though altered in the number of the Judges, and in the Shires of Circuit. In this King's days the number was all England over was great; yet, whereforeever they dwelt, they might not bury any of their dead any where but in London; which being a great inconvenience to bring dead bodies sometimes from far remote places, the King gave them liberty of burial in several places where they lived. It was in this King's days also ordained, that Clergy men offending in hunting the Kings Deer, should be punishable by the Civil Magistrate, according to the Laws of the Land; which order was afterward taken with them for any offence whatsoever they committed. Though it be not a Law, yet it is an Ordinance which was first brought in by this King, that the Lions should be kept in the Tower of London. Also this King made a Statute, concerning Armour and Weapons; that every man that held a Knights-Fee, should be bound to have a pair of Curasses, a Helmet, with Shield and Spear; and that every man of the Lady, having Goods and Revenues to the value of fifty Pennies, should have one pair of Curasses, an Helmet, a Spear and a Shield; and every man worth ten Pennies should have an Halberd, a Steel Cup, and a Spear.

This King's reign is famous for the contention of a Subject with the Prince; and though it may be thought no equal match, yet in this example we shall find it hard to judge which of them had the victory. But before we come to speake of the Contention, it is fay to something of the Man, and of the Quarrel. The man was Thomas Becket born in London, his Father, one Gilbert Becket, his Mother an of the Countrey of Syria. His first rising was under Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, who taking a liking to him, (as one faith, no man knew for what,) made him first Archdeacon of Canterbury, and then used means to have him be the Princes Tutor; after that to be Chancellor of England; and after the decease of the said Theobald, was himself made Archbishop of Canterbury in his place. One memorable thing he did at his coming to be Archbishop, he surrender'd his place being Chancellor, as not thinking it fit to bear the weight of the Common-wealth, and of the Church, both at once. But now began the contention between the King and him. The difference was, the King would have it ordained that Clergy men who were malefactors, should be tried before the Secular Magistrate as Lay-men were; this Becket opposed, saying it was against the Liberty of the Church, and therefore against the honour of God. Many Bishops flock to the King, some few with Becket; the Contention grew long, and with the length full hotter, till at last Becket was content to affent to the Ordinance with this clause, Salvo Ordine suo. the King liked not the clause, as being a deluding of the Ordinance: He required an absolute affent, without any clause of Reservation. At last, after many debating and demurs, the Archbishop yields to this also, and subscribes the Ordinance, and set his hand unto it: But going homewards, it is said, his Cross-bearer, and some other about him, blamed him for that he had done. But whether moved with their words, or otherwise upon second thoughts, the next day when they met again, he openly re-pented his former deed, retrects his subscription, and sends to the Pope for absolution of his fault; which the Pope not only granted, but encouraged him to perseit in the course he had begun. It may be thought a fable, yet it is related by divers good Authors, that once time during this contention, certain fellows cut off the Archbishops Horses tail; after which fact, all their children were born with tails like Horses: and that this continued long in their posterity, though now long since ceas’d, and perhaps their families too. But King Henry finding there was no prevailing with Becket by fair means, begins to deal more roughly with him; and first makes use of Authority upon his Temporalties, and withal a cenfure was spoken of to be intended against his person. Which Becket understanding, thought it his best course to flee the Realm; and he flew upon sailing under the name of Dermot, he palled over Sea, and there, two years by the Pope, and five by the King of France, was maintained as it were of Arms: in which misery, nothing vexed him so much, as that King Henry sent all his kindred, Men and Women, old and young, into banishment after him. And now King Henry finding that Becket ftood much upon his Legatin Power, sent messengers to the Pope, desiring him to take that power from him, and to confer it upon his Archbishops of York; but the Pope answered he would not do so, but was content the King himself should be his Legate, and sent him Letters to that purpose, which King Henry took in such scorn, that he threw away the Letters, and sent them presently back to him again. This dignity of Legatiphip, for the diligent service of Tho’bold Archbishops of Canterbury, was by a special Decree of Pope Innocent the second, to remain to the Archbishops of Canterbury; so that they were intituled Legati nati, Legats born. This mean time, the King of France prevailed with King Henry to afford Becket a conference, hoping to bring them to some Agreement; where being together, King Henry alleged before the King of France, that he required nothing of Becket, but his attent to an Ordinance, to which in his Grand-father King Henry the first’s time, all the Bishops of the Realm, and the Archbishop of Canterbury that then was, did give their Assent: yet this moved not Becket at all, but he continued his former Tenet, it was againft the honour of God, and therefore desir’d to be excuf’d. See now (faith King Henry) the perversены of this man, all that agrees not with his own humour, is presently against the honour of God. While these things were thus a working, Becket had gotten him more friends at Rome, and by their means prevailed with the Pope, to give him power to interdict some Bishops in England that had done him wrong; and the Pope, being not satisfied with this Communication, to King Henry himself, if he would retract not Becket’s dignity. But whether awed with threatening, or won by the King of France’s importunity;
as others write, at Longby in Hertfordshire, being a bondman of that Abbey, and therefore not to be allowed to be a Monk there, went beyond Sea, where he so profited in Learning, that the Pope made him first Bishop of Alve, and afterward Cardinal, and sent him Legate to the Northern, where he reduced that Nation from Paganism to Christianity, and returning back to Rome, was chosen Pope by the name of Adrian the Fourth, and dyed, being chased with a Fly in his drink. In his days also Heresim Patriarch of Jerusalem, came to King Henry, desiring aid for the Holy-Land, but not so much of money as of men; and not so much of men neither, as of a good General, as himself was: to whom King Henry answered, that though he were willing to undertake it, yet his unquiet State at home would not suffer him. With which answer the Patriarch moved, said, Think not great King, that Pretences will excite you before God; but take this from me, that as you forfake God's cause now, so he hereafter will forfake you in your greatest need. But (faith the King) if I should be absent out of my Kingdom, my own Sons would be ready to rise up against me in my absence; to which the Patriarch replied, No marrow, for from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they shall; and so departed. Also in this Kings days there came into England, thirty Germans, Men and Women, calling themselves Publicans, who denied Matrimony, and the Sacraments of Baptism, and of the Lords Supper, with other Articles: who being obstinate, and not to be reclaimed, the King commanded they should be marked with a hot iron in the forehead, and be whipped; which punishment they took patiently, their Captain (called Gerard) going before them lingoing Blessed are ye when men hate you. After they were whipped, they were thrust out of doors in the Winter, where they died with cold and hunger, no man daring to relieve them. This King after his conquest of Ireland, imposed the tribute of Peter pence upon that Kingdom, namely, that every house in Ireland should yearly pay a penny to St. Peter. In this Kings time, was held by Pope Alexander the third, the General Council of Lateran consisting of 310 Bishops: where many Ordinances were made for the peace of the Church. Also in the thirty third year of his reign Jerusalem was taken by the Turk.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

His King founded the Church of Drifon, to whom King Henry gave the Barony of Berkley, and built the Monastery of St. Augustines in Drifon. In the tenth of his reign, London Bridge was new made of Timber, by Peter of Cole-church a Priest. Robert de Boffin Earl of Leicester, founded the Monastery of Ormond, of Mons; and of Leicester, called St. Mary de Pater, of Canons Regular; and his Wife Amicia, Daughter of Ralph Montfard, founded Eaton, of Nuns. In the two and twentieth year of his reign, after the foundation of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, the Stone Bridge over the Thames at London, began to be founded, towards which a Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury gave a thousand Marks. Alberid Bishop of Worcester founded a Monastery at Leicester of Benedictine Monks.

Casualties that happened in his time.

In the eleventh year of this Kings reign, on the sixth and twentieth day of January, it was a great Earthquake in El, Norfolk, and Suffolk, that it overthrew them that stood upon their feet, and made the Belts rolling in the Streets. In the seventeenth of his reign, there was seen at St. Oystha in Essex, a Dragon of marvellous bigness, which by moving burned horses; and the whole City of Canterbury was the same year almost burnt. In the eighteenth year of his reign, the Church of Norwich with the houses thereto belonging was burnt, and the Monks dispersed. At Andover, a Priest praying before the Altar, was slain with Thunder. Likewife one Clerk and his brother was burnt to death with Lightning. In the three and twentieth year, a Thourfe of blood rained in the Isle of Wight two hours together. In the four and twentieth year, the City of York was burnt; and on Christmas day, in the Territory of Dorlington, in the place of Wark, they killed up herself in manner of a high Tower, and so remained unmoveable from morning till evening, and then fell with so horrible a noise that it frightened the Inhabitants thereabouts and the Earth swallowing it up, made there a deep pit, which is seen at this day: for a Testimony whereof Leyland faith, he saw the Pits there, commonly called Hell-kettles. Also in the same year, on the tenth day of April, the Church of St. Andrew in Rochester was consumed with fire. In the eighth and twentieth year of his reign, Barnwell with the Priory, near unto Cambridge, was burnt. In the thirthy year, the Abbey of Glastonbury was burnt, with the Church of St. Julian. In the year 1180 a great Earthquake threw down many buildings, amongst which the Cathedral Church of Lincoln was rent in pieces the five and twentieth of April; and on the twentieth of October, the Cathedral Church of Canterbury, and all the whole City was burnt. This year also, near unto Oxford in Suffolke, there was in the shape of a man a Fish taken in the County of Dorham; and in the shape of a man. A Fitch taen in the County of Durham made an Earthquake. sign of adoration: at length, beeing not well looked to, he flewe to the Sea, and never was seen after. In the year 1188. on the twentie thee of September, the Towne of Beverley with the Church of St. John there was burnit. And in this Kings time the bones of King Archar, and his Wife Gynavewr, were found in the Vale of Avelen, under an hollow Oak, fifteen foot under ground; the hair of the said Gynavewr being then whole and of fresh colour; but as soon as it was touched, it fell to powder, as Fabel related.

He married Eleanor Daughter and heir of William Duke of Guien, late Wife of Lewis the seventh King of France, but then divorced; but for what cause divorced, is diversely related. Some say King Lewis carried her with him in the Holy Land, where she carrie her child not very holyly, but led a licentious life, and which is the worst kind of licentiousnes, in carnal familiarity with a Turk. Which King Lewis though knowing, yet dissembled, till coming home, he then waved that cause, as he which he could not bring without disgrace to himself, and made use of their nearness in blood, as being Cousins in the fourth degree, which was allowed by the Pope, as a cause sufficient to divorce them, though he had at that time two Daughters by her. Being thus divorced, Duke Henry marrie her, with whom it was never known, but he led a modeld and sober life, a sufficient proof, that the former report was but a slander. By this Queen Eleanor he had five Sons, William, Henry, Richard, Geoffry, and John; and three Daughters, Mare, married to Henry Duke of Saxony; Eleanor married to Alphonso the Eight of that name, King of Castile; and Joan of Joan married to William Duke of Burgundy; Conan his Son William died young. Henry born the second yeere of his reigne, was Crowned King with his Father, in the eighteenth year, and died the nine and twentieth year, and was buried at Roan; married to Margaret, Daughter of Lewis King of France, but left no issue. Richard born at Oxford (in the Kings Palace there called Beane-mont) in the fourth yeere of his Fathers reigne, and succeeded him in the Kingdome. Geoffry born the fifth yeere of his Fathers reigne, married Confance Daughter and Heir of Conan, Earl of Little Britaine, in the fourteenth yeere, and in the two and thirtie yeere died; leaving by his Wife Confance, two Daughters, and a Peace Housen Son named Arthur, John his youngest, called John without Land, because he had no Land affigned him in his Fathers time; born the twelfth yeere of his Fathers reigne, and succeed his brother Richard in the Kingdome. And this may be reckoned a peculiar honour to this King, that of his five Sons, three of them lived to be Kings; and of his three Daughters, two of them to be Queens. Conchines he had many, but two more famous then the rest; and one of these two more famous then the other; and this was Rosamund, Daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, whom he kept at Woodstock, in lodgings so cunningly contrived, that no stranger could finde the way in; yet Queen Eleanor did, being guided by a thread: so much is the eye of jealousy quicker in finding out, then the eye of care is in hiding. What the Queen did to Rosamund when she came to her, is uncertain; but this is certain, that Rosamund lived but a short time after, and lies buried in the Nunnery of Godfown near to Oxford. By this Rosamund King Henry had two Sons, William called Longford; who was Earl of Salisbury in right of his Wife, Ela, Daughter and Heir of William Earl of this Countrey, and had by her much issue, whose posterity continued a long time: And a second Son named Geoffrey, who was first bishop of Lincoln, and afterward Archbishop of York, and after five years banishment in his Brother Kings time, died in the year 1213. The other famous Concive of this King Henry, was the Wife of Ralph Beverley, a Knight; by whom he had a Son named Margery, who was Provost of Beverley, and being to be elected Bishop of Durham, went to Rome for a dispensation, because being a Baffard he was else incapable: But the Pope refusing to grant it, unleas he would pass as the Son of Beverley, he absolutely answered, he would for no cause in the world deny his Father; and chose rather to lose the Dignity of the Place, then of his Blood, as being the Son, though but the base Son of a King,

He was somewhat red of face, and broad breasted; short of body, and therewithal fat, which made him use much exercitie and little meat. He was commonly called Henry Shortman, because he was the first that brought the use of short Cloaks out of Anjou into England. Concerning endowments of minde, he was of Spirit in the highest degree Generous; which made him often say, that all the World sufficed not to a courageous heart. He had the Reputaion of a wise Prince all the Christian World over; which made Alphonso King of Castile, and Garfias King of Navarre reverence a difference that was between them, to his Arbitraion; who so judiciously determined the cause that he gave contentment to both parties: a harder matter then to cut cloth even by a thread. His custome was to be alwayes in action; for which cause, if he had no real Wars, he would have enginised; and would transport Forces either into Normandy or Britain, and go with them himself, whereby he was always prepared of an Army; and made it a Schooling to his Souldiers, and to himself an Exercise. To his children he was both indulgent and hard; for of out of indulgence he caused his Son Henry to be Crowned King in his own time; and out of hardnes he causd his younger Sons to rebel a-gainst him. He was rather Superstitious then nor Religious; which he shewed more by his carriage towards Bickes being dead then while he lived. His Inconstancy was not so much that he used other Women before his Wife, but the affianced wife of his own Sons: And it was commonly thought, he had a meaning to be divorced from his wife Queen Eleanor, and to take the said Aida to be his wife. Yet generally to speak of him: he was an excellent Prince; and it in some particulars were defective, it must be considered he was a man. Why called Henry Shortman?

He was not well at ease before, but when the King of France sent him a list of those that had conspired against him, and that he found the first man in the List to be his Son John, he then fell suddenly into a fit of fainting, which so encroased upon him, that within four days after he ended his life. So strong a Corrosive is grief of minde, when it meets with a body weakened before with sicknes. He died in Normandy, in the year 1189, when he had lived three score and one years; reigned near five and thirty: and was buried at Fons-Everard in France; the manner of whose burial was thus. He was cladeth in his Royal Robes, his Crown upon his head, white Gloves upon his hands, Boots of Gold upon his legs, Gilt Spurs at his heels, a great rich Ring upon his finger, his Scepter in his hand, his Sword by his side, and his face uncovered and all bare. As he was carried to be buried, his Son Richard in great halfe ran to see him, who no sooner was come near the body, but suddenly at his Noftrils he fell a bleeding asreath; which though it were in Prince Richard no good sign of Innocency, yet his breaking presently into bitter tears upon the seeing it, was a good sign of Repentance. It may not be unfeasible to speak in this place of a thing which of Writers speake of, that in the Famly of the Earls of Anjou, of whom this King Henry came, there was once a Prince a great Enchanter, who being on a time enforced to take the blessed Eucharist, the Suddenly flew out at the Church window, was never seen after. From this Woman these latter Earls of Anjou were descended, which perhaps made the Patriarch Heseditu lay of this King Henry's children, that from the Devil they came; and to the Devil they would. But Writers perhaps had been more compleat, if they had left this Story out of their Writings.

Men of Note in his time.

Of Clergy men, there was Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, Richard Bishop of Winchester, Geoffrey of Ely, Robert of Bath, Alfred of Worcester, all learned men, and of great integrity of life. Of Military men, there was Robert Earl of Leicester, Reynold Earl of Cornwall, Hugh Biga, Robert Ferrys, Richard Lacy, Roger Mowbray, Ralph Fuller, Ranolph Granna, William Vefci, and Reynard Bayvel; men of great achievements in War, and of no les abilities in Peace.
KING RICHARD
THE FIRST.

Of his coming to the Crown, and of his Coronation.

ING Richard, the first of that name, after his Fathers Funereal, went to Roan, where he resided the state of that Province; and from thence came into England, where he was Crowned King at Westminister, by the hands of Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, the third day of September, in the year 1189. And herein this Prince is more beholding to Writers then any of his Predecessors; for in speaking of their Crowning, they content themselves with telling where, and by whom they were Crowned: but of this Prince they deliver the manner of his Crowning, in the full amplitude of all Circumstances, which perhaps is not unfit to do, for satisfaction of such as are never like to see a Coronation; and it was in this manner. First, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Ratis Fris, and Dublin, with all the other Bishops, Abbots, and Clergy, appareled in rich Copes, and having the Cross, Holy Water, and Canvets carried before them, came to fetch him at the door of his Privy-Chamber; and there receiving him, they led him to the Church of Westminister, till they came before the high Altar, with a solemn Procession. In the middle of the Bishops and Clergy, went four Barons, bearing Candleticks with Tapers; after whom came Geoffrey de Lucy, bearing the Cap of maintenance, and John Marshal next to him, bearing a maffie pair of Spurs of Gold; then followed William Marshal, Earl of Striguil, alias Penskoc, who bare the Royal Scepter, in the top whereof was set a Crose of Gold; and William de Patricke, Earl of Salisvury going next him, bare the Warder or Rod, having on the top thereof a Dove. Then came three other Earls, David, Brother to the King of Scots, the Earl of Huntingdon, John the King's Brother, Earl of Mortagne; and Robert Earl of Leicester, each of them bearing a Sword upright in his hand with the Scabbers richly adorned with Gold. The Earl of Mortagne went in the middle between the other two; after them followed six Earls and Barons, bearing a Checker Table, upon which were set the Kings Scutcheons of Arms; and then followed William Manderel, Earl of Allemore, bearing a Crown of Gold a great height before the King, who followed, having the Bishop of Durham on the right hand, and Reynold Bishop of Bath on the left, over whom a Canopy was borne: and in this order he came into the Church at Westminister, where be-
The Life and Reign of King Richard the First

He began with his Mother Queen Eleanor, whom upon her Husband's displeasure, having been kept in prison sixteen years, he not only set at liberty, but set as great authority, as if she had been left the Regent of the Kingdom. The next he gratified was his Brother John, to whom he made appear how much the bounty of a Brother was better than the hardness of a Father; for he conferred upon him in England, the Earldoms of Cornwal, Devon, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Leicester; and by the marriage of Isabel, Daughter and Heir to the Earl of Gloucester, he had that Earldom also; as likewise the Castles of Melborne, and Langarfull, the Honours of Wifaling, Tich, and Eyr, to the value of 4000 Marks a year: an estate so great, as was able to put a very moderate mind into the humour of the rings, of which Prince should have a care. Concerning his advanced Lady Adela, it may be thought strange, that having desired her so infinitely when he could not have her, now that he might have her, he cared not for her: but the cause was known, and in every man's mouth; that she was now but his Fathers leaving: yet he would not send her hence but very rich in Jewels, to make amends, if it might be, for the loss of her Virginity; though this was somewhat hard on his part, when the Father had taken all the pleasure, that the Son should afterwards pay all the Charges. But by this at least he made a quiet way for his Marriage now concluded, and shortly after to be coniinuated in Sicily with Berengaria the Daughter of Garfas King of Navarre. And now his mind is wholly set upon his long intended Voyage to the Holy Land; for which he thinks not the treasure left by his Father to be sufficient, which yet amounted to nine hundred thousand pounds: but foregoing with himself the great charge it must needs be, to carry an Army so long a journey, he seeks to enlarge his provision of money by the means he can devise. Not long before, Hugh Pacy had been advanced to the Bishoprick of Durham; and now for a great sum of money he bold him the Earldom: and then said mildly among his Lords, Do ye not think me a cunning man, that of an old Bishop can make a young Earl? From the Londoners he drained also great sums of money, and made them recompense in Franchises and Liberties which they had not before. He made also great sales: to the King of Scots he sold the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough, for ten thousand pounds: to Godfrey de Lucie, Bishop of Winchester, the Mannors of Waregrowe and Mentz; to the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury, the Mannor of Misthal for one thousand Marks of Silver: to the Bishop of Durham, the Mannor of Sedbergh; and when it was marvelled that he would part with such things, he answered, that in this case he would sell his City of London, if he could find a Chapman. But the worst way of all was, that pretending to have lost his Signer, he made a new one; and made Proclamation, that who soever would safely enjoy what under the former Signet was granted, should come to have it confirmed within the new: whereby he raised greater sums of money to himself, but the threrez of discontentment in his Subjectes. By these, and such like means, he quickly furnished himself with money; and now it remained only to consider, to whose care he should commit the Government of the Kingdom in his absence: and after deliberation he made choice for the North parts, of Hugh Bishop of Durham; joying in Communion with him, Hugh Baldwip, and William Brunt; and for the South parts he appoints William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, and Chancellour of Englland, and for his greater strength, casteth the Pope to make him Legate of all England and Scotland; and for Normandy and Aquitaine, Robert Earl of Leicester; all men eminent for prudence and uprightness, and which is most of all, far loyalty; and indeed to make a man fit for such employment, all these virtues must concur. As for his Brother John, he knew well his aspiring mindes, and therefore would have tied him to live in Normandy, and not to come into England till his return, but that their Mother Queen Eleanor interceded, and passed her word for him: and that nothing might be left unprovided for, he appointed his Nephew Arthur, the Son of his Brother Geoffrey Duke of Britaine to be his Successor, if himself should fail. And now, Unde qui convenerat, vocat jam carolus curas, every man is ready to take Shipping, and no stay now but for a Wind; only some say that King Richard before his departing, calling his Lords and Knights unto him, and swearing them to be true, gave every of them a blue Riband to be known by; from whence the first occasion of the Order of the Garter is thought to have begun.

Of his first Alls after he was Crowned.

He leaves William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, Governor of the Kingdom, and returns to his own Affairs.

He appoints his Nephew Arthur Duke to be his Successor if himself should fail.

From whence the order of the Garter is thought to have began.

Richard having prepared an Army of thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse; and having appointed to meet Philip King of France in Sicilie, at the latter end of June, in the year 1190, he set forward himself by Land to Melfarle, and there layes till his Ships should come about: but his Navy being driven by tempest to other parts, and the King weary of long lying, after six weeks, he hirith Shipping for himself & his company, and paseth forward to Melfara in Sicilie, where arrived also the King of France, and not long after, his own Navy. In this Island the King William, now lately dead, had married Jene, King Richard's Sister, from whom Tamered the present King with held her Dowar; and therefore though he shewed King Richard fair countenance: yet he dealt feerely with with the Meflianans to use all means to get him gone: whereupon the Meflianans, taking a small occasion, set suddenly upon the English, and thritt them out of their Town. With which King Richard, justly offended, who had his Camp without the Town, prepares himself to revenge the affront: when Tancred sending to him to signifie that the affront was offered without his knowledge, and much against his liking, so pacified him, that for the present he remained satisfied: but understanding afterward, that the Meflianans did but wait their opportunity till the Spring, when King Richard should be going, he retenting their intention, stays not their leisure, but assailing the Town with Fire and Sword, in one dayes labour takes it; and had made great slaughter in it, if King Richard had not been moved to compliance with the Meflianans tears, but chiefly with King Tancred's offers; both to pay his Sister Jane her Dow'r, and to marry his Daughter to King Richard's Nephew, Arthur, Duke of Brittain, and to give a good part of the port on hand. But King Philip was notwell pleased with the conditions, yet he breaks not out to open opposition, till more he was afterward call upon the fire of his anger. In the Spring King Philip fails with his Army to Polemains (otherwise called Acon) which the Christians had long besieged, and with them be joys: while King Richard taking his Sister Jane andBerengaria the young Daughter of the King of Navares with him, in 190, Ships, and 50, Gallies, puts to Sea for the Holy Land: but it is by Tempel call upon the Coast of Cyprus, where the Islanders seeking to hinder his landing, set feet upon them with his Forces; and invading the Island, easily subdue, and brings it under his Subjection. And the King of the Countrey being taken Prisoner, and intreating King Richard not to put him in bonds of Iron, King Richard gives him his word, and keep it, but puts him in bonds of Silver. In this Island he feconized his marriage with Berengaria, and they leavi the Island, and King Richard takes Berengaries, his Lieutenant in Cyprus. King Philip, on to Polemains, which City was defended and had been besieged now two yeare: when the Enemy seeing and fearing the encrease of the Christian Forces, proposes Conditions, upon which accepted, they deliver it up in August., the year 1192.

At the taking of this Town there fell out an accident, seeming an honour to King Richard for the present, but proveing a disgrace, at left a great trouble and charge to him afterward; For Leopold Duke of Austria had first set up his colours upon the wall, which K. Richard caufed to be thrown down, and his own to be set up: but this was no place to stand a quarrelling, it came not to the reckoning till some time after. When Polemains was taken, Saladin fearing the Christians further proceeding, disposeth all the Countrey that was near it; as Perspheria, Cafetares, Aslon, Gaza: then by of Joppa. King Richard takes a care, and placeth there a Colony of Christians. For Joppa is a City of Palestine, that was built before the Flood, and hath belonging to it a Haven of great convenience. And now the King of France, though valiant enough himself, yet thinking his own great acts to be obscured by greater of King Richard's, he began, besides his old hating him, now to enve him. For indeed Emulation when it is in Vertue, makes the stronger knot of love and affection; but when it is in Glory, it makes a separation, and turns into the passion of envy and malice. And so did it with King Philip, who pretending the air of the Country, did not agree with his body; but was indeed because the air of King Richard's Glory did not agree with his minde, obtained King Richard's consent to return home, swearing first solemnly not to molest his Territories in his absence. But this fell out for the preente enterprize most unfeasibly: For the departure of the King of France, though it diminished not much the strengths, (for he left Odo Duke of Burgundy in his place) yet it diminished much the threw of affiaince. And indeed Saladin, who was at this time in terms of surrendering Jerusalem, when he saw the King of France departed, as knowing there must needs be a conclusion, where there was a beginning, doubted not but the theft would follow soon after; and therewithin flayed his hands, and grew more confident then he was before. At this time Guy of Lusignan was poffect of the City of Tyre, and with it of the right of the Kingdom of Jerusalem: with him King Richard makes an exchange, that Guy should have the Island of Cyprus, which King Richard had won, and King Richard should have the Kingdom of Jerusalem, to which Guy had a right; and upon this tide the Kings of England were filled Kings of Jerusalem a long time after, as likewise the povertie of the said Guy hath by this exchange held the Kingdom of Cyprus to this day. Now was King Richard more hot upon taking Jerusalem then ever before, and had certainly taken it, but that ill counsell diverted, because the Winter drew on; and indeed by the drawing back of Odo Duke of Burgundy, who envied that King Richard should have the honor of taking it, he removed for that season to Acre; after which time, the Enemy growing stronger, and the Christians weaker, all opportunity of taking it is utterly lost, and they could never come to the like again. And shortly after King Richard was adverisated of the King of France his invading Normandy, contrary to his Oath at his departure; which forced King Richard, much to his grief, to conclude a peace with Saladin, and that upon conditions not very honourable for the Christians: and himself prettily to return home. And so sending his wife Berengaria, and his fitter Jane, with a great part of his Army into Sicile, and from thence into England, he pafteth himself with some few in his company, by the way of Thrace, and was by Tempel brought into Dalmatia; from thence being to pass through Germany, and particularly through Duke Leopolis Countrey of Austria, he remembering the old grudge, charg'd his apparel, and travelling sometimes afoot, and sometimes on horseback, he used all means possible to keep himself from being known. But destiny is not to be avoided, for as soon as he came to Venice, partly by his name, and particularly by his expenses, it was presently known he was an English man, and wished some great man; and by and by a rumour was spread, that it was Richard King of England who finding himself... to be discovered, and no means possible to escape, he put off his disguise, putting on his princely apparel, and avows himself. Which Duke Leopold understanding, sent presently to have him apprehended: but King Richard refusing to yield himself to any, but to the Duke himself: he the Duke himself came and led him to his own Palace honourably enough, but yet strongly guarded: whereof as soon as Henry the Emperor heard, he sent with great instance to Duke Leopold to lend King Richard over to him under pretence of safer custody, but with a purpose indeed to be a sharer in his Ransome. And the Duke though well knowing his meaning, yet knowing withal that it was not safe for him to deny the Emperor, he sent him over to him; who soon after put him into a prison he had, called Trividalis, into which no man was ever known to be put that escaped with life, though done perhaps to him, but in torment, to draw the better Ransome from him. That with which King Richard was charged, beside the wrong done to Leopold, in throwing down his Colours at Promeus, was the death of Cowarde Duke of Tyre, whom they pretended King Richard had murdered. Whereas though King Richard made his innocence appear by the testimony of Limboldus, who confessed himself to have been the author of the Margueflies death; yet the pretence served to detain him in prison: and in prison indeed they kept him, till his Ransome was agreed upon and paid. Which being a hundred thousand pounds, fortifortec thousand was paid in hand, whereof two parts to the Emperor, a third part to Duke Leopold; and for the rest, hostages given to the number of fifty, of whom the Bishop of Roan was one: though the hostages afterward were delivered without paying the rest; for Henry the Emperor dying shortly after, his Successour had the confidence not to take it, as knowing it had been unjustly acted. And indeed the accidents that befell both the Emperor and the Duke Leopold, were evident demonstrations of the injustice they had done; for the Emperor shortly after died; and the Duke Leopold in a Tilting for solemnity of his Birth-day, fell off his Horse, and so broke his Leg, that to save his life, he was fain to have his Leg cut off. And now after fifteen months imprisonment, King Richard is releas'd, and returns into England four years elder then he went out; and thus ended his Journey to the Holy Land. Yet one memorable accident happening to him in the Holy Land, may not be omitted: that going one day a Hawking about Jaffa, finding himself weary, he laid him down upon the ground to sleep, when suddenly certain Turks came upon him to take him: but he awakened with their noise, rised up, gets a horseback, and drawing out his Sword, assailts the Turks, who feigning to fly, drew the King into an ambush where many Turks lay, who had certainly taken him if they had known his person; but one of the Kings Servants, called Williams de Petrellis, crying out in the Saracen tongue, that he was the King, they presently lay hold upon him, and let the King escape.

King Richard at his going out of England, had so well settled the Government of the Kingdom, that it might well have kept it in good order during all the time of his absence; but disorders are weeds which no forelight can hinder from growing having so many hands to water them: where occasions of dishaile are no sooner offered then taken; and oftentimes taken before they are offered, as was here to be seen. For King Richard had left in chief place of Authority, William Longstampe, Bishop of Ely; a man who so carried himself, that although the things he did were jufifiable; yet the pride with which he did them was unfillerable; seldom riding abroad without five hundred, some fay a thousand in his train; not for safety, but for state: and though there were other left in Authority besides himself; yet his power was so predominant, that he made of them but ciphers, and ruled all as he lift himself. This infolvency of governing was soon disfifted by many, and especially by John the Kings Brother, who counting the greatnefs of of his birth an equal match at leat with any subftitute greatnefs, affronted the Bishop in the managing of affairs in fuch fort, that while fome adhered to the one, and fome to the other, the Kingdom in the mean time was in danger to be rent asunder: till at last the Bishop finding himself too weak, or at leat fearing that he was fo, but rather indeed depofed from his Authority by the Kings Servants, and the Arch bishop of Roan put in his place, thought it best for him to file the Realm. Whereupon for his greater safety, difguifing himself in womens appa ral, and carrying a Web of Cloth under his arm, he fought in this manner to take shipping and pafs the Scafe: But being difcover'd and known, the women in revenge of the abufe done to their clathes, in making them his instruments of fraud, fell upon him, and so beat him, that it might have beaten humility into him ever after. This difgrace made him glad to get into Normandy, his native Country, where to little purpofe he wooed King Richard, and Queen Elefon for reparition. But this was but a sport in comparifon of the ftrifhes done in Normandy by Philip King of France; for fhit he invades Normandy, where he takes many Towns, and amongst others Oftefis, and draws the Kings Brother John to combine with him, promising to affift him in winning the Kingdom of England, and to have his Sifer Aleta, whom King Richard had repudiated, to be his Wife: with which promise Duke John had been enflaved, if his Mother Queen Elefon had not difflaved him. But in England Duke John took upon him as King, perfwading the people that his Brother King Richard was not living; and indeed it was eafe to remove, they knowing him to be a prifoner, to the affirming him to be dead: but such was the faithfulness of the Archbishop of Roan, and other the Princes of the Realm to King Richard, that they oppofed Duke John, and frustrated all his practices; and the Bishop of Ely had told him plainly, that though King Richard were dead, yet the fucceffion in the Kingdom belonged not to him, but to Arthur Duke of Britain, Son of Geoffrey his Elder Brother. And in these terms King Richard found his State when he returned from the Holy-Land.

His Acts and Troubles after his returning from the Holy-Land.

At his coming home from the Holy-Land, the first thing he did, was to give his Lords and people thanks for their faithfulness to his absence, and then for their readiness in furnishing him for his Ramouthe. But as for his Brother John in whom ungratefulness seemed to thrive with Ambition, which should be the greater in him, he deprived him of all those great possession he had given him: some ado he had to make to find certain pieces which he had corrupted, as the Castles of Middleborough, Lancaster, and a Fortresses at Saint Michael's Mount in Cornwall; but chiefly the Castles of Nestingham and Tickhill, which flood to firmly for Duke John, that they were not reduced to obedience without some blood, and much expence.

But his greatest trouble was with Philip King of France, in whom was so ingrained a spleen against King Richard, that he seemed to be never well but when he was working him some ill. Now therefore King Richard to make it appear he did not left the Holy War for nothing (having first obtained in Parliament a Subsidy towards his charges, and caused himself to be new Crowned at Winchester, when the King of Scort bore one of the three Swords before him) left the people through his long absence might have forgotten they had a King) he departs with a hundred Ships into Normandy; but it was withal, upon this occasion: fitting one day at dinner in his little Hall (as it was called) news was brought him, that King Philip had besieged Vernioi, with which he was so moved, that he swore a great Oath, he would not turn his face till he were revenged. Whereupon he caufed the wall right before him to be perfectly beaten down; so that he might pass forward without turning his face; and thus in haste he goes to Vernioi, whither he was no sooner come, but the King of France made as great haste to be gone, not without some loss, and more disgrace. Here his Brother John submits himself to him, and with great thun of penitence imparts his pardon, which he readily granted; saying only, with you to his chargers, and you to your tents, as I shall forget it. The King of France having left Vernioi, enters Tworino, and near to Vindocinn pitches his Tents; thither King Richard follows him, and with his coming affrighted him, that leaving Bag and Baggage, Munition, Tents, and Treasure to a marvellous value, he get him gone, and glad he was for rid of King Richard. After this a Truce was agreed upon for a year, which each of them longed till it was expired: as having no pleasure but in troubling one another. In this time there was a trouble at home, though not to the King; yet to the Kingdom. For Robin Hood, accompanied with one little John, and a hundred rout fellows more, molested all passengers upon the high-way: of whom it is said, that he was of noble blood, at least made noble, no less then as Earl, for some deferving services: but having waited his estate in riotous comets, very penury forced him to take this course. In which yet it may be said he was honestly difhon- rable; for he seldom hurt any man, never any woman, spared the poor, and only made prey of the rich; till the King letting forth a Proclamation to have him apprehended, it happened he fell sick at a certain Nunnery in Yorkshire called Birkley; and desiring there to be let blood, was betrayed, and bleed to death. Such another trouble, though not to the King, yet to the Kingdom, fell out by reason of the Jews; and at first at the Town of Linle at Nofulc, upon this occasion. A Jew being turned Christian, was perverted by those of his Nation, and as- faulted in the streets; who thereupon flying to a Church hard by was thither also followed, and the Church assaulted: which the people of the Town seeing, in succour of the new Christian, they fell upon the Jews, of whom they flew a great number, and after pillagd the houses. By this example the like affaults were made upon the Jews at Stamford, and after that at Lincoln, and lastly at Tork, where infinite number of Jews were mafficred; and some of them blocked up in the Cattle, cut: the throats of their Wives and Children, and cast them over the Walls upon the Christians heads, and then burn both the Cattle and themselves. Nei- ther could this faction be staid, till the King sent his Chancellour the B fump of Ely, with force of Arms, to punish the offenders. His last trouble was a puniment of covetousness; for one Gnodmer having found a great treasure in the Kings Dominions; and for fear of King Richard, flying to a Town of the King of France for his safeguard, was pursed by the King; but the Town denied him entrance, and he thereupon going about the Walls to finde the fittest place for assailing it, one Bertram de Gerdon, or as others call him Peter Balfe, shot at him with a Cross-Bow, and hit him on the Arm of which wounded he died within four days after, and so ended all his troubles.

Of Taxations properly so called, there were never fewer in any Kings Reign; but of ways to draw money from the Subject never more. It is true, the first money raised for his journey, was all out of his own ESTATE, by selling or pawnage of Lands; but then at his coming back, he refunded the Lands in his hands again, without paying back the money he had received. This if it may not have the name, yet certainly it had the verme of a bitter Taxation. Likewise the reigning to have lost his Seals, and then enjoyng them to have their Grants confirmed by a new; thought it went not in the number, yet it had the weight of a heavy Taxation where it lighted. Afterward, the money raised for his Ranom, was not fo properly a Taxation as a Contribution: for it for a Taxation for him, yet not by him; which was done in his absence, by the Subjects themselves. And indeed no taxations are commonly so pinch- ing, as those which are imposed upon the Sub- ject by the Subject, and such was this; for to raise money for his Raimone, there was imposed upon every Knights Fee 20s. of all Lay-mens Revenues the fourth part; and the fourth part of all the Revenues of the Clergy, with a tenth of their Goods. Also the Chalices and Treasure of all Churches were taken to make up the sum. Afterward, this only was a plain Taxation, and granted in Parliament; that of every Ploughland through England, he would have two shillings, and of the Monks Cistercians, all their Wool of that year. And one more greater then this, and was this year impoused towards his Wars in Normandy, that every Hide of Land, as much as to say, every hundred Acres of Land, should pay five shillings, which computed without deductions will rise to a sum that will seem incredible.

- "The Life and Reign of King Richard the First"

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

His Ordinances were chiefly for the Meridian of London; for where before his time the City was governed by Portgravies, this King granted them to be governed by two Sheriffs and a Mayor, as now it is. And to give the first of these Magistrates the honour to be remembered, the names of the Sheriffs were Henry Corbin, and Richard Reynor; and the name of the first Lord Mayor was Henry Fitzi-Aisin, who continued Mayor during his life, which was four and twenty years. But Fabian who was himself a Sheriff of London; and by that means most likely to know the truth, affirmed, that the Officers ordained now by King Richard, were but only two Bailiffs: and that there was no Mayor nor Sheriff of London till the tenth year of King John; and therefore at that year I will begin their Catalogue. But howsoever, now began the City first to receive the form and state of a Commonwealth, and to be divided into Fellowships and Corporations, as at this day they are: And this Franchise was granted in the year 1189. the first year of King Richard the first. He made also divers Ordinances concerning the measures of Corn, and Wine, and Cloth; and that no Cloth should any where be dyed of any other colour than black, but only in principal Towns and Cities. Also he ordained Juits and Tournements to be holden for the exercise of his Gentry in Arms.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

The Church within his own Dominions was quiet all his time, no contention with the Pope, no alterations amongst the Bishopps, no difference between the Clergy and the Laiety, or the Clergy amongst themselves: they also seemed to be asleep, till they were afterwards awakened, in the time of the succeeding King. But abroad in his time, there was an addition of three orders of Devotion; the Order of the Augustine Friars, called Friers Mendicans, begun by William of Paris; then the Orders of Friars Minor begun by St. Francis; and lastly the Orders of Friars Preachers begun by St. Dominick, though not confirmed till the first year of Pope Honorius.

Works of Piety in his time.

Orks of Piety are for the most part works of plenty, Penury may inwardly have no good wishes, but outwardly it can ex-so great a deaeth, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for 18. Shillings. pence, and then followed to great a Mortality of men, that scarce the living sufficed to bury the dead.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

He was tall of stature, and well proportioned, fair, and comely of face, of hair bright auburn, of long arms, and nimble in all his joints, his thighs and legs of due proportion, and answerable to the other parts of his Body. To speak of his moral parts, his Vices for the most part, were but only upon suspicion: Incontiguity in him much spoken of, nothing proved. But his Virtues were apparent, for in all his actions he shewed himself Valiant (from whence he had the appellation or surname of Caesar de Lion) Wise, liberal, Merciful, Just, and which is most of all, Religious. A Prince born for the good of Christendom, if a Bar in his Nativity had not hindered it. The remorse for his unfaithfulness towards his Father, was living in him till he died; for at his death he remembered it with bewailing, and desired to be buried as near him as might be, perhaps as thinking they should meet the sooner, that he might ask him forgiveness in another world.

He died of a wound with an Arrow in his arm, shot at him by one Bertrand, or Peter Bofle, which neglected at first, and suffered to rankle, or as other say, ill handled by an unskilful Chirurgeon, in four days of brought him to his end. But his Charity deferves to have it remembered, that finding himself past hope of Recovery, he causeth the party that had wounded him to be brought before him: who being asked what moved him to do his Faft answer, that King Richard had killed his Father and two of his Brothers with his own hand, and therefore he would do it if it were to do again.

Upon this insolent answer, every one looked the King should have cenfured him to some terrible punishment; when contrary to all their expectations, in a high degree of Charity, he not only freely forgave him; but gave a special charge he should be set at Liberty, and that no man should dare to do him the least hurt; commanding besides to give him a hundred Shillings for his pains. An act that well shewed he had been at the Holy-Land, or rather indeed that he was going to it. But Polychronion saith, that after King Richard was dead, the Duke of Brabant who was then present, caused the said Bertrand to be hanged quick, and then to be hanged. He died the sixth day of April, in 1199, when he had lived 44 years, reigned nine, and about nine months, and had his body buried at Font-Everard, by his Father: his heart at Rome, in the remembrance of the hearty love that City had always borne him; and his bowels, at Chalons, for a disgrace of their unfaithfulness: others say at Carlisle in England.

Men of Note in his time.

In his time were famous, Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, who followed King Richard into the Holy-Land, and dyed there; Hubert the Succeeded him; Hugh Bishop of Lincoln; William Bishop of Ely, a man equally famous and infamous; also Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, a learned Writer in Divinity; Daniel Morley, a great Mathematician; John de Hemburgh, and Richard de Hermeburn, two notable Historians; Guillemus Stephanides, a Monk of Canterbury, who wrote much in the praise of Archishop Becket; also one Richard Divisienfet, Nicholas Walkington, and Robert de Bella Favo, an excellent Philosopher. Of Martial men, Robert Earl of Leicester; Ranulph de Falghers; two of the Bardolphs, Hugh and Henry; three Williams, Marshall, Ewancl and Mandevel, with two, Robert, Rof, and Severile.

KING JOHN.

ING Richard being dead, the right of succession remained in Arthur, Son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, elder Brother to Earl John; but John as thinking the title of Arthur but a Ceremonie in State, and not for every one's capacity, at least in common sense not so plain as his own, who was the Son of a King, and Brother to a King, ascends into the Throne as confidently as if he had no competitor: Only Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury went before, and made an Oration in his behalf, wherein seeking to do him justice he did him indeed a wrong; for waving his right of succession, he inflicted wholly upon their right of Election, whereof would follow, that as they brought him in, so they might call him out; of which error when he was told, he said, he did it of purpose to make King John the more careful of his Government, by making him sensible upon what an unsure ground his Regality stood. King John refiled it, but seeing it to serve his turn for the present, he took it not ill, as knowing that his turn once served, he could afterward be his own carver of what title he pleased; and so upon Ascension day in the year 1199, he was Crowned King at Westminster, with more solemnity then joy: many prefaging by their countenances and more in their minds, that all would not long be well. It cannot be denied, but that in moral circumstances Earl John had the advantage of his Nephew Arthur; for he was a man of thirty years fit to govern, Arthur but a child, not thirteen years old: he a Native, at least always bred up in the Kingdom, Arthur a Foreigner, and had never been here; he well known both to the Nobility and People, Arthur a Stranger to both, as one they had never seen. And besides these moral advantages, he had now added one from the Politicks, that he had gotten possession, (of more force in the practical part then all the former) and withal a greater then all these, if it be true which some write, that his Brother King Richard had affirmed him his Succesour after his decease. But yet knowing the Title at laft would come to be tried in a Court, where the Sword must be Judge, he implanteth all his endeavours to get this Judge to be his Friend, and by all means possible to strengthen himself with Arms; and thereupon going to Chino and Rouen, he feiteth upon the Treasure which his Brother had left in those parts, and with it gets Friends and Souliders, the Armour of Arms. And indeed all he could have done himself would have done him no good, if he had not had the help of able Assitants, who yet assisted him no less for their own ends then for his. And there were chiefly his Mother Queen Eleanor, who knew if her Grand-son Arthur should be King, that then his Mother Constance would rule all, at least during his Minority; and thereby her selfe be put from the stage of all Authority: and the Archbishop Hubert, who also knew that if Arthur should come to reign, that then the Angles and French should have all the best Offices, and the English wholly be neglected, as it was in the time of King William the Conquerour. And yet a greater friend then both the; for coming to Rouen, he used means, that Walter the Archbishop in the Cathedral Church with great pomp girt him with the Duxal Sword of Normandy, and adorned him with a Coronet of Golden Roses, he taking his Oath for faithful Administration in that Duke-dom, and they their Oath for being Loyal Subjects.

Though King John had entred upon Normandy, and made that Province fire unto him; yet the Province of Anjou stood firm for a Arthur, in observance of their love to his Father their former Prince; which also King John soon after invading, reduced by force of Arms to his obedience. And now Constance the Mother of Prince Arthur, finding King John too powerful an adversary, and no likelihood for her party, to be able long to stand out against him without further assistance, conceives it her best way to have recourse to the King of France, and thereupon committs her Son Arthur to his tutition; who seemed to receive him with the tenderness of a Father, and promised to affit him with his uttermost Forces, in the recovery of his Right both in France and England. Here we may observe upon what hinge the afections of the Kings of France were used to turn. For in King Henry the Second's time, King Lewis of France was so great a friend to his Son Richard, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Father; afterward when Richard was King, then Philip King of France was so great a Friend to John, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Uncle; and no doubt if Arthur should ever have come to be King, he would have been as ready to help any other to get the Kingdom from him; by which it appears, that it was not the persons of Men they either hated or loved, but that they were always jealous of their growing too great.
...and indeed this ballancing of States keeps Princes affections always in suspense, and never suffers the Glass of their Love or Hate, to make a true Reflection. About this time William King of Scots came to London to visit King John, and there did homage to him for his Kingdom of Scotland, though some lay, but only for the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland; but being required aid against the French, he excused himself, saying he could not do it without consent of his Kingdom, and so returned home.

And now Philip King of France having undertook the protection of the young Prince Arthur, with a mighty Army enters Normandy, takes many of the bold Towns, and pursuing his Victories, enters the Province of Anjou also, and recover it from King John, which he the year before had gotten from Prince Arthur. Upon this King John makes a journey into Normandy, acceding Philip for the breaking the Truce, which he had formerly made with King Richard for five years. But when he should come to make his Accusation good by Arms, he fell to Treaties, and obtained a new Truce for fifty days; with which new Truce, Baldwin Earl of Ponthiers, who had professed himself of that side, was not well pleased; and thereupon came to King John to Essex, and entreating him to break this Truce, and sent him to him how to proceed, when the fifty days should be expired. This consultation the King of France understood; and thereupon both sides prepare for war, but at the end of the Truce, both sides seemed to relent, and divers meetings were had for Treaties of Peace: and in conclusion, King John more desirous of Peace then he was for his Honour, agreed to the conditions, that his niece Eleanor, Daughter of Alphonse King of Caffile by his sister Eleanor, should marry with Lewis King Philip's Son, who should have with her in Dover, besides thirty thousand Marks in Money, all those Cities, except only Angiers, which the French before that time had taken, which were many and very great. And this Peace thus made, he returns into England with great joy, but was not with the like joy received of the English Lords, who counted themselves dishonoured, in the dishonourable conditions he had made, and Baldwin Earl of Ponthiers also, when he saw the poor spirit of King John, to defend to such base conditions, left his party; and entering league with the King of France, disposed himself for the Holy War.

But King John having now gotten a Vacation, and a time of ease, which agreed much better with his nature then War, sets his mind wholly upon pleasures; and for maintaining his pleasures, upon seeking after profit, which he pursues by all manner of injustice, under the name of Prerogative: and with such violence, that when his Brother Geoffrey Archbishop of York, in the durefulness of a Counsellor, advised him not to take such unlawful courtesies, he most unworthily took from him all he had, and it was a years work for all the Archbishop's friends to pacifie his anger. In the neck of this injustice, he committs another, she procures a divorce from her Wife Alien, the Daughter of Robert Earl of Gloucester, only for being of kin to him in the third degree; and by advice of the King of France, marries Isabel Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Anglois, advanced before to Hugh de Brou Earl of March: and shortly after brings her with him into England, where he and she together, are both Crowned at Canterbury. And here the Earls and Kings of the Realm, being all summoned to attend the King into France at Verus side following, they all by a general consent sent him words, that unless he would restore them their Rights and Liberties, they would do him no service out of the Kingdom. But what it was that made the Lords more violent in pressing their demands at this time then before, no Writers of these times do sufficiently deliver: only some of them speak scatteringly of certain oppressions (besides the general grievance for Exactions) lately offered to some of the Lords; one to the Earl of Chester, whom he would have banished, only for advising him to leave his cruelest and incontinency; another, a pursuht in Love to a Daughter of Robert Fitz-Water, called Maud the Fair, who not consenting to the King's lust, a messenger was sent to give her poxion in a patched Egg, whereof she died: And a third, offered to William de Broune and his Lady, for a rash word spoken, for when the King went to have de Broune's Lady for a pledge, the Lady answered, We shall do well indeed to commit our Son to his keeping, who kept so well his own Nephew Prince Arthur. This rash word cost de Broune his Country, and his Lady and their Son their lives, both of them being famished to death in Prison. For, though these directly were but particular grievances, yet reflecting they were general, what one suffered, all might; but whether any of these, or all of these together, were Ingredients to make a Compound of violence in the Wars at this time, or whatsoever was the true cause, this was plainly the effect, that unless the King would restore their Liberties, they would not follow him out of the Kingdom. But notwithstanding this refusal of his Lords, he paffeth over with his Queen into Normandy: and from thence to Paris, where the King of France receives them with all complements of Love and Amity. But now Hugh Earl of March, refraining the injury done him by King John, in taking away his affiliated Wife, joyous with Prince Arthur; and the King of France also, for all his fair shew of amity lately made, joyous with them, as having sometyme before married his youngest Daughter to Prince Arthur, and these with their Forces joyed, invade first the Turones, and then the Anjouins, of which Province, Queen Eleanor, the King's Mother was left Regent: who thereupon betakes her self to Mirabel the strongest Town of those parts, and sends to her Son King John, acquainting him with the danger that was in, and requiring his speedy succour. When in the mean time Prince Arthur takes the City, and in it his Grandmother Queen Eleanor, whom he used with greater reverence and respect than he expected. But King John at the hearing hereof, was so moved, calling the French King ungrateful and perfidious for succouring Prince Arthur, contrary to his League, that...
The Reign of King John.

Rudeyng prently the art of revenge, he fell upon a stragelam, of all other the moost prudent against an Enemy. For a Surprize in War is like an Apopeyve in the body, which strikes with our giving warning for defence. And this Stragelam at this time King John put in practixe; for travelling night and day with indefatigable labour, he came upon his enemies before they were aware, and during upon them unprovided, it was rather an execution then a battle: and they who remained unlaine were taken prifoners, amongst whom Prince Arthur himself, who committed prently to the custody of Robert de Veygant in Roan, lived not long after. Whether it were, that attempting to make escape, he fell down from the walls of his Prifon, and was drowned in the River Seine, as some say: or whether it were that through anguish of mind he fell sick and dyed, as others say: or whether indeed he was made away by King John, as the common fame went, Certain it is, that he forfuvd his imprisoned but a very few dyes. But though he were gone, yet his Sifter Eleanor, a preceding Competitor to King John was still remaining; Her therefore, at this time also King John feized upon, and commits her in safe custody to Briffon Castle, where after she had lived long, she died.

Of his Troubles after the death of his Nephew Arthur.

King John being now freed from his Competitor, one would think he should have ended all his troubles: but like a Hydra's head, they rather multiplied upon him. For they who had been so ready to affit Prince Arthur in his life, were now as ready to revenge his death. And firstly, Conffance his Mother comes to King Philip, with open exclamation against King John, accusing him with the murder of her Son, and with all the inflance of Tears and Intreaties, solicits him to revenge it. Hereupon King Philip summons King John to appear at a day; and because he appeared not according to the tenet of his Homage, it was decreed against him, that he had forfeited all the prerogative of his Eifate in France: and thereupon King Philip with mighty Forces invaded his Territories, takes many Towns of principal conquence, while King John lived idle at Roan, no more regarding it, then if it had not at all concerned him. And when some of his Lords seemed to marvel what he meant, to fuffer the French to rob him of such good Cities. You say true indeed (saith he) for it is but Robbery; and within a few dyes you shall fee, I will make them reforme them with ufarly. In this flighting humour he returns into England, where he looks not after the levying of Souldiers, or the raising of an Army, as this cafe required, but connotes his old course for raising of money, accufing sometimes one of his Lords, sometimes another, as it were their fault that he had loft these Towns in France. And upon these accusations made many of them pay great sums of money, which brought him not only into hatred at home, but into contempt abroad; for the King of France understanding his unworthy coueries, proceeds more violently in his Invasions, then before, getting Falais, Domfront, and all the good Towns of Normandy, but only Roan. And at laat, though Roan was a Town strongly fortified with Walls, and more strongly with the faithful hearts of the inhabitants; yet finding no hope of succour from King John, it was forced for want of Virtuus to submit itself to the King of France. Whose example all the other Cities followed, and so all Normandy returned to the subjection of the French, after thee hundred and sixteen years that Rollo the Dane had fribish them.

It was now the year 1205, and the birth of King John's reign, about which time, the two props of his Eifate, or rather indeed, the two bridles of his intemperacy died, his Mother Queen Eleanor, whose virtues had oftimes qualified the vices of her Son; and Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, who repented him at his death of nothing more, then that he had been an Instrument of bringing him to the Crown. And now King John being a subfubitive of himself, hath a device in his head to make his Subjects as willing to give him money as he was to have it. For knowing the great discontentment they all had for their losses in France, he gives it out, that he would prentely raife an Army for recovery of those losses, if he might have money to go about it: whereupon, never was money given with more aclarity. And as soon as he had it, he instantly went to Pifermon, and there he ordered Shipping before it was possible for his Lords and others to be in readiness to accompany him; and failing forward some certain Eages into the Sea, upon a sudden he returned back again, and then lays the fault upon his Lords, that had not followed him: and for this backwaund of theirs, imposed afterwards great Fines upon them; by which means he gets money no lefs by pretence of his not going, then he had done before by pretence of his going. About this time died Geoffry Fiz-Peter Juffitiar of England, who while he lived kept the King in some awe; in so much, as hearing he was dead, he swore by the feet of God, that now at length he was King of England, and with great rejoicing said to some Lords about him: Now when this man comes into Hell, let him salute the Archbishopa Hifters, whom certainly he shall find there. But Philip King of France, intending to leave the English nothing on that face, sent forthed Chimb, and takes it; and in the valiant Admiral Roger Lucy, which had given a period to King Philip's victories, had not Guide, the husband of Conffance Prince Arthur's Mother, revolted to King John. Who with his affiance once again levies an Army, befeigte Mount Auban, a Castle thought impregnable; and within fifteen dices takes it, which Charles the Great could not get with his seven years siege: where fo great a number of French Lords were taken prifoners, that King John sent a Catalogue of their names into England, for a memorial of so great a victory. After this, he taketh the strong Town of Angiers, and utterly defaced it; for which afterward he was forry, as being the Town where he was born. But now when the two Kings were ready to meet, and to give battle, interpolated was made by friends of both sides, and thereupon Peace concluded for two years, and King John returned into England.
King John, being returned, performs no less worthy Acts at home, then he had done in France; for first he invades the Borders of Scotland, and brings Alexander King of Scots to do him homage; and then undertaking many of the King of Scotland to be revolted, he pañes over to Dublin, and reduceth them to his obedience; and then placing John Bishop of Norwich Governor there, he returns into England: where pañing through Wales, he subdueth certain Rebels there, and takes eight and twenty children of the best Families for pledges of their future loyalty: but he himself/have a mind to make a motion, and rebelled again, he was so incensed, that he would not go to dinner, till he had beard the twenty eight children to be all hanged before his face. So inconsiderate a thing is the deñe of revenge, that it makes no difference between innocency and guïñines; though indeed a thing oftertimes must be done for example, which considered in itself, would be forborne.

It was now the year 1214, and the fourteenth of King John's reign, when he going to Angiers, strongly repaired it, and the province of Poitou revolted to him: which Lewis King Philip's Son understanding, comes upon them with a mighty Army, and uses much feverity upon the Authors of the revolt, takes prisoners, Reynold Earl of Bologna, and William Earl of Salisbury, with many other of King John's Captains, and defeated his whole Army. Whereof when King John was certified he grew in a manner deñerate; and as a man dejected, makes a new Truce upon any conditions with the King of France, and returns into England: where he finds a worse burthen ready to entertain him. For the Lords of the Realm having often required their ancient Rights and Liberties; and finding nothing but delations, endure no longer to be abused: but meeting at St. Edmundsbury, there they confer how they may finde a remedy to redres this evil; and at last concluded to go to the King themselves in person, and make their demands; whereof a Charter was produced, that had been formerly granted in King Henry the first's time. Whereupon coming to the King after Christmas, lying then in the New Temple, and acquainting him with their demands, he gives them this fair Answer, that within a few days he would give them satisfaction; and cañeth the Bishops of Canterbury and Ely, with William Marshal, Earl of Gloucester to pass their words for him that it should be performed. But the King meaning nothing less then to do as he said, and presently a levying of Southerns, which the Lords understanding, they all did the like; and going to the Bishop of Canterbury, deliver him a Copy of their Demands, and requiring the King's Answer: But the Bishop shewing it to the King, and humbly intreating him to give the Lords a satisfactory Answer, he swore a great Oath, they might as well demand the Kingdom; and that he would die before he would yield to any such demands. Whereupon the Lords (knowing now what they were to expect) fall to besieging Northampton, and after that, Bedford, which is yielded to them; and withall they are sent to the Londoners to signify their readiness to join with them. At this time the King was at Windor providing an Army, but hearing the Londoners were joyned with the Lords, he thought it no good way to proceed by force, but rather by fraud: and thereupon sends to the Lords, that if they would come to him to Windor, he would grant their demands. The Lords coming thither, but in a Military manner, (for they durst not trust his word) the King fañed them all kindly, and promised to give them satisfaction in all they demanded; and so in a Meadow between Windor and Stanes, called Running mead, he freely conferred to confirm their former Liberties; and was content some grave pledges should be sworn. But the next day, when it should be done, he gets him gone to Southampton, and from thence to the Isle of Wight, where advising with his Council, what in this case was fittest to be done, it was concluded he should send to the Pope, to acquaint him with this mutiny of the Lords, and to require his help: while the King in the mean time lived skulking up and down in corners, that no man might know where to find him: or which is worse (as some write) roving about and practising Piracy. And now the Lords begin to suspect fraud, when shortly after the Kings meñagiers who were Walter and John, Bishops of Worcester and Norwic, return with the Popes Decree, which was, that the Kings grant to the Lords should be void. With this Decree, the King after three moneths that he had thayed in the Isle of Wight, coming back to Windor, acquires the Lords; but they accusing the Mediegers for false informing the Pope, and the Pope also for making a Decree without hearing both sides, betake them to Arms, and swear by the holy Altar to be revenged for this Indifñication and injurious dealing. The King finding the Lords nothing moved with the Popes Decree, sends again unto him, to acquaint him with it; who mightily incensed to have his Decree so lighted, adjudgeth then all to be held as enemies of Religion: and gives power to Pope Bishop of Wincheñer, and to the Abbot of Reading to Excommunie them. In the mean time the King had sent the Bishop of Wincheñer, Chancellor of England, and others with his Seal, to hire Souldiers from the parts beyond the Seas; who returning shortly after, bringeth along with him out of Poitou and Gascony, Savory de Malton, Griffy and Oliver Bateole, Brothers; and under their conduct do great a cable, that with these Forces, within half a year the King had gotten all the Castles of the Barons, to the borders of Scotland. And now he divided his Army, committing part of it to his Brother William, Earl of Salisbury, and others to set upon London; and with the other part he goes himself into Yorkshire, where most of the Lords had poñission, which in most cruel manner were destroyed with fire and fawd. The Lords being thus on all sides disßerted, resolve upon a course, neither honourable nor safe; yet such as necessity made them both: they sent to Philip, King of France, requiring him to fend over his Son Lewis to their aid, and promising they would submit themselves to be governed by him, and take him for their Sovereign. To this motion of the Lords, King Philip was as forward as themselves; which King John understanding, sends...
The Reign of King John.

The year 1199, beginning with the Peace of Leau, and the reception of Prince Louis of France, and the visitation of the Church by the Popes, is remarkable for another cause, the importunity of the Popes to affect a greater degree of independence of the Hindostan, and the intrigues of the Pisans, with the ambition of the Genoese, and the want of cooperation of the Venetians, to check the designs of the Genoese.

Of his Taxes.

He was the first that appointed the Forms of Civil Government in London, and other Cities, endowing them also with their great Franchises. The first that caused sterling money to be here coined. The first that ordained the honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earls. The first that fetled the rates and measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such other necessaries of Commerce. The first that planted English Laws and Offices in Ireland. The first that enlarged the Royal style with the Lord of Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdom, and fastened Wales to the Crown of England.

Affairs of the Church in birttime.

After the death of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the Monks of that Covent secretly in the night, elected one Reginald their Sub-prior to succeed him; and caused him to go to Rome for confirmation: but afterward doubting how the King would take it, being done without his knowledge, they crave leave of
the King to chuse a fit man, the King is content to allow them the election, but requires himself to have the Nomination, and thereupon commands unto them John Grey Bishop of Norwich, whom he specially favoured, and accordingly the Monks elect him. But the matter being afterward referred to the Pope, which of these two elections should stand good, after many allegations of both sides, the Pope to shew himself indifferent to both, disallows them both, and nominates a third man, one Stephen Langton, Cardinal of St. Chryfogone, an English man born, and a man of great learning. The Monks admit him, but the King opposeth it. And now as it were, a Prize began to be played between the two Swords, the Spiritual and the Temporal: but he that used the Spiritual Sword, proved so much the better Fencer, that he disarmed the other, and took away his Temporal Sword from him. It is true, in the first Venue, the King gave the Pope as good as he brought; for as the Pope threatened to interdict the Kingdom; so the King threatened the Pope to millifie his authority, and to banish the Clergy men out of the Realm. In the second Venue, as the Pope acted as much as he had threatened, (for he interdicted the Kingdom:) So the King performed as much as he had spoken; (for he drove the Monks out of their Cloiftons) yet at last when Pandulphus the Popes Legate came into England, and made appear to the King in what great danger he stood; First, of the King of France, by Invasion; and then of his own Subjects, by Rebellion; for both which, there was no other help but reconciement with the Pope; he so touched him to the quick, that he made him leave his great words, and fall to asking forgiveness. So as taking off the Crown from his head, he laid it down at Pandulphus feet, to be disposed of, as the Pope should please. And Pandulphus took not to take up his Crown, and to keep it three or four days in his hands before he restored it; and did not then neither, but upon condition that he and his Successors should hold the Kingdom of the See of Rome, at the annual tribute of a Thoaffand Marks. And all those three or four days, in which Pandulphus kept the Crown, it might be truly said the King- dom was without a King. And upon this, no doubt it was that Peter an Hermit in a Prophetical Rapture had given out some time before, that by Anejation day, there should be no King of England. Which though in some fort it was true, yet because in some fort it was not true; and it was in the Prerogative of the King to make his own interpretation, it coft the poor Hermit and his Son their lives, and they receiv'd as a pillar of Salt, to make men take heed of Lawns and Scolding, and of playing the Critics in matters of State.

But by this means the Kingdom was released of the Interdictiion, which had continued six years, three months, and fourteen days: During all which time, there was no publick exercise of Religion: no Churches open, no Ecclesiatical Sacraments adminiftr'd, but only to them that are in danger of death, and baptifm to children, all that died were buried like Dogs in Ditches and corners, but only such as had purchased or procured licence from the Pope.

In this Kings reign,Saint Dominiccontinued his preaching ten years together against the Albigensiat; so called because they began first in the City of Alba. Also in his time Saint Francis renounced the World; and when a Priest to whom he offered it, would not take his money, he call it away, and entred into a vow of perpetual Poverty. Also in this Kings time, was held the Latrun Council, under Pope Innocent the third, in which was established the Popes power over Princes, and in matters of Faith, Auricular Confeffion, and Transubfanta-

I Need not relate a Speech of his, though very unchristian, that having been a little before reconciled to the Pope, and then taking an overthrow in France, in great anger he cryed out, that nothing had prospered with him since the time he was reconciled to God and the Pope. Nor another speech of his, which though spoken merrily, was in good earnest very irreligious, that being on a time a hunting, at the opening of a fat Buck, he said: See how this Deere hath prospered; and how far he is, and yet I dare swear he never heard Male: It is sufficient to relate one act of his, (if it be fome which write) that being in dif-

Brelfs, he sent Thomas Hardington and Ralph Fitz-Nichols Knights, in Emballage to Miramunilation King of Africa and Morocco, with offer of his Kingdom to him, upon condition he would come and aid him; and that if he prevailed, he would himself become a Mahometan, and renounce the Chrillian Faith. Though some there be that fay, All there were but fable crimiinations charged upon him by Monks that did not love him. But though we believe not these things of him; yet to suffer his Kingdom to stand interdicted for many years together, upon so small occasion as he did, was certainly no good sign of Religion in him. Yet one act he did, wherein he shewed a fpeech to Religion, by the honour he did to Religious men. For Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, lying very fick, he not only went to visit him; but being dead was one of the three Kings, (the other two were

William King of Scotland and the King of South-wales,) that carried his Heroe upon their Shoulders, till they delivered it to the Peers, and the Peers afterward to the Archbishops and Bishops, to carry it into the Quire.

Works of 'Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

Y Et did this King leave more works of Piety behind him, then all his Subjects that were in his time, For he founded the Abbey of Berewick in the new Forrest in Hampshire: also an Abbey of black Monks in the City of Winc-sborough, and the Monastery of Fawndon, and the Monastery of Heles-Owen in Shropfri: he re-edified Gelshof and Wresel, and enlarged the Chappel of Knarshow. Now for his Subjects, only Richard Prior of Bermondfey built an Houfe against the wall of the said Houfe of Bermondsey, called Almar yor Hospitall of Converts and Children, in honour of St. Thomas. In this Kings time St. Mary Overies in Southwark was begun to be builded, and the Stone Bridge over the Thames, was by the Merchants of London finished. Also Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, Founded a Mon-nastery at Wet Derhams in Norfolk, which upon the dissilution came to the family of the Derhams, who hold it to this day.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

In this Kings time, five and thirty of the most substantial Citizens of London, were chosen out, and called the Council of the City, and the King gave the City liberty to alter their Major and Sheriffs every year, which before continued during life. He called the Laws of England to be executed in Ireland, and money to be coined there according to the weight of English money.

Of his Wives and Children.

Ing John lived to have three Wives. His first was Alice Daughter of Hubert Earl of Morton, who left him a Widow with out issue.

His second was Avice Daughter and Heir of Robert Earl of Gloucester, by whom he issue neither, divorced from her by reason of Confin-quity in the third degree. His third Wife was Isabel Daughter and Heir of Aymer Earl of Angoulême, affianced before to Hugh de Brau, Earl of March. By this Wife he had two Sons,

Henry and Richard, and three Daughters, Jane, Eleonor, and Isabel; Henry succeeded him in the Kingdom; Richard was Earl of Cornwall, and Crowned King of the Romans, and had issue

Henry and John, that dyed without issue: also

Edward Earl of Cornwall, and others. Jane his eldest Daughter married to Alexander the second, King of Scots, dyed without issue. Ele-nor the second Daughter (married to Simon Earl of Leicester) had issue; Henry, Simon, Almarick, Guy, Richard, and Eleanor. Henry hain without issue. Simon Earl of Bigorre, and an-cellor to a Family of the Montforts in France.

Armareck, first a Priest, after a Knight. Guy

Earl of Anjou in Italy, and Prenitour of the Montfort in Twysenford, and of the Earls of the Campo Buoni in the Kingdom of Naples.

Richard, remaining privily in England, and changing his name from Montfort to Welleburn, was anscellour of the Welleburns in England. Elleonor, born in England, brought up in France, married into Wales, to Prince Lewis ap Griffith.

Isabel, his youngest Daughter, married to the Emperor Frederick the second, had issue; Henry, appointed to be King of Sicily, and Margaret Wife of Albert Lamagru of Thurin. She dyed in Childbed, after the had been Empefes six years. He had also two natural Sons, Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, and Richard, that married the Daughter and Heir of Fulbert de Devon, (who built Childbed Castle) and had issue by her, of whom some Families of good account are descended.

Also one bafe Daughter named Joan, married to Lowelin Prince of Wales.

Of his Perseverance and Conditions.

He was of nature indifferent tall, and something fat, of a lowre and angry countenance; and concerning his conditions, it may be said, that his Nature and his Fortune did not well agree: For naturally he loved his ease, yet his Fortune was to be ever in action. He won more of his enemies by surprizes then by battles, which shows that he had more of Lightning in him then of Thunder. He was never so true of his word as when he threatened,because he meant always as cruelly as he spake, not always as gracioysly; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to perform, must have looked upon his promises. He was neither fit for Prosperity nor Adversity: For prosperity made him insolent, and adversity dejected; a mean Fortune would have found a way to get along with him. He was all that he was by Fists; Sometimes doing nothing without deliberation, and sometines doing all upon a sudden: Sometimes very Religious, and sometimes scarce a Chris-itian. His unfruitablenes of money was not so much, as that no man knew what he did with its gotten with much noise, but spent in silence.

He was but intertemperate in his bett temper, but when discontented with sicknes most of all, as appeared at his lieft; when being in a Feaver, he would needs be eating of raw Peaches, and drinking of sweet Ale. If we look upon his works, we must needs think him a worthy Prince; but it upon his actions, nothing les: For his works of Piety were very many, as hath been shewed before; but as for his actions, he nei-er came to the Crown by Justice, nor held it with honour, nor left it in Peace. Yet having had many good parts in him, and especially having his Royal Politerry continued to this day, we can do no les but honour his memory.

Casualties that happened in his time:

Of the Casualties we might count disatifis, if it had nor had relation to our selves: For Hugh de Bones coming to aid King John with threecore thousand out of Britain and Plunders, by misfortune at Sea were all drowned, to whom the King had granted Norfolk and Suffolk for the people he had brought with him to inhabit.

In this Kings time were great thunders and lightnings, and flowers with hail-flones as big as Goose-eggs. Fishes of strange shape were taken in England, armed with helmets and shields, and were like unto armed Knights, favaging that they were far greater in proportion.

About Maidstone in Kent a certain Monister was found strucken with the lightning, and the Monster had a head like an Aife, a belly like a man, and all other parts far differing from any other creature. Also in Suffolk was taken a fift in form like to a man, and was kept fix months upon land with raw flesh and fish; and then,for that they could have no speech of it, they caft it into the Sea again.

Of his Death and Burial.

When Prince Lewis of France was come into England, and was received by the Lords and by the Londners, King John with an Army went into the North-parts, and coming to Walpou, where he was to pafs over the Wolve, he lent one to search where the water was passible,

able, and there himself with some few paffeth over, but the multitude with all his Carriages and Treasure falling without order they cared not where, were all drowned. With the grief of which diftroller, and perhaps distempered in his body before, he fell into a Feaver, and was lert blood: but keeping an ill diet, (as indeed he never kept good) eating green Peaches, and drinking sweet Ale, he fell into a fofens, and grew prefently too weak, that there was much ado to get him to Newmarket, where soon after he dyed. Though indeed it be diverfily related: Caxton faith he was pofioned at Stowe nuftead Abbey by a Monk of that Cotvent; the manner and caufe this. The King being there, and hearing it fpoken how cheap corn was, should fay, he would ere long make it dearer, and make a penny loaf be fold for a fhillng. At this speech the Monk took fuch indignation, that he went and put the pofion of a Troll into a cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him there was fuch a cup of Wine as he had never drunk in all his life: and therewithal took the effay of it himfelf, which made the King to drink the more boldly of it; but finding himfelf prefently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him, that he was fallen down dead; then (faith the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much. Others fay the pofion was given him in a drif of Pears. But the Phyfician that dif-bowelled his body found no fign of pofion in it, and therefore not likely to be true. But however the manner of his death be uncertain, yet this is certain, that at this time and place he dyed, on the 29 day of October, in the year 1216, when he had reigned fourteen years and fix moneths; lived one and fifty. He was buried, his bowels at Caxton Abbey, his body at Worfeer, under the High Altar, wrapped in a Monks Cowf, which the Superfition of that time accounted sacred, and a defenfative again all evil fpirits.

Of the Prices of things in his time.

Neither is this unfit to be recorded in Chron- nicles, to the end comparifon may be made between the time past and the prefent: as in the time of King Henry the fecond, a Quarter of Whear was fold for twelve pence, a Quart of Beans or Oats for a great. Neither is the price of filver it felf much les altert; for an ounce of filver was then valued at ninety pence, which is now valued at lefit at five fhilling$. Whereof Phyficians muft tell the reffon; for fearefcracy makes things dear? why should not plain make them cheap?

Of Men of special Note in his time.

In Military matters there were many famous men in his time, as Robert Fitz-Roger, and Richard Mont-Fitchet, with many others; but chiefly two, who acts made them specially memorable: the one was Hubert Earl, whom King John had left Governor of Dover-Caftle; of whom it is related, that when Prince Louis of France came to take the Town, and found it difficult to be taken by force, he sent to Hubert, whole Brother Thomas had taken Prisoner a little before; that unless he would surrender, the Castle, he should prefently fee his Brother Thomas be put to death with exa-ter tormentions before his eyes: but this threat-ing moved not Hubert at all, who more regarded his own loyalty, then his Brothers life. Then Prince Louis fent again, offering him a great fum of money; but neither did this move but he kept his loyalty as inexpuable as his Cattle. The other was Robert Fitz-Water, of whom it is related, that King John being with an Army in France, one of his Knights in a great bravery, would needs make a challenge to any of the French Camp, that durft encouner him in a Combat; when prefently comes forth this Robert Fitz-Water, and in the encounter threw Horfe and Man down to the ground: whereof when King John heard, B; God meth (faith he) he was a King indeed that had fuch a Champion; whereupon fome that stood by, faying to him, He is Sir, a fervant of your own, it is Robert Fitz-Water, whom you have bani-ished. Whereupon his fentence of banifhment was prefently reverfed, and the King received him, as he well deferved, into fpecial favour. In matter of Literature also there lived many famous men in this Kings reign; as Geoffrey Vinesufis, Simon Fraxinus, altis Ah, Adam De-ronisus, John de Oxford. Colman furnamef the Wife, Richard Canonis, William Peregrinus. A-tene Tewinburnus, Georgius Dudderus, John Han-wil, Nigel Werks, Gilbert Holland, Sir at Pediborough, William Parsons a Monk of Newlurgh, Roger Haveden, Hubert Walter Archibishop of Canterbury, Alexander Theologus, Gratianus Tiburius, Gyrolus Combruis, Johannes Dovmis, Walter Mapis, Radulphus de Dicta, Gilbert Le-gly, Mauritius Morganus, John de Fordeham, William Leefcer, Jofeline Brekeland, Roger of Croyland, Hugh White, alias Candius, who wrote an History, intituled, Historia Peurbrongensis? John de Saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray, an Historiographer, and Bishop of Norwich, Walter de Coventry, Radulphus Niger, and lately Simon Thurwyg, who for his pride in Learning, but more for his blasphemies again all Myef and Christ, became at first so utterly ignorant, that hardly he could read a letter of the Book. One yet remains that must not be forgotten, Hugo Carthubinus Bishop of Lincoln, whose Miracles, as Matthew Paris writs, made him famous in thofe days: and the Works he hath left behind him, famous in thofe.

To this time the City of London had been governed by two Bailiffs, but the King in his tenth year taking difpleafure again them for denying his Purveyors wheat, caufed them to be impofion, till 35 of the chief Citizens repaired to him, and acquainting him what small flore the City had, how the Commons were ready to make infurrection abut it, he was then fatisfied; and moreover at their fuit, granted them to have a Major and two Sheriffs to be yearly chosen nine days before Michaelmas; which Order hath continued, though with some alteration in the time of their Election, to this day. Of his coming to the Crown, and of Acts done in his Minority.

KING John being dead, his eldest Son Henry was next to succeed; who being but nine years old, though he was capable of having his Right; yet he was scarce capable of understanding his right; especially there being another at that time, to whom great part of the Kingdom had sworn Allegiance. But those Lords who had been confiant to the Father, notwithstanding his faults, were more tender of the Son, who was altogether innocent, and whose gracious aspect gave so small hope of a better disposition. Amongst all which Lords, there was none so eminent in worthines, none so near him in Alliance, as William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, who had married his Aunt; and he drawing the rest of the Lords together, with a solemn Oration, in behalf of the young Prince, so confirmed them, and so ordered the matter, that on the twenty-eighth day of October, in the year 1216, he was Crowned at Gloucester, by Peter Bishop of Winchester & Joan, Bishop of Bath & Wells, in the presence of Gualdo the Pope's Legate, and many Lords and Bishops. Where besides the Oath usually taken by all Kings at their Coronation, to bear reverence and honour to God, and to his holy Church, and to do right and justice to all his people, he did homage besides to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for his Kingdom of England and Ireland; and took his Oath for the true payment of the thousand Marks which his Father had granted to the Church of Rome. This done, William Earl of Pembroke, by a general content was assigned Protector of the Realm during the King's minority. In which place, the first thing he did, was to give notice of the new Kings Coronation to all the Countries round about; and proclaim pardon to all offenders that within a time limited should come and submit themselves to him. In the mean time Prince Lewis of France, who at his hearing of King John's death, thought himself then sure of enjoying the Kingdom quietly, and that he should need to fear no more opposition; now that he hears of the new Kings Crowning, and that so solemnly, and with so unanimous a consent, he begins to think himself in worse case then before: and to grow jealous of the English Lords that had adhered to him, what they would do in this new world. And indeed a conflict was already grown in their minds, which of the two obligations should be the greater; either that of their Oath to Prince Louis; or that of their Allegiance to King Henry. They could not but think it extrem ungrateness to forfake Prince Louis, whom they had themselves invited home; and they could not but think it extreme undutieness to stand out in opposition against King Henry their natural Sovereign. And that which added no small weight to this scale; was a discovery lately made by the Viscount Melun a French Lord, at the time of his death, who confessed, as a matter of confessions, that Prince Louis had vowed, if once he got the Kingdom, utterly to extinguish all the English Nobility, and to admit none but French to any place of Dignity. Neither was it perhaps the least cause that moved many to leave the party of Prince Louis, that Gualdo the Pope's Legat had threaten to Excommunicate him, and as many as should adhere unto him. But whether any of these reasons, or any other were their motives, certain it is, that many of them, of whom were principal, the Earls of Armel, Warren, Salisbury, and William the eldest Son of the Protector, shrunk from Prince Lewis, and went to King Henry, as thinking no obligation so great as Allegiance: And many again continued confiant to Prince Lewis, as thinking no obligation so great as an Oath. And now Prince Lewis, to call the dice of fortune, before his Enemies, though they had gotten them a Head, should gather to a head, and draw more forces together, staying himself at London, sent his Lieutenants with an Army of twenty thousand, to take in as many Towns as they could; and many they took with small opposition; but coming to Lincoln, where though they had the Town it fell, yet the Castle stood; and had been defended by a Noble Lady a whole year before, they found such resistance, that their proceeding was there arrested. For thither came presently William the Protector, with his Son William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Barons of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Teesdale, William de Albinet, William de Castelnau, Felcasu, Thomas Boffet, Robert Vipont, James de Liffe, Geoffrey Lucy, and many other Barons, with all the power of the young King; who with wonderful violence assault the City. At which time it was pronounced by the French, to fully forth and give them Battle, but conceiving their Army to be greater then indeed it was (for the English had set double Ensigns to every Company, which...

The chief men that adhered to Prince Lewis were taken prisoners.

The Life Fair.

Prince Lewis was not yet discouraged, for he had sent to King Philip his Father to send him new supplies out of France; and new supplies were indeed sent: but Hubert de Burgh, Governor of Dover, being as vigilant as he was valiant, watched their coming, and in a sea-fight defeated them all, of whom but few escaped. And now this blow was so much greater than that at Land, that whereas that made only doubt, this made him despair, at least made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by compulsion. Whereupon it was at last concluded, that Prince Lewis should have fifteen thousand Marks for the charges he had been at, and abjure his claim to any interest in the Kingdom; and withal to work his Father for restitution of such Provinces in France as appertained to this Crown: and that when himself should be King, he should resign them in a peaceable manner. On the other part, King Henry takes his Oath; and from him the Legate Guazzo, and the Protector, to restore unto the Barons of the Realm, and other his Subjects of all their Rights and Privileges, for which the difcord began between the late King and his People. After this Prince Lewis is honourably attended to Dover, and departs out of England about Michaelmas, above two years after his first arrival.

And now the Kingdom is come to unity within itself, one King and one People; and for a year or two there was but little to do, only some few there were, whom the corruption of the times had engendered, and who being born in a form, could not live in a calm; of whom the principal were the Earl of Ailesmere, Robert de Vipont, Fawke de Brent, Brian de Liffe, and Hugh de Baloti. Who butting about, got possession of Castles: with what intention all men knew, but with what hope of effecting their intention, no man could imagine: for being but a handful of men to the Body of the Realm, they were easily suppressed; and either brought to acknowledge their faults, or else punished for not acknowledging them. It was, now the fourth year of King Henry's Reign; at which time William Earl of Pembroke, Protector of the Realm died, and was buried in the new Temple at London; in whose place came the Bishop of Winchester: And now was the King the second time Crowned, and had granted him by Parliament for Eichage, two Marks of Silver, of every Knights Fee, for the Affairs of the Kingdom, and recovery of his Transmarine Dominions which is now designd: and Mâleau de Savoyev, the Poitouvin, with Williams Long-Sword, Earl of Salisbury, went over to try the intentions of that people, whom they find for the most part inclinable to the obedience of this Crown: but the King of France being required peacefully to deliver them, made answer, that having got them by the Sword, by the Sword he would hold them. But now the King being come to some years of understanding, was in a Parliament held at London, put in mind by the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Oath he had taken for confirmation of the Liberties of the Kingdom; which though oppugned by some (and especially by William Brewer, and Hubert de Burgh, whom the King had now made his chief Jutficiar) as having been an Act of constraint: yet the King then again ratified, and twelve Knights or other Legates of every Shire, by Writs, were charged to examine what the Laws and Liberties were, which the Kingdom enjoyed under his Grandfather, and that they should return them by a certain day: and here the King by Parliament refolved that his hands such Alienations as had been made by his Ancestors of any Crown Land. The next year after, another Parliament is held at Welfinster, wherein is required the fiftieth part of all the Moveables, both of the Clergy and Lay, for the recovery of those parts in France, with-held from the Crown by Lewis, now King, contrary to his Oath and Promise made here in England at his departure; which though it concerned the Honour and Dignity of the Kingdom, and the Estates of most of the Nobility; yet would it be yielded to, but upon confirmation of their Liberties, which in the end was obtained, in the same words and form as King John had granted them in the two Charters before; and twelve Knights are chosen in every Shire to disfract the old Forefts from the new, and the new to be laid open and ploughed, and improved, to the great comfort and benefit of the Subject; and two years they were accordingly enjoyed.

Of his Acts after he came to be of age.

It was now the tenth year of King Henry's Reign, and being about nineteen years of age, he claimed to take the government of the Kingdom into his own hands, and no longer to be under a Protector; and now will presently appear the difference between a Prince that is ruled by good Counfel, and a Prince that will do all of himself, and take no advice. For thirteen years he was ruled by a Protector; all passed as it were in a calm, without noise or clamour; but as soon as he took upon him the Government himself, there grew presently storms and tempests; no quietness either to the Subject or
The Life and Reign of King Henry the Third.

or to himself: nothing but grievances all the long time of his Reign. For at the Parliament now holden at Oxford, as soon as he was Crowned again, he presently cancels and annuls the Charter of the Forests, as granted in his Nom- age; and therefore he not bound to observe it: and then not using any longer the Seal which the Proctor had used, he makes a new, and cancels Proclamation to be made use of; he ever would enjoy any benefit of Grants under his Seal, should come and have them signed by his new Seal; by which course he drew much money from many: and this was the first griev-

Shortly after, he commits the keeping of Barkhamstead Castle, to one Waller de Ditcheman, which Castle belonged to his Brother Richard of Cornwall; but when Earl Richard required to have the possession, as of right he ought, it was then plotted by Hubert Burgh Chief Justice, and the Kings chief Counsellour, to commit him to prison; which the Earl understanding, or at least suppecing, flies presently to Mar-borough, where he finds William Earl Marthal his vowed Friend, with whom he haints to Stamford, and there meets with the Earls of Clefor, Gloucester, Warren, Hereford, Ferrers, Warwick, and divers other Barons; who all confederate together, and tend to the King; that might be before the Castle to his Brother, and to them the Liberties of Forests, which he had lately cancelled at Oxford, they would seek to recover them by the Sword. Hereupon King Henry to pacifie his Brother, not only renders the Castle to him, but gives him besides all that his Mother had in Dower; and also great pos-fessions which the Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Bohign lately deceased, had in England: but to the Petition of the Lords he makes a dilatory answer: and this was another grievance.

Not long after King Henry is perfuded by Hughle Brun, Earl of March, who had married his Mother, to make a journey into France, for recovery of his right there: but the Earl perfuded it for ends of his own, which to have discovered, had been no way to compass them: He must therefore lay some colours up-

On his work; and it was colour enough that the action would be of great benefit to the King, if it might succeed; and the likelihood of succeeding was most apparent, by reason of the great inclination of the people to King Henry, and their great averees from King Lew. Un-

Among these colours King Henry undertaking the action, raiseth great sums of money from the Clergy, and from the Londoners, for redemption of their Liberties, and takes the third part of all the Goods of the Jews: but when he returned home a year after, without having done any thing but spent his treasure and his time; and that which was more worth then both the,

the lives of many Noble men and others; this was another grievance.

And now King Henry bringing many Poilove-

Under them, who haderved him in his War, he was to reward them here; which he could not do, but by displacing and spoil of his Officers. First therefore he calleth Ralph Brot-ten Treasurer of his Chamber to account, and grievously fines him for defrauding him in his Office. Then likewise is Hubert de Burgh, chief Jaffiari, and his chief Counsellour, called to account for such treasure as passed his Office; who being further charged with crimes of Treason, flies to the Church of Aorton for sanctuary: From whence when the King commanded him to be drawn out by violence, the Bishop of London hearing of it, commanded him to be returned back to Sanctuary, upon pain of Excommunication: but the King commanding him to be kept from salutenance, hunger at last enforced him to render himself to the Kings mercy: all his goods which were very great, confiscate. Alfo Walter Bishop of Car-file is thrust out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Redon Knight, from his place of Marthal of the Kings House; and all the chief Counsellors, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom are removed as distrustful; and only strangers preferred to their rooms. Of which course, Peter de Rusoun a Poleiwin, Bishop of Winchiftre, and one Peter de Riwala, the Kings special Favourite, were said to be the Authors: and this was another grievance.

Nine years had thus paffed, with divers grievances in his Government; and being now about eight or nine and twenty years old, a Conmification was had for a fit Wife for him. There was propagond a Sifer of Alexander

King of Scots, but it was not thought fit the King should marry the younger Sifer, when Hubert de Burgh had married the elder: he therefore takes one of his own choosing, and marries Eleanor, daughter to Raymond Earl of Poversion; by which means he neither had portion by his Wife, nor strength of alliance by Friends; or if any were, it was all made vain by distance; only he had by her a number of poor Kindred, who to his great cost lay hang-ning upon him: yet was the Marriage ilemnnized with as great charges as if he had been to have Mountains with her: and this was another grievance.

And now is the sorce of these grievances called upon to be paid; for the Lords could no longer endure fo many indignities, to see themselves lighted, and only strangers advanced, as Poulk de Brent, who held the Enliboms of Nottingham, Oxford, Belford, and Buckingham, and others the like: and to see their persons exposed to danger, and their estates to mine, for which no remedy could be, but only the Kings confir-mong their Charter of Liberties: wherein it is strange to observe upon what different grounds the King and the Lords went. It seems the King thought that to confirm that Charter, were to make himself to be left then a King; and the Lords thought, that as long as it was denied, they were no better then slaves: and as the King could endure no diminution, fo the Lords could endure no law; but the King might keep his own with fitting still, the Lords could not recover their own but by motion. And seeing their strength must be in their number, by commotion, hereupon they confederate together; and of his confederacy, Richard now Earl Marfhals, upon the death of his Brother William, is chief: who repair to the King, and boldly shew him his error, and require satisfaction. Hereupon the King sends pre-ing, they also grew cold, and so for that time it relied, and no more was done in it. About this time, a certain fanatick fellow, had got into the Kings Chamber in the night, having a naked knife in his hand, with a resolved purpose to kill him: but finding him not there, (for the King lay that night with the Queen) he then went looking to finde him out: but being taken and confessing, who were his complices, he was afterward drawn in pieces with wide Horfes. So provideth a carehath God to protected his Anointed.

And now is the Kings turn to play his part in using his Authority, which he fails not to do to the intermoit; for upon a small occasion he canfeith the Gates of Gilbert now Earl of Pembroke (the third fon of William the great Marthal) to be shut again him at Wincheffe; whereupon the Earl retires into the North. Alfo Si-march, Baron, Master of the King's Seal, and his greatest Favourite, is thrown out with difgrace, and his Brother gravy a Knight Templar, is put out of the Council; both of them for not yielding to pass a Grant from the King made unto Thomas Earl of Elfrant, the Queens Uncle, of four pence upon every lack of Wool. And now that load enough is laid upon thefe of the Lity, comes a new load to be laid upon the Clergy. For the Pope nothing daunty to make the Power he had in the King, fends over three hundred Romans, requiring to have the five benefices that should be vacant, be-towed upon them: which seemed to unfortunate a request, and to the Clergy of England fo dangerous, that it made Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury to give over all; and betake himself to a voluntary exile in the Abbey of Pasnlea in France; yet to fweark his respect to the Pope, gave him eight hundred Marks, bidder of re-weight upon the Clergy, great fums are also required of them for maintenance of the Popes Warre against the Emperor; which thought the Clergy opposed, and fewed many good reafons of their oppofition both to the King and the Legar; yet by promises or threatnings, they were won or forced to yield unto it. And now comes the Earl of March, and once again folicits the King to make another journey into France; which being yielded to by the King, and allotted in Parliament, an aid prefently was demanded towards it: but this demand was not only oppofed, but all the Kings Taxa-Tions and Aids before granted, were now renepaled; and thereupon an absolute denial to grant any more. Upon this, the King comes to the Parliment himfelf in perfon; earnestly, and indeed, hazardfully claiming their aid for this once to: but all prevailed not, they had made a vow to the contrary; and the King is driven to get what he could of particular men, of whom partly by gifts, and partly by loan, he got enough, that he carries with him thirty Barrels of Sterling money. This expedition had no better fucces then the former; for after a whole years stay, the King was driven to make a defhonourable Truce with the King of France, and return home. At his return he put the Jeus to another redemption, and the Landgrafs to another exaction: and to help on his charge, his Wives Mother, the Countefs of Provence, comes now to visit him, who bringing her Daughter Zanchia with her, a marriage is fo-Iumnized between her and Richard Earl of Cornwall, whose Wife was lately dead, and he returned from the Holy Wars. The old Countefs at her return, is prefented with many rich gifts, having besides received an annual penion of four thouland Marks out of England, for five years paff, in consideration of a paft made, that King Henry after her deceafe should have the Earldom of Provence: but shortly after her return, the disappointment of that, and be-flows it upon her youngff Daughter Beatris, marrifd to Charles the French Kings Brother, who was after King of Naples and Sicife: fo as this Countefs lived to fee all her four Daughters Queens: Richard Earl of Cornwall, coming after to be elected King of the Romans. Upon these provifions, a confufion is had for new supplies, and no way thought to fit for by Parliament: hereupon a Parliament is again assembled at Welfmifier, whither the King comes again himfelf in perfon, urging his necelfities; yet nothing would be granted without the affu-rance of reforation and due execution of the Laws. And here they defire to have it ordained, that four of the most grave and diftinguifhed Peers fhoufl be chosen as Confervators of the Kingdom, and inflant of the Kings Council, both to fie Justice administered, and the treafure influfed; and thefe or two of them at least, fould ever attend about the King. Alfo that the Lord Chief Juflicer, and the Lord Chancellour fhoufl be chosen by the general voices of the States assembled, or elfe be one of the number of inofe. Besides they propofed, that there might be two Juflices of the Benches, two Barons of the Exchequer, and one Juflice for the Jews; and thofe likewife to be chosen by Parliament. But while these things were in debaring, comes one Martin, a new Legar from the Pope, with a larger Comimation than ever before, to exact upon the State; but at the fame time, Letters coming from the Emperor Frederick, to entreat that the Pope might have no more supplies out of England, The Popes Mandate is rejected, and his Agent Martin dif-gracefully fent home. This busines took up to much time, that nothing elfe was done in this Parliament, but only an aid granted to the King for the marriage of his Daughter to Alexander King of Scott; twenty fhillings of every Knights Fee, and that with much ado, and repetition of his former aids.

The Winter following he afsembles another Parliament, wherein he moves for an aid upon a defign he had upon Wales, and pay his debts, which were urged to be fo great that he could not appear out of his Chamber for the infinite clamour of such; to whom he offered for his Wine, Wax, and other necelfities of home; but they all to his face refufed to grant him any thing. Whereupon other violent courfes are taken, an ancient quarrel is found out against the City of London, for which they are commanded to pay fifteen thouland Marks; and Paffellome the Clerk is employed, with others, in a moft peremptory Comimation, to enquire of all fuch Lands as had been inofelled, and either to fine the occupiers thereof at their pleasure, or else to take it from them and sell the same to others; wherein such rigour was used, that multitude of people were undone. But now, to shew the King the estate of his Kingdom, and the opulence of Popes, inquiry was made of the Revenues which the Romans and Italians had in England; which were found to be annually sixty thousand Marks; being more than the yearly Revenues of the Crown. Which moved the King, that he caused the same to be notified, with all other exactions, to the General Council now assembled at Linna. And this (with the ill usage of his Agent Martin) he vexed the Pope, that he is said to have uttered these words, 'It is time to make an end with the Emperor, that we may crush these petty Kings, for the Dragon once appeared, or destroyed, these lesser Snakes will soon be trodden down. But upon the Popes rejecting the consideration of these grievances of England, and disputing the Kings message (who he said began to Frederick) it was absolutely here ordained, under great penalty, that no contribution should be given to the Pope by any Subject of England: And the King for a time affents unto it. But being of an irrefolute and wavering nature, and midst of threats, he soon gave over what he undertook, so as the Pope continued his former rapine, and though he had promised never to lend any more Legates into England, yet sent he other Ministers under the title of Clerks, that had as great power as Legates, and effected as much.

And now for the other part of the State, new occasions also of complaint were offered. Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond, comes into England, bringing with him certain maids to be married to young Noblemen of this Country, the Kings Warders, of whom Edmund Earl of Lincoln hath one, and Richard de Burgh another; and the same year three of the Kings Brothers by the Mother, Gyn de Luzignan, William de Valence, and Abbot Ramsey, are sent over to be provided of Estates in England. Also Thomas of Savoy (sometimes Earl of Flanders,) by right of his Wife comes with his Sifer Beatrix, Councils of Province, the Queens Mother, who are again sent, answer, and gifted; for whom the King is taxed therefor, but the Parliament in Continuance Term, and besides sharply reprehended for his breach of promise, having Vowed and Declared by his Charter never more to injure the State in that kinde: also for his violent taking up of Provision of Wax, Silk, Robes, and especially of Wine, contrary to the will of the sellers, and many other grievances they complain of. All which the King patiently hears, in hope to obtain his desire; but yet nothing is effected: and the Parliament being prorogued till Midsummer following, and the King growing more obdurate then before, it afterward brake up in discontent. But the Parliament not supplying him, he is advised to furnish his wants with sale of his Plate, and Jewels of the Crown, being told, that though they were sold, yet they would never again into him; and having with great toils received money for them, he asked who had bought them: a wager is made, the City of London. That City (said he) is an incautiable Gulph, If Otho's Treasure were to be fold, they freely would buy it. In his two and fortieth year, a Parliament was held, which by the advice of his Ministers, the mad Parliament; for that, at this Parliament (to which the Lords came with great retinues of armed men) many things were enacted contrary to the Kings pleasure, and his Royal Prerogative.

And now to vex them, he appoints a Fair to be kept at Wembly, forbidding under great penalty, all exercise of Merchandise within London, for fifteen daies, and all other Fairs in England; and namely of that by: but this Novelty came to nothing; the inconvenience of the place, as it was then, and the foule of the weather, brought more affliction then benefit to the Traders. That Christmas also he requires New-years-Gifts of the Londoners, and shortly after writes unto them his Letters imperiously deprecatory to aid him with money; and thereby gets of them twenty thousand pounds, for which the next year after he craves pardon of them. And notwithstanding his continual taking up all Provisions for his house, yet he lefts his house-keeping in no honourable manner. And then seeing he could get nothing of the States, he calls unto him, or writes unto them noblemen apart, declaring his poverty; and how he was bound by Charter in a debt of thirty thousand pounds to thee of Bourdeaux, and his Gageway, who otherwise would not have suffered him to depart home at it, his last being in France: but failing herein of Temporal Lords, he addresses his Letters to the Prelates, of whom he finds (as little relief; by much importunity and his own presence, he got of the Abbot of Ramfey a hundred pound, but the Abbot of Burrough had the face to deny him, though the King told him, it was more Alms to give money to him, then to a Beggar that went from door to door. The Abbot of Saint Albans was more kinde, and he gave him three hundred Marks. To such lowmen did the necessity of this indigent King (through his pretence) bring him. The Jews ever expected to his will, feel the weight of these his wants. One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeems himself for seven hundred Marks, and Aaron another from Paris, the King had long since his last being in France taken from him at times, thirty thousand Marks of Silver, besides two hundred Marks of Gold given to the Queen.

But now the Lords assemble again at London, and press him with his promise made unto them, that the Chief Juttician, Chancellorell and Treasurer should be appointed by the General Council of the Kingdom; but by the absence of richard Earl of Cornwall, (which was thought to be done of purpose) they return fruitate of their desire. And now the Bishoprick of Winchelsea failing void, the King lends presently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church, to elect his Brother Archbishop; and because he would not be denied, he goes thither himself in person, and there enters the Chapter houze as a Bishop of Prior, gets up into the Presidents Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes his Text, Justice and Peace have killed each other; and therupon upeth these words: To me and other Kings Kings who are to govern the People, belongs the right of Judgement and Justice; to you who are men of Quiet and Religion, Peace and Tranquility; and this day I hear you have (for your own good) been favourable to my request, with many such like words; whereby the Monks finding the earneffness of his desire, held it in vain to deny him, and

Abelmar. was elected: but with this refervation, if the Pope allow Sir Henfr after Baloun the Roman and

Cafe of Sir Henry de Bath, a Jufticiar of the Kingdom, and a special Councillor to the King, who by corruption had attained to a mighty Eflate, and is said, in one Circuit to have gotten two hundred pound per annum. He is accufied by Sir Philip Darby of falshood in the King's Court; and the King is fo incenfed against him, that in the Parliament at this time holden in London, Proclamation is made, that whosoever had any Action or Complaint against Henry de Bathes, should come and be heard. One of his Jufticiaries accused him of acquiring a Malefactor for a brife. The King feeing Henry de Bathes's friends to be many and strong, breaks out into a rage, provo-cing; that whosoever would kill Henry de Bathes, should be acquitted for the deed. But afterwards, by intercession of the Earl of Carmow, and the Bishop of London, the King becomes pacified, and Sir Henry is released, paying two thousand Marks; and after is reformed to his former place and favour. The King keeping his Christmas at York, the marriage is solemnized between Alexander King of Scots, and Margaret his Daughter; to the Feast of which solemnity it is said the Archbishop gave fix hundred far Oxen, which were all spent at one meal; and besides, the Feast cost him four thousand Marks.

About this time the Pope solicits King Henry to undertake the Crofs, and to both Alphonfo

King of Cofile, offering to accompany him in Perceu, to rescue the King of France, who was now held Prisoner by the Soundan; and because a ranforemme collected for him in France was by tempest cast away at Sea, the Capive King offers to restore Normanly to the King of England, fo he would come to his rescue. Upon this folicitation the Pope, and the grant of a tenth of the Clergy and Largy for three years to come, the King undertakes the Crofs; rather it seems, to get the money, then with any purpose to perform the Journey: which had it been collected (faith Paris) would have amounted to fix hundred thousand pounds, to utter the impoverishment of the Kingdom. And now the King by Proclamation calls the Londoners to Welfmisier, and there caufeth the Bishops of Welfmisier and Chicheftcr to declare his intentions, and to exhort the people to undertake the Crofs and attend him: but few are are moved by their perfusions, only three Knights of small note, whom thereupon the King in open view, imbraceth, kifeth, and calls his Brethren, checking the Londoners as ignoble Mercenaries; and there himself takes his Oath for performing it, and to let forth upon Midfterner day next. In taking his Oath, he lays his right hand on his breast, according to the manner of a Priest; and after on the Book, and kif it as a Layman. About this tenth (granted by the Pope, but not by the People) a Parliament is called is called at London, where the Bishops are first devolved, (as being a work of piety) and they absolutely refuse it; then the Temporal Lords are fet upon, and they anwser as the Bishops, which put the King into so great a rage, that he drove out all that were in his Chamber, as if he had been mad. Then he falls to perwade them apart, sending first for the Bishop of Ely, and deals with him in all kinds. In the end, the many favours he had done him. The Bishop replies, difclaiming his anwser from the Journey by Example of the King of France; and to that parole with many good reasons: which the King hearing, in great passion commanded his Servants to thrust him out of door, percei-ving by this what was to be expected of the reft, and thereupon falls upon his former violent courfes. And first the City of London is compelled to the Contribution of a thousand Marks, and the Guffeyors being upon revolt, unless s pedy fuccour be fent them, general Muzzers are made, and commandement given, that who-foever could dispence thirteen pounds per annum, should furnish out a horfeman. This occasions another Parliament, wherein it feems the State began with ftrictitude to consider, that all their oppositions did no good, the Kings turn muf be believed one way or other. Therefore they agreed to relieve him rather by the ufual way, then force him to thofe extravagant courfes which he took; but yet fo, as the Reformation of the Government, and the ratification of their Laws and Liberties, might once again be folemnly confirmed. And after fifteen days confultation, to fatify the Kings defire for his holy Expedition, Tenith is granted by the Clergy, and Scrtage, three Marks of every Knights Fee by the Lighty, and thereupon thofe oftend confirmed Charters are again ratified; and that in the moft solemn and ceremonial manner, that State and Religion could poiblly derive. The King with all the great Nobility of England, all the Bishops in their reverent Ornaments with burning Candles in their hands, assemble to hear the terrible fentence of Excommunion againft the infringers of the fame. And at the lighting of fuch Candles the King having received one in his hand, gives it to the Prelace that flould by, faying, It becomes not me, being no Priet, to hold this Candle, my heart fhall be a greater reftimony; and within laid his hand spread upon his Breast all the time the fentence was read: which was thus pronounced, Authoritati Dei Omnipotentis, &c. Which done, he caufeth the Charters of King John his Father, granted by his ftrengthen fee, to be openly read. In the end, having thrown away their Candles, which lay fmaoking on the ground, they cried out, So let them who incur this Sentence, be excafh, and have no better favour tham then theft snuffs: and the King with a loud voice faid, As God help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Chriftian, a Knight, a King

Crowned and Anointed; inviably observe all thefe things: and therewithall the Bells rung out, and the people fhooned for joy.

Yet was not all fo quiet by this Grant, but that there were grievances still, whereof the first falls upon his Brother Richard, Earl of Carmow: for the King having been twenty years before given him the Province of Gascie, now that he had a Son of his own, he would take it from his Brother, and give it to his Son; and the Earl refusing to deliver his Charter, it is plighted to imprison him; but he escaping out of Barnes, comes over into England. The King to win the Nobility of Gascie to turn him, promised them thirty thousand Marks, which they accept, so as he bindeth himself by his Oath and Charter to perform it. This distress of theirs the King takes in part, and thereupon sends Simon Mounfand Earl of Leicester, a stenm man, to be their Governor, who with his insolent Government, so discontents them, that after three years suffering, they fend the Archbishop of Barnes, with other great men, to complain of his Insolences. Whereupon Mounfand is sent for, and because the Lords took part with him, the King takes part with the Gasciers; which Mounfand took full, that he upbraids the King with breaking his promise; to whom the King in great rage replied, that no promise was to be kept with an unworthy Traitor. At which word Mounfand fliet up, protesting that he dyed, and were he not supported by his Royal Dignity, he would make him repent those words. The King commands his Servants to lay hold on him, but the Lords would not permit it. Yet after this great affront to the King is Mounfand taken over again into Gascie, though with more limited Authority; and shortly after the King with a Fleet of three hundred Ships goes thither himself, and soon cometh all differences in the Country.

But now the King of Spain pretends a title to Aquitaine; and to take him off, King Henry fends to treat of a marriage between Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor: which being accepted by the King of Spain, the Marriage is solemnized at Burgis, where the King of Spain Knights the Prince, and quits his claim to Aquitaine for him and his Successors for ever; and King Henry invites the Prince and Wife in it, and gives unto him besides Ireland, Wales, Briflem, Staf ford, and Grancham; and from hence it came that ever after this, the Kings eldest Son was immedi ately upon his birth Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester. After this King Henry prepares to return home, and well he might, having spent in this and his former Journeys into those parts, the sum of seven and twenty thousand pounds; more then all the Lands if they had been fold, were worth; which when the King was told, he is defire there might be no words made of it for his credit. And now being to return, he is dilatory, with the King of France's leave to pass through France: and coming to Paris with a thousand Horse, where he stayed eight days, is there most royally feated by the King of France; and he as royally feats the King of France again. But it is the Landowners and the Jews that are like to pay for all. For coming home about Christmas, when the Land owners pretended him with a hundred pounds in money, and afterwards with two hundred pounds in plate, it was fo lighted, and fo ill taken, that a hole was presently found in their coat, for an escape of a Prisoner, which cost them thirty thousand Marks; Yet was not this enough, but he takes good Fleeces from the Jews, and then lets them out to Farm, to his Brother Richard, for a great sum of money, and he to make what more of them he could.

Yet after all this he complains of his Debts, which he saith are at least three hundred thousand Marks, which must needs he the heavier to him, because he had diminished his own means, by the allowance of fifteen thousand Marks per annum to his Son the Prince. The only hope is in the Parliament, but a Parliament being called, they fell profontly upon their old grievances, complaining upon the King for breach of Charters, and renewing their claim, to have the chief Justiciary, the Chancellour, and Treasur er, to be chosen by themselves: to nothing was done for the King at this time, and the Parliament being prorogued till Michaelmas, as little then, by reason many of the Peers came not, as not being summoned according to the tenor of Magna Charta. And now while the King was using means to winde himself out of debt, there happened occasions to put him further in; for now King Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queens Brother being at war with the City of Tunis, must be supplied with money towards it, by the King of England. Now the Earl Bath was dissatisfied, the King of Spain's Brother, comes into England, and must be sumptuously Feasted, and have great gifts presented him. Now Eleanor the Princes Wife, arrives with a multitude of Spaniards, and must all be entertained at the Kings charge, and have no small presents given them at their departure. Now comes Ruffandus from the Pope, with power to collect the Tenth of the Clergy, for the Popes use and the Kings, and to absolve him from his Oath of the Holy War, so he would come to destroy Manfred, Son to the Emperor Frederick, now in possession of the Kingdom of Sicilie, and Apulia. And this man likewise hath great gifts bestowed upon him, besides a rich Prebend in York: but the Pope by too much seeking his profit, loathed credit and all: for the Clergy fights him, and will give him nothing: and when he would have borrowed of the Earl of Cornwall five hundred Marks, the Earl answered, He liked not to lend his money to one, upon whom he could not Restrain. But King Henry's greatest charge was his purchasing a Kingdom for his Son Edmund; for now comes the Bishop of Beaufort from the Pope, with a ring of Investiture to Prince Edmund, in the Kingdom of Sicilie, which he pretends to be at his disposing; and King Henry takes it in so good earnest, that after this he calls his Son Edmund by no other name then King of Sicilie. But all this was done by the Pope, but to angle away King Henry's money, as indeed upon this hope he had drawn the King into the engagemen of an hundred and fifty thousand Marks. For to draw the King on, it was given out, that the Pope had defeated all Manfred's Forces, and was thereby in possession of the Kingdom; when the truth was, that Manfred had defeated the Pope Forces, and was thereby himself established in the Kingdom.

The year 1257, the King keeps his Christmas at Windsor, where new grievances are made. The Merchants of Gascie, having their Wines taken from them by the Kings Officers with out satisfaction, complain to their Lord the Prince, he to his Father, and his Father having been informed before-hand by his Officers, that their clamours was unjust, as relying upon the Princes favour, he falls into a great rage with the Prince, and breaks out into these words. See now my blood, and my bowling impinge me; but afterwards pacified, he gives order the injuries should be redressed. And now the Princes followers themselves come, to be a grievance, who relying upon their Maller, commit many outrages, and spoil and wrong men at their pleasure: and the Prince himself is not altogether free, of whom it is said, that meeting a young man traveling by the way, he caused one of his ears to be cut off, and one of his eyes to be put out. And many such pranks played by him and his followers in Wales, made the Welsh break out into open rebellion, which the Prince would fain have suppressed, but there was no money to be his advantage in doing it. And now the King falls to shifts, he comes to the Chevron himself, and there lays penalties upon Sheriffs, that return not their monies in due time; then he falls upon measures of Wine and Ale, upon Baskets and Weights, and something he gets; but London is his best Chevron, and every year commonly, he hath one quarrel or other to the Londoners; and they are sure to pay. And now falls out an accident, seeming of great honour, but certainly of no profit to the King. Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's brother, is elected King of the Romans: for although Alphonso King of Spain, the great Mathematician were his Competitor, yet Earl Richard's money wrought more then his learning, and the Archbishop of Cologne comes over to fetch him, and Crowned he is at Agisgraine. This Earl of Cornwall is reported able to dispense a hundred Marks a day, for ten years, besides his Revenues in England. But now an accident happens dear for a Secretary, who looks that his Office should pay him again; so Earl Richard having given infinitely to compass his advancement, looked to help himself again by the place; and this, and the desire he had to revenge himself upon those that had opposed his Election, made him take such violent courses that he came soon to be dispossessed, forsaken, and forced to return into England, a poorer King then he went out an Earl.

All's done in the contention between the King and his Barons.

Now King Henry very proud to have his younger son a King as well as his brother, calls a Parliament, wherein he brings his son Edmund clad in stilly habits; and tells the Parliament, how he has chosen this son of his to the Kingdom of Stellis, he had bound himself under a covenant of losing his Kingdom, in the sum of an hundred and forty thousand Marks: and hoped they would not think much to aid him with money for so great an advancement. But the Parliament stood firm to their usual condition of Magna Charta; so as that might be confirmed, they were content to give two and fifty thousand Marks: but this gave the King no satisfaction. The year after, another Parliament is held at London, wherein upon the Kings pressing them again for means to pay his debts to the Pope, the Lords tell him plainly, they will not yield to give him any thing for any such purposes; and give their reasons, and withall repeat their own grievances, his breach of promises, the infidelity of his brothers, and especially William de Valence, who had given the lye to the Earl of Leicester, and no right done him in; and many such things. Which the King hearing, and not able to deny, humbles himself, and tells them how he had often by iil counsel been seduced; but promises by his Oath which he took on the Tomb of St. Edward, to reform all these errors. But the Lords not well knowing how to deal in this business, as being divided betwixt a desire to satisfy the King, and a desire to be satisfied themselves; and knowing withal the barrenness of the Kings nature, they get the Parliament to be adjourned on St. George's day, and then to assemble at Oxford. In which mean time the Earls, Leicester, Horsey, the Earl Marshal, Bigot, Spencer, and other great men, confederate, and provide by arms to effect their desire: and here is the foundation laid of those bloody wars that ensued between King Henry, and his Barons.

And now the King being put to his shifts for money, gets the Abbots of Westminster to put his Seal, and that of his Co Ven to a Deed Obligator, as a surety for two hundred Marks, making account, that by his example, others would be drawn to do the like; but his trusty servant Simon Passelee, being employed to other Monasteries, and telling them amongst other reasons, to perkwade them, that the King was Lord of all they had; they only answered, they acknowledged indeed the King to be Lord of all they had, but yet to, as to defend, not to destroy the same; and this was all the could get of them. The Prince also in no less wanted then his Father, is driven to mortgage his Town of Stamford, Beverley, and many other things, to William de Kesteven, a Poetarum, whereby appeared the disorder of the time, when the Prince was in want, and strangers had such plenty. And now is the Parliament assembled at Oxford, whither the Lords come attended with large trains; and here they begin with the expostulation of the former Liberties, requiring that the chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer may be chosen by Parliament.

The Lords require that the chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer may be chosen by Parliament.

The Lords confer their Legislative powers, and King Henry with shifts to get money.
suspecting he would come with power to aid the King his Brothers, take order for guarding the Ports, which intend to hinder his landing: but finding his train to be but small, accompanied only with his Queen, two German Earls and eight Knights, upon his promise to take their propounded Oath, they admit him to Land, but would neither permit the King (who came thither to meet him) nor himself to enter into Dover Castle. At Canterbury they bring him into the Chapter house, where the Earl of Gloucester standing forth in the midst, calls out the Earl, not by the name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwall; who in reverent manner coming forth, taketh his Oath in these words:

_How all men, that I Richard, Earl of Cornwall, do here with upon the holy Evangelists, that I shall be faithful and diligent to reform with you the Kingdom of England, and be an efficient Conductor to expel all Rebels and disturbers of the same; and this Oath will inviolably observe, under pain of losing all the Land I have in England: So help me God._ But though this Earl came home both weak and poor, yet upon his return the King takes heart, and seeks all means to vindicate his power, and first lends meffengers secretly to Rome, to be absolved from his enforced Oath. And to have the more assurance from the King of France, he makes an absolute renunciation of all his Right to the Duchy of Normandy, and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poitou, Touraine and Maine; in regard whereof the King of France gives him three hundred thousand pounds (some fay Crowns) of Anjou coin money, and grants him to enjoy all Guen, beyond the River Garonne, all the County of Saintonge to the River of Charente, the County of Limousin and Quercy, for him and his Successors, doing their homage to the Crown of France, as Duke of Aquitaine.

And now was the King of France made arbiter of the difference between King Henry and his Barons, who gives sentence against the Barons concerning the Provisions at Oxford; but of their side concerning King John's Charter, by which nice distinction, though he did but leave the matter as he found it: (for those Provisions as the Lords pretended, were grounded upon that Charter) yet did his sentence draw many away from the party of the Barons, amongst whom was Henry son to the Earl of Cornwall, Roger Clifford, Roger de Lescun, Haim, Lefrang, and many others. But the Earl of Leicester, notwithstanding this revolt, collects the Town and Castle of Gloucester, confines the Citizens to pay a thousand pounds for their redemption, goes with an Army to Worcester, poelleth himself of the Castle, thence to Shrewsbury, and comes about to the Isle of Ely, subdues the same, and grows exceeding powerful. The King doubting his approach to London, falls to treat of a Peace, and a Peace is concluded upon these conditions; that all the Castles of the King should be delivered to the keeping of the Barons; the Provisions of Oxford should inviolably be kept; all strangers by a certain time should avoid the Kingdom, except only such as were licensed to stay. The Prince had fortified Windsor Castle; but Leicester coming to believe it, he treats with him for Peace, which which is refused, and the Castle is rendered to him.

The King, at this time, to win time, convokes another Parliament at London, wherein he won many Lords to take his part; as namely the Prince Richard his Brother, Henry his Son, William Valence, with the rest of his Brothers lately returned; and with them the King marches to Oxford, which divers Lords of Scotland repair to him, as John Comyn, John Balliol, Lords of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others: also many Barons of the North; Clifford, Percy, Basset, and others. From Oxford he goes to Northampton, where he took Prisoners, Simon Montford the younger, with fourteen other principal men; thence to Nottingham, making spoils of such possessions as pertained to the Barons in those parts. And now the Kings side grows strong, which the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester seeing, they write to the King, professing their Loyalty; and how they opposed only such as were enemies to him and the Kingdom, and had beleved them. The King returns answer that themselves were the perturbers of him and his State, and fought his day and the Kingdoms destruction; and therefore defies them. The Prince likewise, and the Earl of Cornwall, send Letters of defiance to them. Yet the Barons continue to mediate a Peace, and send the Bishops of London and Worcefter, with offer of thirty thousand Marks to the King, for the damages done in these wars, as the Statutes of Oxford may be observed; but this offer is not accepted. The Earl seeing no remedy, but it must be put to a day, takes his time to be earlier ready then was expected; and supplies his want of strenght with policy, placing on the one side of a hill near Lewis, where the battel was fought, certain En ligns without men, in such fort, as they might seem afar off to be squadrons of succours to second those he brought to the encounter: whom he caused all to wear white Coats, both for their own notice, and the sig-nification of his caulfe, which he would have to be thought for Justtice. Here the fortune of the day was King, the Prince, the Earl of Cornwall, and his Son Henry, the Earls of Arundel and Hereford, with all the Scotch Lords, are taken prisoners; and of the English, five and twenty Barons and Bannerets: only the Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the Kings Brother, with Hugh Biga Earl Marshal, save themselves by flight: five thousand (some say twenty thousand) are slain in the battel. A year and half is Simon Montford in possession of his prisoners, carrying the King about with him to countenance his actions, till he had gotten all the strongest Castles in the Kingdom. And now comes Erianns and first debate between the two great Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, about their Dividend, Montford is taxed to do more for his own particular then the common good; his sons also presuming upon his greatness, grew insolent: whereupon Gloucester sent on an address that hide, and betakes him to the Prince, who lately escaping out of the Cattle of Hereford, had gotten a power about him to try the fortune of another battel. The revolt of this Earl being great in it selfe, was greater by its example; for now many others resolved likewise; and the Earl of Leicester, seeing the improvement of the Princes Forces, who was now with his Army about Worcefter, though he saw his own disadvantage, yet determined in Plain near Evesham to encounter him; and noting the manner of the approach of the Princes Army, said to those about him. Those men come bravely on, they learn it nor of themselves, but of me. And seeing himselfe-like to be beset, and overlaid with multitude, he advised his friends Hugh Spencer, Ralph Basset, and others to shift for themselves; which when they refused to do, then (faith he) let us commend our souls to God, for our bodies are theirs: and so undertaking the main weight of the battel, perish'd under it, and with him are slain his Son, Henry, eight Barons, with many thousands of common Souldiers. And thus ended Montford the great Earl of Leicester, highly honoured in his life, and more highly should have been after his death, if the people might have had their will, who talk of miracles enough to make him a Saint.

And now is King Henry by this victory of his Son, at liberty; who, together with the King, Leicester, where Parliament is convoc'd, and all who adhered to Earl Montford, are disinherited, and their estates conferred on others, at the Kings pleasure; the Lords also have their Liberties taken from them. But though the death of Montford gave a great wound to the party of the Barons: yet it was not mortal, at least not mortal presently; for there remained relics that kept it alive a good while after. Simon and Guy de Montford sons of the Earl of Leicester, and other of the Barons, take and defend the Isle of Ely. The Castle of Kingtonworth held out half a year, till their victuals failed; and then yielded upon conditions to have their lives and goods saved: and many others there were, that refusing and desperate persons, strongly knit and fastened together, though now shortly upon difdovling. For after the Parliament at Welfminster, the King with an Army going against them, and being at Northampton, Simon and Guy de Montford came to him and submitted them to him: but when the Earl of Gloucester opposed them to their estates, they were fain to fly the Kingdom, and make their fortunes in other Countreys, as indeed they did; the younger in Italy, the elder in France, where they were propagators of two great Families. Their Mother was banished shortly after the battel of Evesham. A Lady of eminent note, as being the Daughter and Sister of a King, and yet of more note for her patient bearing of adversity, or rather for her making a benefit of adversity; for by this means she took her self to the veil of Piety, and died a Nun at Monturgers in France. About this time a great slath was made of Jews in London: and the quarrel was, because a Jew would have forced a Christian to give him more than two pence a week for the hire of twenty shillings; two pence only being then allowed by the Law.

Three years after this, the disinherited Barons held out, till at length, conditions of truce are proposed; but here the Council are divided in opinion: Morton and others stated in the possessions of the disinherited, are against restituation, alledgeing it were injustice to take take from them the rewards of their service. Glos-fener and twelve ordained to deal for the peace of the State, are earnest for reparation; alledging, it were hard measure to grant them their lives, and not their livelihoods: but not prevailing, in great discontentment Glosstser retires from Court, sends Melfengers to warn the King to remove strangers from his Council, and oberves the Provisions at Oxford, as he promised at Ely: otherwise that he should not marvel if himself did what he thought fit. Hereupon John de Warren, Earl of Surrey, and William de Valentiare sent to the Earl of Glosstser; who, though they could not persuade him to submit to the King; yet thus much they got of him under his hand and Seal, that he would never bear arms against the King, or his son Edward, but only defend himself and pursue Roger Mortimer, and his other enemies. And now a Parliament is convoket at Ely, wherein many demands are made by the King and the Legat, and all for money from the Clergy; but all denied, that nothing but denials are done in this Parliament.

After this, the Legat imploies Solicitors to per-swade the disinheritcd Lords which held the Isle of Ely, to return to the faith and unity of the Church, and to the Peace of the King, according to the form propounded at Coweney: to which the Lords make answer, that they never opposed the unity of the Church, but the avarice of Church-men that were in authority; and that they never opposed the King, but for the good of the Kingdom: and then required, that the Provisions at Oxford might be obsercted, and pledges be given them for their securit.
Hereupon the ear next, the King prepares a mighty Army, and Prince Edward with Bridges entering the Isle of Ely, shunts them up so far, that he contrains them at last to yield. Also the Earl of Glosstser coming to London with an Army, is by the Legat once again perfwaded to render himself to the King; and upon forfeiture of twelve thousand Marks, if ever he should ra ny commotion again, is reconciled. Now remains Lewes and the Wef, to be chaffet for aiding of Simon Maffmouth; but the King going against them with an Army, they give him two and thirty pounds Sterling, and so make their peace and here was an end of the first wars between the Kings of England and their Barons.

The next year after the Popes Legat Otho, signs with the Croyfado both the Kings, Edward, the Earl of Glosstser, and divers Noble men induced to undertake Holy war by the licitation of him and the King of France; who notwithstanding his forcmer calamities endured in that action, would once again adventure it. And because Prince Edward wanted means to furnish himself out, the King of France lends him thirty thousand Marks upon a mortgage of Gascoyne. And now whilest this preparation is in hand, King Henry labours to establ rh the Peace of the Kingdom, and to reform the excells which the war had bred: and the same year assembles his last Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes of that Title were enacted. Near two years it seems to have been after the undertaking the Crois, before Prince Edward let forth, but then taking his wife Eleanor with him, though young with child, he set forward, and in the voyage, when many of his people seemed defirous to leave him, and return home, he is said to have slucken his brest, and sworn; that if all his followers forsook him, he would yet enter Alon, or Piedmont, though but only with his horse-keeper Ewan. Shortly after Richard King of the Romans died, and the year following King Henry.

Of his Taxations and ways for raising of money.

Never son was more like a Father in any thing, then King Henry was like his Father King John, in this point, for raising of money; for he trod directly in all his steps, if he added not something of his own. King John had great Subsidies granted him by Parliament, for any great action he undertook, so had King Henry.
King John rufemned the Lands aliened from the Crown, to do King Henry. King John made benefit of the vacancy of Bishopricks, and Abbeys, to do King Henry. King John took great Fines of many for crimes not proved, but only supposed, to do King Henry. And John made benefit of a new Seal, to do King Henry. King John exerted great sums from the fent, to do King Henry. And one way more he had to get money, which perhaps his father had not; and that was by begging, as he told the Abbor of Borough. It was more Alms to give money to him, than to the Beggar that went from door to door. Indeed Taxations in this Kings Reign may be reckoned amongst his annual Revenues, for scarce any year passed without a Parliament, and seldom any Parliament without a Tax; or if any sometimes without, it was then cause of the greater Taxation some other way; as when he took of the Londoners for having aided the Barons, twenty thousand Mark.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

In this Kings Reign were ratified and confir-mated the two great Charters of Magna Charta and Carta de Forefia. Also in his time were enacted the Statutes called of Mortons, of Oxford and of Marlborough. Also sealing of chart, which before was but pecuniary, he made capittal: and the first suffered for the same, was one of Dunfable, who having 80in twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colse, and being pursued to Redburn, was by a Bayley of St. Alfon, according to the Kings Proclamation, condemned and beheaded. And it may seem strange, that in these times so much blood should be shed in the field, and none upon the Scaffold: for till the twenty sixth year of this King, that one Willam Maffre, the son of Geoffry Maffre, an Naobian of Ireland, being condemned for Piracy and Treason, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered, there is no example of that kind of punishment to be found in our Histories Particularly in this Kings Reign was made that Stature, by which the Ward and marriage of the Heirs of Barons within age is given to the King.
Also in this Kings Reign the Pleas of the Crown were pleased in the Tower of London. All Wears in the Thames are in this Kings time ordained to be puck’d up and destroy’d. Also the Citizens
Citizens of London are allowed by Charter to pass Toll-free through all England, and to have free Warren about London: also to have and use a common Seal. Also it is ordained that no Sheriff of London should continue in his Office longer than one year, which they did before for many. In the five and twentieth year of this King, were Aldermen first chosen within the City of London, which then had the rule of the City, and of the Wards of the same, and were then yearly changed, as now the Sheriffs are. It was in this King's time allowed to the City of London to present their Mayor to the Barons of the Exchequer to be sworn: which before was to be presented to the King, wherefore he were. In his time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up by the King in his grants and writings. Also in this King's time, William Bishop of Salisbury, first caufed that custom to be received for a Law, whereby the Tenants of every Lordship are bound to owe their fuit to the Lords Court, of whom they hold their Tenements. Also in the thirty second year of this King's Reign, the Wharf of London called Queen-Eithe, was let to farm to the Citizens for fifty pounds the year, which is since grown scarce worth fifteen. In this King's time a Proclamation was fet forth, that all such as might dispence fifteen pound in London, should receive the Order of Knight-hood and thro' that would nor or could not, should pay their Fines.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

A Flairs of the Church for matter of Disorder, were never more quiet then in this King's Reign; for now all Hereticks accounted of the time, especially the Albigensici, were in a manner suppreffed by the Arms of the King of France, not without the vote of the King of England, who forbore to make war upon them in tenderer time to his service. But for matter of manners they were never more turbulent; for now Abbeys were fleeced, Sanctuaries violated, Clergy: men outraged, Bishops themselves not feared; and all for greediness of money, or for revenge.

fairs of the Church may be reckoned the Ulers of any member of the Church: such as one as in this King's time broke out most loathsome. For one procuring five wounds to be made in his body, in relapse to five wounds in Church, thereupon took upon him to be Christiant and had gotten a Woman, that took upon her to be the Virgin Mary: who continuing obstinate in their madness, were adjuzed to be immured and shut up between two walls, to the end (no doubt) the contagion of their filthy souls should spread no further. In this King's time a little novelty was brought in by Pope Innocent the fourth, who ordained the Cardinals should wear red Hats: something perhaps for mystery, and something for distinction. Also in this King's time, the Grecians fortook their obedience to the Church of Rome; and the Archibishop of Antioch claims to have precedence and authority above the Bishop of Rome, because the Apostle Peter had first governed the Church of Antioch seven years together. Also in the fifth year of this King, the Friars Minor (as some write) came first into England; but it is not like they came to farm, for they were Gray Friars of the order of St. Francis: and St. Francis had no graces till Pope Honorius the third, which was some years after. And it is miraculous which is related of St. Francis, that fifteen days before his death appeared wonders in his hands and feet, like to those which Christ received there upon the Cross; and as soon as he was dead, there remained not to much as any marks of the said wounds upon him. Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

His King caufed a chett of Gold to be made for laying up the Reliques of King Edward the Confessor, in the Church of Westminster. He built a Church for converted Jews in London: also an Hospitall at Oxford, for Passengers, and defeated persons: also the new Conventual Church and the Chappel of our Lady at Westminster, whereof he laid himself the first stone: also the house of Black-Friers in Canterbury. In his time, Elias Counsell of Salisbury founded the Abbey of Laok in Wiltshire; Richard Earl of Cornwall, founded Netley, a Monastary of Cisterian Monks near to Winchcomb in Gloucestershire: Reginald de Mona, Earl of Somerset, and Lord of Daufer, founded the Abbey of Newham in Devonshire: London the third Earl of Chester, and Lord of little Britain, builded the Castles of Chartley, Beeone, and the Abbey of Dalecast: Sir John Manfel the King, Chaplain, founded a house of Regular Canons near to Romney in Kent: Williams de Albineto Earl of Arundel, founded the Priory of Wilmham: Williams Bruce, a Citizen of London, and Raffa his Wife, founded the Hospitall of our Lady without Bishopsgate in London: And Isabel Counsell of Arundel founded the Nunnery of Marran, near to Linna. Friers Minor first arrived at Dover, nine in number; whereof five remained at Canterbury, and there builded the first Convent of Friers Minor, that ever was in England: the other four came to London, who increasing in number, had a place alligned them in Saint Nicholas Shambler; which John Layn, Mer- cer of London, appropriated to the use of the

One time there fell no Rain in England, from the first of March to the Assumption of our Lady; and at another time there fell so much Rain, that Holland and Holderness in Lincolnshire were overflowed and drowned. In the 17th year of his reign, were seen, 5 Suns at one time together, after which followed so great a dearth, that people were constrained to eat Horse-dung, and barks of Trees, and the Lumber was starved for want of food. Also in his time the Church of Saint Mildred in Canterbury, and a great part of the City was burnt. Also the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne was burnt, Bridge and all. And though it may seem no fit place to tell it, yet here or no where it must be told; that in this Kings time there was sent by the King of France, the first Elephant that ever was seen in England. In this Kings time, Matthew Paris relates of a maid in Leicester, that being exactly watched, was found in seven years together, neither to eat nor drink, but only that on Sundays she received the Communion, and yet continued fat and in good liking: which if it be true, we may well believe that in the Resurrection, our life may be maintained without meat or drink. Also in this Kings time, there was found a plentiful Mine of Time in Germany, which before this time was never known to be any where found but only in Memling, which much abated the price of Time in England. In his time also the Sea by the space of four or five days, flowed not up to her usual height, which was never known to happen at any time before. Also in his time a child was born in Kent, that at two years old cured all difeases. Also in his 56 year a Lamb was yeasted at Greenwich before London, that had two perfect bodies and but one head. Also in his time a child was born in the Isle of Wight, who at 18 years old, was scarce grown to be three foot high; and therefore brought to the Queen, she carried him about with her as a Monstrel of Nature.

He married Eleanor, the second of the five daughters of Raymond Earl of Provence, who lived his Wife thirty seven years, his Widow nineteen, dyed a Nun at Almeini, and was buried in her Monastery. By her he had six sons and three daughters: of his sons, the four youngest dyed young, and were buried, three of them at Welfminister, and the fourth in the New Temple by Piersstreet. His eldest son Edward, furnished Longhanks, of his tall and slender body, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second son Edmund, furnished Crambsback, of bowing in his back, and yet more likely of wearing the sign of the Cross, (anciently called a Crouch) upon his back, which was by the daughter born of such as had vowed voyages to Hiersalem, as he had done. He was invested titular King of Sicilie and Apulia, and created Earl of Lancaster, on whose person originally the great contention of Lancaster and York was founded. He had two wives, the first was Avelin daughter and heir of William Earl of Albemarle, by whom he left no issue. The second was Queen Blanch, daughter of Robert Earl of Artois, (brother of St. Louis King of France) widow of Henry of Champagne King of Navarre: by her he had issue three sons and one daughter. His eldest son Thomas, who after his father was Earl of Lancaster, and having married Alice daughter and heir of Henry Late Earl of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pontefrath without issue. His second son Henry Lord of Montacute, who after his brother, the fourth Earl of Lancaster, and father of Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, was beheaded in the third son John, who dyed unmarried. His eldest daughter Mary married to Henry Lord Perkeo, mother of Henry the first Earl of Northumberland. This Edmund dyed at Bay in Gascoyn, in the year 1296. when he had lived fifty years, whose body half a year after his death, was brought over into England, and entombed at Westminster. Of King Henrys three daughters, the eldest Margaret was married to Alexander the third, King of Scotland, by whom she had issue, two sons, Alexander and David, who dyed both before their father, without issue; and one daughter Margaret Queen of Norway, wife of King Erik, and mother of Margaret the heir of Scotland and Norway, that dyed unmarried; The second daughter of King Henry was Beatrice, born at Rouen, married to John the first Duke of Britain, and had issue by him, Arthur Duke of Britain, John Earl of Richmond, Peter, and Blanch married to Philip son of the Earl of Atois, Eleanor a Nun at Almeini, and Mary married to Guy, Earl of St. Paul, the deceased in Britain, and was buried at London, in the Quire of the Gray-Fryers within Newport. The third daughter of King Henry, named Katherine, dyed young, and lies buried at Westminster, in the space between the Chappels of King Edward and Saint Benet.
of his eye-lids hanging down, and almost covering the black of his eye. For his inward dispositions, it may be said, he was fitter for a man, than for a Prince; for he knew better how to govern his life than his Subjects. He was rather Pious then Devoir, as taking more pleasure in hearing Matins then Sermons, as he said to the King of France; He had rather see his friend once, than hear from him often. His minde seemed not to stand firm upon its Basis, for every sudden accident put him into passion. He was neither constant in his love, nor in his hate; for he never had so great a Favourite whom he cast not into disgrace, nor so great an Enemy whom he received not into favour. An example of both which qualities was seen in his carriage towards Hubert de Burgh, who was for a time the greatest Favourite, yet cast out afterward in miserable disgrace; and then no man held in greater hatred; yet received afterward into grace again. Yet it is memorable to hear that with what words this Hubert was charged at his arraignment, and specially one: Tho that dissuade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had said, the King was a squire-eyed Fool, and a kinde of Leaper, deceitful, perjured, more faint-hearted then a Woman, and utterly unfit for any Ladies company. For which, and other crimes laid to his charge in the Kings Bench, where the King himself was present, he was adjudged to have his Lands confiscate, and to be deprived of his Tittle of Earl; yet after all this was restored to his estate again, and suffered to live in quiet. He was more defirous of money then of honour, for else he would never have fold his Right to the two great Duckedoms of Normandy and Anjou to the King of France for a sum of money. Yet he was more defirous of honour, then of quietness; for else he would never have continued to long with his Barons about their Charter of Liberty, which was upon the matter but a point of honour. His most eminent virtue, and that which made him the more eminent, as being rare in Princes, was his continency; for there is nothing read, either of any base children he had, or of any Concubine he kept.

Though he had lived a troublesome life, yet he died a quiet death; for he had fetled Peace in his Kingdom, and in his conscience. For being at Saint Edmunds Bury, and finding himself not well at ease, he made the more haste to London, where calling before him this Lords, and specially Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Glocefter, he exhorted them to be more and faithful to his son Prince Edward, who was at that time far from home; and therefore had the more need of their care, which consilied chiefly in their agreement one with another. And then his sickness increasng, he yielded up his soul to God, on the sixteenth day of November, in the year 1272. when he had lived threecore and five years, reigns fix and fifty; and was buried at Westminster, which he had newly builded.

Of men of Note in his time.

Of Martial men famous in his time there were many, but three specially who obfured the rest: the first was William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, memorable for the great care he had of King Henry in his minority, and more memorable for the little care that Dethwine had of his pottery; for leaving his five Sons behinde him, they all lived to be Earls successively, yet all died without issue: So as the great Name and numerous Family of the Marshalls come wholly to be extinct in that Generation. And this happened (if we may believe Matthew Paris) by reason of a curse of an Irish Bishop, from whom he had taken two Maunders belonging to his Bishoprick; and neither he, nor all his sons, upon any inrrections would be gotten to reform them. The second was Richard de Clare Earl of Glocefter who in Battle against Baldwin de Giffes, a valiant Eminent, employed by King Henry, himself alone eareaad twelve of his enemies; and having his horse flaine under him, he pitcheth one of them by the leg out of the saddle, and leapeth into itself, and continue the fight without giving ground; till his Army came to rescue him. An act, that may seem fitter to be placed among the Fictions of Knights Errant, then in a true Narration. The third was Simon Monifa, a man of enjoying a Spirit, that he gave King Henry the lie to his face; and that in presence of all his Lords, and of whom it seems, the King stood in no small fear. For paffing one time upon the Thames, and suddenly taken with a terrible storm of Thunder and Lightning, he commanded to be set on shore at the next flairs, which happened to be at Dunbar Houte, where Monife then lay; who coming down to meet the King, and perceiving him somewhat frighted with the Thunder, said unto him, Your Majesty need not fear the Thunder, the day is now past: No Monife (said the King) I fear not the Thunder so much as I fear thee. Of men famous for fainfty of life, there were likewise many in his time, but three more eminent then the rest, Edmund Archibishop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of Chichefter, and Thomas Arch-Deacon of Hereford; all three either Canonized, or at least thought worthy to be Canonized for Saints. To these may be added Robert Groslybend Bishop of Lincoln, who translated the Teilaments of the twelve Patriarch, out of Greek into Latin; which through envy of the Jews, never came to the knowledge of Saint Hierome, wherein are many Prophetties of our Saviour Christ. Of men famous for Learning, there were likewise many in his time; of whom some left works behind them for Teilmonies of their knowledge in divers kinds, as Alexanderii Holc, a Prier minor, who wrote many Treatises in Divinity; Ralph Clegghall, who wrote the Appendix to the Chronicle of Ralph Nigre; Randolph Glavvile, the Earl of Cheffer, the third and last of that name, who compiled a book of the Laws of England; Henry Brallv, who wrote a book commonly called by his name, de Con- sistendum Anglicm and besides thefe, Hugh Kirkfread, Richard of Ely, Peter Henham, John Nyles,

The LIFE and REIGN of
KING EDWARD
THE FIRST,
Surnamed of WINCHESTER.

Of his coming to the Crown.

So soon as King Henry was dead and buried, the great Lords of the Land caused his eldest Son Prince Edward to be proclaimed King; and assembling at the new Temple in London, they there took order for the quiet Governing of the Kingdom till he should come home. For at this time he was absent in the Holy Land, and had been there above a year when his Father died. But we cannot bring him home without telling what he did, and what he suffered in all that time, and in his return. For at his first coming thither he refused the Great City of Jerusalem from being surrendered to the Soultan; after which out of envy to his Valour, one Armacius a deprecate Saracen, who had often been employed to him from their General, being one time, upon pretence of some secret message admitted alone into the Chamber, with a poisoned Knife gave him three wounds in the body, two in the arm, and one near the arm-pit, which were thought to be mortal, and had perhaps been mortal, if out of unpeaceable love the Lady Eleanor his Wife had not stuck out the poison of his wounds with her mouth; and thereby effecting a cure, which otherwise had been incurable. It is no wonder, that love should do wonders, which is itself a wonder. And now being disappointed of aids that were promised to be sent him, and leaving Garrisons in fit places for defence of the Country, he with his Wife Eleanor takes his journey homewards. And first going to Sicily, was there most kindly received by Charles, King of that Island, where he first heard of his Father's death; which he took more heavily far, than he had taken the death of his young Son Henry, whereof he had heard a little before. At which time King Charles marvailed, he answered, that other Sons might be had, but another Father could never be had. From hence he passeth through Italy, where much honour is done him both by the Pope, and other Princes; and then descends into Burgoyne, where the Earl of Chalton, a stout man at arms, he is challenged at a Turnament, with a pretence to solemnize his presence; but with a purpofe indeed to disgrace his person. And though Prince Edward in many respects might justly have refused it; yet the noblenes of his minde would not suffer him to pass by any occasion of shewing his Valour: and in this encounter he fo foiled the Earl, as he made it appear; that Fame had been no liar in the report it had made of him. And here a great part of his English Nobility met him, from whence he passed into France, where the King Philip his near Cousin (as being Sifters Sons) entertain him with great solemnity; and graceh his solemnity with so much courteties, that it won Prince Edward voluntarily to do him homage for the Territories he held in France: and this voluntary in Prince Edward won the King of France again to grant quietly unto him all the Lands in France that belonged to him; and so these two great Kings by reciprocal courteties, effecting that which their Predecessors by force could never effect. From hence he paffed through Aquitaine, and having there taken homage of his Subjects, and fet all things in order, he set sail and arrived in England, above a year after the death of his Father; a long time for plotting of mischief, and a strong temptation to plots of mischief, if all caufes of quietsness had not concurred: but such was the worthines of Prince Edward's person, and such the undoubtednes of his Title; that as there could be no Competitor, so there would be no oppugner. And indeed the Divine Providenc had shewed a special care over him from his Childhood; whereof one or two Examples will not be unfit to be related. One was this, that being yet but young, and playing one time at Chefs with a Friend, in the midst of his Game, without any apparent occasion, he removed himself from the place where he was, when suddenly there fell from the roof of the house, a great stone, which if he had played in the place but never to little, had beaten out his brains. Another example of the Divine Providence over him, (though it happened afterwards) was this: Having prepared a great Fleet of Ships for a Journey into Flanders, and being at Winchefter, where the Ships were to meet; it happened, that riding about the Harbour, his horfe frighted with the noise of a Wind-mill, which the winde drove violently about, scrambled up and leapt over the Mud-wall of the Town, as none of the King nor the Horfe was to be seen, but evey one judged the King could not chance but be thrown and killed: yet such was the Divine Providence over him, that the Horfe lighted... lighted upon his feet, and the King keeping the Saddle returned safe. And under the wing of this Divine Providence, he had now pass'd all the dangers of this tedious Journey, and being safely come to London, was on the fifteenth day of August in the year 1274, Crowned at Westminster, together with his Wife Queen Eleanor, by Robert Kilwardy Archbishop of Canterbury, where five hundred great Horses were let loose for any that could take them; and yet the outward solemnity was not more great than the inward joy was universal; every man rejoicing, not only at a change, which of it felt is pleasing but at a change for so much for the better, as this was like to be.

Of his Acts done after he was Crowned.

The Acts of this King after he was Crowned, may not unfly be divided into five parts: His Acts with his Temporal Lords; His Acts with his Clergy; then with Wales; then with Scotland; and lastly with France.

And first concerning his Lords, he gave them good contentment in the beginning of his reign by enlarging their liberties made by the former Laws, for which purpose he called a Parliament, wherein were made the Statutes called of Westminster first: for he had no difference with them, till toward the end of his Reign, as shall be showed hereafter. In the next place, concerning his Acts with his Clergy, he began with them betimes; for having lived to be of good age, three or four and thirty years old, in his fathers reign, he observed in that time, that their power was too predominant, and therefore thought fit to clip their wings; at least to keep them farther from growing; which he did by these means. First, in the sixtieth year of his Reign, he deprived many chief Monasteries of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Coconut of Westminster, the return of Writs granted them by the Charter of his Father, King Henry the third. The next year after it was granted the Statutes of Westminster, to hinder the increasement of their Temporal possessions. In the second Statute of Westminster, he defalcated the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Judges; and growing more upon them, he required the moiety of all their Goods, as well Temporal as Spiritual, for one year. Then calls he a Parliament of his Nobles at Salisbury, without admission of any Churchmen in it. And it is worth the noting, that Marchen his Treasurer, acquainting him that in Churches and Religious Houses, there was much Treasure to be had, if it might be taken, he made no scruple of it, but caused it to be taken and brought into his Exchequer. But finding his Prelates not well contented with it, to please them again, he bids them ask something of him, wherein they should see how much he favoured them. And they asking of him to repeal the Statute of Mortmain, that had been made against the monasteries, he answered, that this was Statute made by the whole body of the Realm; and therefore was not in his power, who was but one Member of that Body, to undo that which all the Members together had done. And perhaps whatsoever they should have asked else, he would have had an answer to redeem his offer. And thus much concerning his Clergy.

In the next place are the Welsh, who had themselves begun with the King. For their Prince Llywelyn being summonsed to attend at his Coronation, refused to come; and afterwards at more leisure, being required to come and do him homage, he stood upon terms of safe conduct, pretending doubts to be ufed: as his Father Griffith had been: who upon hard usage in the Tower, seeking to make escape, fell from the Walls and brake his neck. But indeed it was always a custom with this Nation, at every change of Princes in England, to try conclusions, hoping at one time or other, to have a day of it; and to change their yoke of Bondage into Liberty: for which they were never better provided then now, (especially which is the greatest matter in War) having a valiant Prince to their Leader. But there happened an accident which took off their edge at this time. For the Lady Eleanor, a Daughter of the late Earl Simon Montford, whom Prince Llywelyn extremely loved, passing out of France into Wales, was by the Sea taken by English Ships, and brought to King Edward; and for the love of her Prince, Llywelyn was content to submit himself to any conditions; which besides subjection of his State, was to pay fifty thousand pounds standing, and a thousand pounds per annum during his life. And upon these conditions the marriage with his beloved Lady was granted him, and was solemnized here in England; whereas the King and Queen were themselves present. Three years Llywelyn continued loyal, and within the bounds of obedience; in which time, David, one of his Brothers, staying here in England, found by the King to be of a furring Spirit, was much honoured by him, Knighted, and matched to a rich widow, daughter of the Earl of Derby, and had given him by the King besides, the Castle of Denbigh, with a thousands pounds per annum: though (as it was after) when he found he lived here but in the nature of a spy. For when the young and bold Lady was afterward dead, and that he (contrary to his Conditions formerly made) brake out into Rebellion, then goes his Brother David to him, notwithstanding all these favours of the King; and they together enter the English Borders, surprize the Castles of Flint and Roskild, with the perfon of the Lord Clifford, sent Jullician into those parts: and in a great Battle overthrew the Earls of Northumberland, and Surrey, with the slaughter of Sir William Linfley, Sir Richard Tanny, and many others. King Edward adverfated of this Revolt and Overthrow, being then at the Vizas in Wiltfï, prepares an Army to repress it; but before his setting forth, goes privately to his Mother Queen Eleanor, lying at the Nunnery of Amity, with whom whilt he conferred, there was one brought into the Chamber, who feigned himself (being blind) to have received his sight at the Præst of King Henry the third. Ailson as the King saw the man, he remembered he had seen him before, and knew him to be a most notorious lying Villain, and wish'd his Mother in no case to believe him: but his Mother, who much rejoiced... to hear of this Miracle, for the glory of her Husband, finding her Son unwilling that his Father should be a Sain, grew ficker; three such a reign against him, that the commanded him to avoid her Chamber: which the King obeys; and going forth, meets with a Clergy-man, to whom he tells the story of this Impotent, and merrily said, He knew the justice of his Father to be such, that he would rather pull out the eyes (being whole) of such a wicked wretch, then restore them to their sight. In this mean time the Archbishop of Canterbury had gone of himself to Prince Leeby, and had labour'd to bring him and his Brother Davi to a re-submission, but could effect nothing; for besides other reasons that swayed Prince Leeby, the concert of a Prophecy of Merlin, that he should shortly be Crowned with the Diadem of Britis, so over-weighted him, that he had no ear for peace, and shortly after no head. For after the Earl of Pembroke had taken Berrie Castle, which was the fear of Prince Leeby, he was himself slain in Battle; and his head cut off by a common Soldier, who sent to King Edward, who caused the fame to be crowned with Iriy, and to be fet upon the Tower of London. And this was the end of Leebly, the left of the Two Princes, betrayed (as some write) by the men of Buelah. Nor long after his Brother Davi also is taken in Wales, and judged in England to an ignominious death; first drawn at a Horse-tail about the City of Shrewsbury; then beheaded, the trunk of his Body divided, his heart and bowels burnt, his head sent to accompany his Brother's on the Tower of London, his four quarters to four Cities, Bristol, Northampton, York, and Winchester. A manifold Execution, and the first thrived in that kind to this Kingdom, in the person of the Son of a Prince, or any other Noble-man that we read of in our History. It is perhaps something which some here observe, that at the setting of this Conquest, King Edward loft his eld'ft Son Alphonfus, of the age of 14; a Prince of great hope; yet, it had only left to fucceed him, his Son Edward lately born at Carnarvon, and the first of the English, intituled Prince of Wales, but no Prince worthy of either Wales or England. And thus came Wales to be united to the Crown of England; in the eleventh year of this King Edward's Reign, who thereupon established the Government thereof, according to the Laws of England, as may be seen by the Statute of Ruland, in the twelfth year of his Reign.

The work of Wales being ferted, King Edward paffeth over into France, upon notice of the death of Philip the Hardie, to renew and confirm such conditions as his fathers in those parts required, with the new King Philip the fourth, intituled the Fair; to whom he doth homage for Aquitaine, having before quitted his claims to Normandy for ever. After three years and a half, being away in France, he returns in to England; and now in the next place comes the business with Scotland, and will hold him work at times as long as he lives, and his Son after him. Alexander the third, King of Scott, as he was running his Horfe, fell Horfe and Man to the ground, and brake his neck, and died immediately; by reason whereof (he leaving no issue, but only a Daughter of his Daughter Margaret, who died also soon after there, tell us prefently great contention about succession. Ten Competitors pretend Title, namely, Eric, King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, Robert Bruce, Earl of Aundale, John de Balliol, Lord of Galway, John de Haffing, Lord of Aberconway, John Cummin Lord of Badeney, Patrick de Dunbarre, Earl of March, John de Vejeti, Nicholas de Sales, William de Roy; all or most of them depending from David Earl of Hutington, younger Brother to William King of Scott, and great Uncle to the late King Alexander. This title King Edward takes upon him to decide, pretending a Right of Superiority from his Ancestors, over that Kingdom, and proving it by authority of old Chronicles, as Mariaus Status, William of Malmbury, Roger de Hовeden, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and others; which though the Scottifh Lords who prayd the interregnum opposed, yet are they constrained for avoiding of further inconveniences, to make him Arbiter thereof, and the ten Competitors bound to go in[f] to his award. Two are especially found, between whom the right lay, John de Balliol, Lord of Galway, and Robert Bruce; the one descended from an elder Daughter, the other from a Son of a younger daughter of Alan, who had married the eldest Daughter of this Davi, brother to King William. The controversy held long. Twelve of either Kingdom learned in the Laws, are elected to debate the fame at Berwick, all the best Civilians in the Universities of France are solicited to give their opinions; all which brought forth rather doubts than resolutions. Whereupon King Edward the better to fway this business by his presence, takes a journey Northward; where being come as far as Lincolnfires, he loft his beloved Wife Queen Eleanor, and thereupon going back to fee her Funeral personally done to her. That done he returns prefently to his Scottifeh metropolis; where his nine years were pasted since the death of King Alexander, and yet nothing concluded in this controversy; whereupon King Edward deals privately with Bruce (who had the weaker title, but the more friends) and promises him if he would swear fealty and homage to the Crown of England, he would invest him in that of Scotland. But Bruce answers, he was not so defirous to rule, as thereby to infringe the liberties of his Country. Whereupon with the like offers he fett upon Balliol, who having better right, but left lofs love of the people, and more greedy of a Kingdom then Honour, accepts the condition; and thereupon is Crowned King at Scone; hath fealty done him by all the chief Nobility, except Bruce; comes to New-Coffle upon Time, where King Edward then lay; and there with many of his Nobles, gives fealty, and doth homage to his as his Sovereign Lord. Whereafter he left done to secure him, overthrew him; for being little beloved before, hereby he became less. Such as stood for Bruce, and others of the Nobility (tender of the prefervation of their Countreyes Liberty) took Romack against him; and not only for this, but shortly after for his injustice in the cafe of the Earl of Eife, one of the six Governors in the time of the interregnum. fell upon the Officers he had left, flew Sir Hugh Crestingham with six thousand English, recovered many Castles, and regained the Town of Berwick; and all by the animation and conduct of one William Walley, a poor private Gentleman, (though Nobly descend) Who seeing his Country without Head, and thereby without a Heart (all the great men either in captivity, or subjection) assembles certain of as poor and desperate estate as himself, and leads them to attempt upon whatever advantages they could finde to annoy the English, and having therein good success, it so increased both his courage and company, that he afterward came to be the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom: and was in so ability to have absolutely redeem'd his Country from the subjection of the English, if the speedily coming of King Edward had not prevented him. For now King Edward, to bring his work near together, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Justice to York, where they continued above six years; and thither he calls a Parliament, requiring all his Subjects that held of him by Knights service, to be ready at Rollo rough by a peremptory day: where there assembled three thousand men at Arms on hallowed horses, and four thousand other armed men on horse without bards, with an Army of Foot answerable, consisting of Walf and Irish, besides five hundred men at Arms out of Devon and Cornwall. And with his power he makes his second expedition into Scotland; the Earls of Hertford and Northumberland, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Vount guard at the famous battle of Falkirk, where the forces of the King were so great, the King Edward's horse frightened with all, and his head off, and brake two of his ribs, which notwithstanding he gets up again, goes on, and gets victory, wherein are reported to be slain two hundred Knights, and forty thousand foot of the Scots: but William Walley, with some few, escape to make more work. And here again that Kingdom might seem as if quite overthrown. Most of the estates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their titles) that had stood out, were bestowed on the English, and a Parliament is called at Saint Andrews, where all the great men of that Kingdom, except only Walley, once again swear Fealty to the King of England. It seems prevailing of Fealty was with the Scots but a ceremony without substance, as good as nothing; for this is now the third time they swore Fealty to King Edward: yet all did not serve to make them Royal. For not long after comes the news of a new King made and Crowned in Scotland, Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, son to that Bruce who was come over with Baliol, and the people of England, when they comes Head to the confined Body of that Kingdom, and perceiving John Cunningham (who had a title himself) to go about to bewray his intentions to King Edward, he finding him at Dunfermline, sets upon him, and murderers him in the Church. Whereof as soon as King Edward heard, he sends Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, and the Lords Clifford and Percy, with a strong power to revenge the death of Cunningham, and to relieve his Wardens of Scotland; who upon Bruce's revolt, were all retired to Berwick, whilst himself prepares an army to follow: wherein to be the more nobly attended, he caused Proclamation to be made made, that whosoever ought by their Paternal succesion, or otherwise had means of their own for service, should repair to Welfminster, at the Feast of Pentecost, to receive the Order of Knighthood, and a Military ornament out of the Kings Wardrobe. Hereupon three hundred young Gentlemen, all the sons of Earls, Barons, and Knights, assemble at the day appointed, and receive Purples, Silks, Saldins, Scarfs, wrought with Noble Silver, according to every mans Estate. For which train (because the Kings horse was too little, by reason a part of it had been lately burnt) room is made, and the Apple-trees cut down at the new Temple for their Tents, where they attire themselves, and keep their Vigile. The Prince (whom the King then likewise Knighted, and gave him the Dutchy of Aquitaine) kept his Vigile with his Train at Welfminister; and the next day he girded these three hundred Knights with the Military Belt, in such manner as he himself had received it: Which done, the King before them all, makes a Vow, that alive or dead, he would revenge the death of Camusson upon Bruce, and the perjured Scots; Adjourning his Son and all the Nobles about him, upon their Fealty, that if he died in this journey, they should carry his corps with them about Scotland, and not suffer it to be interred, till they had vanquished the Ufarper, and abso- lutely brought the Country to subjicetion; The Prince, and all the Nobles thereupon their faith, to imploy their utmost power to perform his Vow: and herewith he sets forth with a potent Army, presently after Whitsuntide, and makes his last expedition into Scotland, in the four and thirtieth year of his reign; at which time he made above two hundred Knights.

The Earl of Pembroke, with that power sent before, and aid of the Scotch party, had before the King arrived in Scotland, defeated in a battle near St. Johns-Town, the whole Army of the new King, and narrowly miffed the taking of his person; but he escaping in disguise, and sheltering himself in obscured places, was referred for greater Battles: his Brothers Nigel, Bruce and shortly after, Thomas, and Alexander a Prieff, were taken and executed after the manner of Traytors at Berwick. And now King Edward had done for fighting, all was now for Execution; and indeed his desire of revenge made him end all, and now to spare none of what degree ever. The Earl of Aisbth (though of Royal Blood, and allied unto him) was sent to London, where all his prerelment was, to have a higher pair of Gallows then the rest. The wife of Robert Bruce, taken by the Lord Ralf, is sent prisoner to London, and his daughter to a Monastery in Lindsey. The Counteys of Boughan, who had been aiding at Bruce’s Coronation, is put into a wooden Cage, and hung out upon the Wall of Berwick for people to gaze on. But though Bruce’s party was thus dejected, and himself at this time appeared not, but shifted privyly from place to place in a diifترacted manner, (attended only with two Noble Gentlemen, who never forsook him in his misfortunes, the Earl of Lenox and Gillette Hakes) yet gives he not over, but gathers new Forces, with which heuddenly affails the Earl of Pembroke at unwares, gives him a great defect, and within three days after chafeth the Earl of Glocifer, into the Caftle of Aire, where he beleghed him, till by the Kings forces he was driven again to his for- mer retire. Whereupon King Edward who had spent his Winter at Carlisle, in July following, with a fresh Army enters Scotland himself; but three dights falling into a Diftery or Bloody Plac at Ber- wick upon the Sands he ended his life. And thus ended King Edwards troubles with Scot- land, but not Englands troubles, which are more to come then yet are past.

But though this butines of Scotland never left King Edward till his dying day, yet it had been upon him but as an auge, sometimes putting him into violent heats, and sometimes leaving him in a quiet temper with fuch a vicifitude, that when he had qui nefs with Scotland, he had troubles with France, whereof the time is now to speak. It is well known that Philip King of France, fa- ther of the present King, and Edward King of England were near Cousins, the sons of two fitters; and it had been fhewed before at King Edwards returning from the Holy-Land, and passing through France, what extraordinary kindnes and mutual courtey, passed between them, that one would have thought neither they nor theirs had ever have fallen out; and perhaps never should, if they had been private men, and not Princes. For private men may easily continue friends, as havin been done to confer but them selves; but Princes hardly can be friends, for he be- sides themselves, their Subjects to consider. And though they be the Subjects oftimes—that make the quarter, yet they are the Princes that must maintain it. And besides, between Princes there can never be but jealousies, and where jealousies are, every trifle makes a quarrel. And this was the case of these two Kings. Certain of the King of Englands Subjects had upon the Coast of Norway, done spoil to some Subjects of the King of France; and this difference of the Subjects made a difference between the Kings, while each of them standing in defence of his own, fall out themselves; and for a beginning the King of France summons King Edward, as ow- ing homage to that Crown, to appear and an- swer it in his Court. And King Edwards though voluntarily before he had done it in a way of courtey, yet being now impetuously commanded, he refutfeth it; upon which refufal, all his Territories in France are condemned to be forfeited, and an Army is presently fent to feize upon the fame, led by Charles de Palais, and Arnold de Niel, Contable of France. Bordeaux with div- erse other pieces of importance, are taken from him. And now King Edward well knowing what danger it was to have so powerful an adversary, endeavours first to strengthen himself with friends abroad, hoks to match his fon Edward with a daughter of Guy Earl of Flanders; marries one of his daughters to the Duke of Barre, who pretended title to Cagnapo; another to John Duke of Brabant; sends fifteen thousand pound stering to Adolph de Neffen, the Emperor, for recovery of certain Lands which he claimed in France; and with all these and many other confi- ning Princes, he fetts upon the King of France, and then sends over his brother Edmund Earl of Lan- cafter, the Earl of Lincoln, and Richmond, with eight and twenty Banners, even hundred men at Arms.
and a Navy of three hundred and fifty sail. In the meantime the King of France having had intelligence of the intended alliance between King Edward, and Guy Earl of Flanders, sends for the said Earl (as if knowing nothing there-of) to come with his Wife and Daughter, to make merry with him at Paris; where instead of feasting him, he makes him Prisoner, and takes from him his Daughter, in regard he sought (being his Vassal) to match her with his capital Enemy. The Earl excuseth it the best he could; and by much mediation is released himself, but not his Daughter. Whereupon the Earl, presuming upon aid from King Edward, takes Arms anddefies the King of France. Who thereupon comes with an Army of sixty thousand against him; which caused King Edward with all speed possibly to relieve this distressed Earl: and to leaving the Government of the Kingdom in his absence, to the Bishop of London, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lords Reynolds, Grey, and Clifford, with five hundred sail, and eighteen thousand men at Arms he passed over into France. But finding the Country disheartened into many popular factions, and the King of France daily getting upon them (having already Lisle, Dausoy, Courtry, Burgoyne, and Dam) and the Emperor Adolph failing to lend him aid as he had promised, he fell into great perplexity; and having stayed the whole Winter at Gannoy, where by reason of many outrages committed by his Soldiers, he was so affrighted by the Count- ties, that his own person was not without some danger. He therefore in the Spring of the year concludes a Truce with the King of France for two years, takes his filler Margaret to wife, and enchaineth the daughter of the same King to his son Prince Edward; and so returns into England. And there were all the troubles King Edward had with France.

But now much something be spoken of the troubles with his Lords at home, whereof this was the beginning. In a Parliament at Salisbury, the five and twentieth year of his reign the King requires certain of his Lords to go to the Wars in Gaffoum; which needed a pretence supply, by reason of the death of his Brother Edmund; but the Lords make all their excuses, every man for himself: Whereupon the King in great rage threatened they should either go, or he would give their Lands to others that should. Upon this Humphry Bohun, Earl of Hereford, High Constable, and Roger Biggs Earl of Norfolk, Marshal of England, make their Declaration; that if the King went in perfon they would attend him, other wise nor. Which answer offended the King more, and being urged again, the Earl Marshal protested he would willingly go with the King, and march before him in the Vant-guard, if the King would forbear to do it; But the King told him plainly, he should go with any other, though he went not himself in person. I am not so bound (faith the Earl) neither will I take that journey without you. The King swore by God, Sir Earl, you shall either go or hang: And I swear by the same Oath (said the Earl) I will neither go nor hang, and without leave depart. Shortly after the two Earls assembl'd many Noblemen, and other their friends to the number of thirty Banneretts; so as they were fifteen hundred men at Arms, well appointed, and stood upon their guard. The King like a prudent Prince, who knew his times, profectes them not al the then; but less the matter past, in regard that his business called him professedly into Flanders. When being ready to take ship, the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons, and the Commons, lend him a Roll of the grievances of his Subjects, concerning his Taxes, Subsidies, and other Impositions, with his seeking to force their services by unlawful courses: to which the King answers, that he could not alter any thing without the advice of his Council, who were not row about him; and therefore required them, seeing they would not attend him in his journey, (which they absolutely refused to do, though he went in person, unless he had gone into France or Scotland) that they would yet do nothing in his absence prejudicial to the peace of the Kingdom: and that at his return, he would feel all things in good order to their contentment. But having taken his journey, and being held there with long delays, to his exceeding great expences, he was forced to fend over for more supply of Trefure; and thereupon gave order for a Parliament to be held at York, by the Prince, and (because of his minority, for he was then but sixteen years of age) by such as had the managing of the Kingdom in his absence: and to the end he would not be disappointed of aid, he condescends to all such Articles as were demanded, concerning the great Charter: promising from thenceforth never to charge his Subjects otherwise than by their consents in Parliament, and to pardon all such as had denied to attend him in this Journey. After this, in the 27. year of his Reign, a Parliament is called at Westminster, wherein the promised confirmation of the two Charters, and that the what difference what difference had heretofore been made, was expressly urged, and in the end much ado granted; and that with omission of the clause, Sa egis jurc Coro nae natur, which the King laboured to have inferred, but the people by no means would agree; and the perambulation of the Forests of England was then committed to three Bishops, three Earls, and three Barons. But some years after, in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Edward began to chew his regiment of the island born behaviour of his Nobles towards him in times past; and so terrifies Roger Biggs, Earl Marshall, that to recover his favour the Earl made him his Heir, in pofleffion; (though he had a Brother of his own, living) referring only to himself a thousand pounds per annum, during his life. Of others likewise he got great sums for the same offence. The Earl of Hereford escaped his fine by death; but the Archbishop of Canterbury, (who accursed to have disturbed his peace in his absence) he orders over and beheaded the fifth, (who succeeded Bohun) that he might be cruel with a double power. This Pope was Native of Burducan, and so the more regardful of the Kings desire, and the King the more confident of his favour; which to entertain and increasen, King Edward sends him a whole furnish of all Vessels for his Chamber of clear Gold: which great gift so wrought with the Pope, that he united the King from the Covenant made by the with his Subjects concerning their Charters, Pope. confirmed unto them by his last three Acts of Parliament, and absolved him from his Oath. A safe time for Princes, when they might try themselves to any Obligation to their Subjects, and afterward for a brieft to the Pope be united again.

His Taxations and ways for raising of Money.

Taxations may suffer degrees of comparison, it may not unfrequently be laid of these three last Kings, that King John was in the Positive; his Son Henry the Third, in the Comparative; and this King Edward in the Superlative: For not only he far exceeded the two former, but he hath left a spell to all that come after, for ever coming near him: But then under the name of Taxations, we must include the ways he took for raising of profift, but first the ways of Parliament. In the first year of his Reign was granted him a tenth of the Clergy for two years, besides a fifteenth of them and the Temporaly. In his fifth year, a twentieth of their goods towards the Welsh Wars. In his seventh the old money was called in, and new coined; in regard it had been much defaced by the fen, for which 297 were at one time executed in London: and this brought in profift of no small value. In his eleventh year, he had a thirtith of the Temporaly, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for his Wars in Wales. In the thirteenth, Elycage, forty fillings of every Knights Fee. In his fourteenth year he had a thousand Marks of fertain Merchants fined for falfte goods. In his nineteenth, the eleventh part of all moveables of the Clergy, and shortly after a tenth for fix years. In his twentieth, William Marchian, then Lord Treasurer of England, perceiving great riches to be Church and Religion out of thefe, but fo into the Kings head, that they were all brought into the Kings Treasury. In the eightie year of his Reign he sent out his Writ Quo Warranto, to examine by what Title men held their Lands, which brought him in much Money; till John Earl of Warren, being called to shew his Title, drew out an old rusty Sword, and then said he held his Land by that, and by that would hold it to death: which thought it made the King delit from his project, yet he obtained at that time a fifteenth part of the Clergy. In his fourteenth year he fined all his Judges for corruption: Sir Ralph Halsey, Chief Justice of the Higher Bench, in seven thousand Marks; Sir John Loeven, Justice of the lower Bench, in three thousand Marks; Sir William Brompton, in fix thousand Marks; Sir Solomon Richefter, in four thousand Marks; Sir Richard Boyland, in four thousand; Sir Walter Hopton in two thousand; Sir William Subham, in three thousand; Robert Lithbury, Master of the Rolls, in one thousand; Roger Leisfeffer, in one thousand; Henry Bayly, Escheator, and Judge for the Jews, in one thousand; but Sir Adam Stratton, chief Baron of the Exchequer, in four and thirty thousand: and Thomas Wayland (found the greatest Delinquent, and of the greatest Subfblance) had all his Goods and whole Estate confiscated to the King, and himself banifhed out of the Kingdom. In his eightieb year he banifhed the Jews; of whom there was at that time above fifteen thousand in the Kingdom, who had all their Goods confiscate, leaving them only means to bear their charges in going away.

In his four and twentieth year, he commanded a Subidy to be levied upon all Sarfparls of Wool going out of England; as likewise with Fells and Hides. In his fifth and twentieth year he calls a Parliament at St. Edmundsbury, where is granted the eight part of the Goods of good Towns, and all other people the twelfth. As for the Clergy they desire to be execufed, and refuse to contribute, in regard of their many late payments; as in the two and twentieth year of his Reign they payed the money of their Goods. And in his three and twentieth year he feized into his hands all Priories, Alhns, and their Goods; besides he had a loan of the Clergy, which amounted to a hundred Thousand Pounds: but notwithstanding upon this refusal of the Clergy, the King puts all Clergy-men out of his Protection, whereby they were to have no Justice in any of his Courts; (A strain of State beyond any of his Predecessors) which so amazed them, that in the end, the Archbishop of York, with the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury, and Lincoln, yielded to lay down in their Churches, the fifth part of all their Goods towards the maintenance of the Kings Wars; whereby they appeased his wrath, and were received into grace. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, by whom animation the rest flied out, had all his goods feized on, and all the Moniferies within his Diocles, taken into the Kings hands; and Wardens appointed to minister only necessaries to the Monks, converting the reit to the Kings life: at length by much fair, the Abbots and Priests giving the fourth part of their goods, redeeming themselves, and the Kings favours. In the six and twentieth year of his Reign, a Parliament holden at York, is granted him the ninth penny of the goods of the Temporaly: the tenth penny of the Clergy of the Diocles of Canterbury, and of York the fifth; and in this year also he raised the Impofition upon every fack of Wool, from a Noble to forty fillings. In his two and thirtith year he fends out a new Writ of Inquisition, called Trailblazon, for intruders on other mens Lands; who to opprefs the right owner, would make over their Land to great men; for Batterers hired to beat men, for Breakers of Peace, for Ravifhers, Incendiaries, Murderers, Fighters, false Affiliors, and other fuch Malefactors; which Inquisition was fo strictly executed, and fuch Fines taken, that it brought in exceeding much treafe to the King. As likewise did another Commiffion at the fame time, fent forth to examine the Charges of the Courts, and of Ministers of Justice; wherein many were found Delinquent, and paid dearly for it. At this time also he called his Lords to account for their thimb- bornets some years before, in denying to attend him into Flanders; which brought him in profit anfwerable to their greatnesse which were called. After all this, in his four and thirtith year, there is granted him the thirtith penny of both Clergy and Laity, and the twelfth of all Merchants towards his journey into Scotland. And this may be sufficient to fhew his Taxa-Taxations to have been in the superlative degree. And yet besides thefe, he had no small benefit by silver Mines, which in his time were found in Devonshire.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

In the first year of his reign were made the Statutes called of Westminster the first. In his twelfth year were made the Statutes of Alton Burel. In the fourteenth year of his Reign were made Statutes called Additions to Glæcestria. He ordained such men to be Sheriffs in every County, as were of the same County where they were to be Sheriffs. He ordained that fens should wear a cognizance upon their upper garment, whereby to be known, and restrained their exceffive taking of Utfray. In his time was also enacted the Statute of Mortmain.

In his twelfth year, in the Quindene of Saint Michael, the Judges Itinerants began to go their general Circuits. In his time new pieces of money were coined, and half pence of Silver, which were before of base metal. In his time three men for refuelling a Prisoner, arreted by an Officer, had their right hands cut off by the writs. In his time all fens were banished out of the Realm. This King by Proclamation prohibited the burning of Sea-Coal in London and the Suburbs, for avoiding the noifome smoke. In his eleventh year the Bakers of London were first drawn upon Hurdles, by Henry Walcy, Mayor, and Corn was then first sold by weight. In this Kings time the Title of Baron which had before been promiscuous to men of estate, was first confined to such only as by the King were called to have voice in Parliament. In the sixth year of this King, Mich. elmas term was kept at Shrewsbury. In his twelfth, he divided Wales into Shires, and ordained Sheriffs there as are used in England.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In his time, at a Synod holden at Reading by the Archbishop of Canterbury, it was ordained according to the Constitutions of the General Council, that no Ecclesiastical person should have more than one Benefice, to whom belonged the Cure of Souls; and that every person promoted to any Ecclesiastical living, should take the order of Priesthood within one year after. In his time lived and died Pope Boniface the 8. of whom his Predecessor had professed: Abscondit a liminis, regredatur ad Los mortuusque ad Canis.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

This King founded the Abbey of the Vale Royal in Cheffhire, of the Cifbusa Order. In his time John Baliol King of Scotts, builded Baillol Colledge in Oxford: also in his time, Walter Merton Lord Chancellour of England, and after Bishop of Rochester, founded Merton Colledge in Oxford, who was drowned paling over the water at Rochester, there being at that time no Bridge, as now there is. In his time was finished the new Work of the Church at Westminster, which had been therefore and lies years in building. In his time was laid the foundation of the Black-Friers besides Loundgate, by Robert Kilwardy, ArchbiSHOP of Canterbury, and of Bayndurs. Also in his time, his second wife Queen Margaret began to build the Quire of the Grey-Friers in London. In his time was begun to be made the great Conduit in London, standing against the Church called Acres in Cheop. In his time Henry Walcy, Mayor of London, called the Bishops Court to be a Prifon for night-walkers; and also builded a house called the Stockes, for a Market of filk and debris, in the midlet of the Civ. In this Kings time, Edmund Earl of Leicester, the Kings Brother, founded the Minoris, a Nursery without Alagate. This King builded the Castle of Flint in Wales, and the Castle of Buckmeria in the Isle of Anglesey, and the Castle of Carnarvon by Snowden. Also in this Kings time, John Pecham Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a Colledge of Canons at Wingham in Kent.

Caufes happening in his time.

In the second year of this Kings Reign, there happened the greatest rot of Sheep in England that ever was known, which continued fifty and twenty years; and came (as was thought) by one infected sheep of incredible greatness, brought out of Spain by a French Merchant into Northumberland. In the fifteenth year of this Kings Reign, Wheat was sold for ten groats a Quarter; where the next year after there was no great a dearth, that it was sold for eighteene pence the Baltel. In the seventeenth year of his Reign, there fell so much rain, that Wheat was rafed from three pence the Baltel, to sixteen pence; and so increased yearly, till at last it was sold for twenty shillings the Quarter. And this year the City of Carlile, and the Abbey with all the Hooles belonging to the Fryers Minoris, was consumed with fire. In his one and twentieth year a great part of the Town of Cambridge, with the Church of our Lady was also burnt. In the feaven and twentieth year of his Reign his Palace at Westminster, and the Monastery adjoining were consumed with fire. The Monastery of Glasselter was also burnt to the ground. In this year also an Act of Common Council by confent of the King, was made concerning Visituals, a fat Cock to be sold for three half pence, two Pullets for three half pence, a fat Capon for two pence half penny, a Goose four pence, a Mallard three half pence, a Partridge three half pence, a Pheasant four pence, a Heron six pence, a Plver one pence, a Swan three shillings, a Crane twelve pence, a Woodcock three half pence, a fat Lamb from Christmas to Shrovetide, sixteen pence, and all the year after for four pence; and Wheat was this year fo plentiful, that a Quarter was sold for ten groats. In his sixteenth year it chanced in Caffel, that as the King and Queen went and their Chamber, upon a Bed talking together, a Thunderbolt coming in at the Window behind them, passed between them, and flew two of their Gentlemen, that stood before them.

He had two Wives, his first was Eleanor Daughter to Ferman in the third King of Spain, Spain; and was married to him at Bures in Spain; who having lived with him six and thirty years, in a journey with him towards Scotland, at Hardley in Lincolnshire the dyed. In whose memory, and as monuments of her vertue, and his affection, King Edward caused to be erected in all chief places, where her corps in carrying to Wiltfinfer, relifted; as at Stamford, Dunstable, St. Alban, Wiltfinfer, Cheshaf; and lastly at the place called Charing-Cross. She was buried in Wiltfinfer, at the feet of King Henry the third, under a fair Marble Tomb, adorned with her Portraiture of Copper gilt. By this Wife King Edward had four sons, and nine daughters; his eldest son, John; his second, Henry; his third, Alphonfs; died all young in their Father's time: his fourth son, Edward, called of Carnarvon, because born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom of his daughters, the eldest named Eleanor was first married by Proxy to Alphonfs King of Arragon; but he dying before the marriage solemnized, she was afterward married to Briflem to Henry Earl of Bar in France; by whom she had five sons and daughters. Joan the second daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, born at Aton in the Holy-Land, and thereof called Joan de Arce, was married to Gillet Clare, called the Red Earl of Gloucef, and had seven sons, by whom she had six sons and daughters. She survived her husband, and was re-married to the Lord Ralph Montemere: Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Montemere, Earl of Salisbury, from whom the crown Vicount Montemere is descended. Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, was married to John Duke of Brabant: Berenger and Alice, their fourth and fifth daughters, dying young and unmarried, Mary their sixth daughter, at ten years of age, was made a Nun in the Monastery of A lunaly in Wilts, at the instance of Queen Eleanor her Grandmother, who lived there. Elizafeth their seventh daughter, was first married to John Earl of Holland, Zealand, and Lord of Friesland; she dying within two years, she was afterward married to Humphrey Bifon Earl of Hereford and Essex, Lord of Brecknef, and High Conitable of England, by whom she had five sons and daughters. Beatrice and Blanch, their eight and ninth daughters, died young and unmarried. King Edward's second wife was Margaret, eldest daughter of Philip King of France, called the Fair, and sister to Philip called the Fair. At eighteen years old she was married to King Edward, being above three-score; yet at these unequal years she had issue by him, two sons and a daughter. Their eldest son was born at a little Village in Yorkshire called Brifhorfin, and was there called Thomas of Bretherton. He was created Earl of Norfolk, and Earl Marfhal of England, after Roger Bigot, and Earl of Bedford, died without issue. His daughter Jane for her beauty called the fair Maid of Kent, was married first to William Monteme, Earl of Salisbury; and from him divorced, was re-married to Sir Thomas Holland, in her Right Earl of Kent, and Father of Thomas and John Holland, Duke of Suffolk, and Earl of Huntingdon: and lastly, she was the Wife of Edward of Woodfleff, the Black Prince of Wales, and by him Mother of King Richard the second. This Earl Edmund was beheaded at Winchester, in the fourth year of King Edward his Nephew. Eleanor the daughter of King Edward by his second Wife Margaret, died in her childhood.

He was tall of stature, higher then ordinary men by head and shoulders, and therefore called Langthack; of a swarthly complexion, strong of body, but lean; of a comely favour; his eyes in his anger sparkling like fire; the hair of his head black and curled. Concerning his conditions, as he was in War peaceful: to in Peace he was warlike, delighting specially in that kind of hunting, which is to kill Staggs or other wild Beasts with Spears. In continuance of life, he was equal to his Father; in acts of valor far beyond him. He had in him the two Wisdoms not often found in any, single, both together, feldom or never: An ability of judgement in himself, and a readiness to hear the judgement of others. He seemed to be a great observer of opportunity (a great point of wisdom in any, in Princes greatest) and that he could bear an injury long, without seeking to revenge it; as appeared by his carriage toward the Earl Roger Bigot: whom when he saw his time, he called to account for an affront he had offered him divers years before. He was not easily provoked into passion, but once in passion, not easily appeased: so was seen by his dealing with the Scots, towards whom he shewed at first patience, and at last feverity. If he be contented for his many Taxations, he may be justified by his well bestowing them; for never Prince laid out his money to more honour of himself, or good of his Kingdom. His greatest unfortunateness was in his greatest blessing; for of four sons which he had by his Wife Queen Eleanor, three of them died in his own life time, who were worthy to have out-lived him: and the fourth out-lived him, who was worthy never to have been born.

Of his Death and Burial.

In his last expedition into Scotland, being at Carlisle, he fell sick; and lying in his deathbed, he fent for his son Edward: to whom beides many admonitions to piety, he commended three things specially; that he should carry his bones about with him through Scotland, till he had habited it; that he should tend his heart into the Holy Land, with feven hundred Knights to that War, and the two and thirty thousand pounds, he had provided for that purpose; and that he should never recall Caftelfon from banishment: and soon after of a dysenterie or Bloody Flux he died at Burgh upon the Sands, Sands, an alfo born whofe though and led Thomas who thefe Robert John cal-

The LIFE and REIGN of
KING EDWARD,
THE SECOND.

Of his Acts before, and at his Coronation.

EDWARD of Carnarvon, eldest Son of King Edward the first, succeeded him in the Kingdom, and never did Prince come to a Crown with more applause of Nobility and People: and there was good cause for it; for he had been trained up in all good courses for Piety and Learning; he had seen the Government of his Father, from whose Example he could not but have learned many good Lessons; he had been initiated in the ways of State, having been left Governor of the Realm, and prefiguring in Parliament in his Fathers absence; and he was now three and twenty years old, a fit age for bearing the weight of a Scepter. And yet for all these advantages, there wanted not tears of him in the minds of many, who could not but remember what pranks he had played not long before; how he had broken the Bishop of Chester's Park, and in most disorderly manner had killed his Deer, for which both himself had committed to Prison, and his friend Pierce Gaveston banished the Realm: and if he did such things, what might not be feared of him coming to be King? For seldom do advancement in honour alter men to the better; to the worst men, and commonly then when it is joined with an authority that fets them above controulment. Neither yet was their fear more out of what they had seen, then out of what they faw; for where he should have endeavoured to accomplish the charge his Father had given him on his death-bed, he seemed to intend nothing less, nothing more than wholly to break it; for he presently called home Pierce Gaveston from banishment: and the two and thirty thousand pounds, which his Father had specially appointed for the Holy War; either all or the most of it he bestowed upon Gaveston: And for carrying his Fathers bones with him about Scotland, it had been well if he had suffered them quietly to be laid at rest in England. For after the corps had been kept above ground, sixteen weeks in the Abbey of Waltham, and that the Bishop of Chester, Walter Longton, the then Lord Treasurer, and the Executor of his Fathers Will, was busy in preparing for his Funeral, he sent the Constable of the Tower to arrest him, and imprison him at Wottonford, seizing upon all his Goods, and giving them to Gaveston; and all for old grudges. And (that which seemed a high strain of incongruity) before he had seen performed his Fathers Funerals, which was not till the 27. of October following, he entered into a Treaty of his own Nuptials; for going over to Bologna, on the two and twentieth of January, he married Isabeau, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France; which marriage was honord with the presence of four Kings, the King of France himself, the King of Navarre his Son, the King of the Romans, and the King of Sicily: and three Queens besides the Bride, Mary Queen of France, Margaret the Dowager Queen of England, and the Queen of Navarre should be present. This was observed by the Lords of England; and thereupon when his Queen and he came afterward to be Crowned, they went unto him, signifying what a haughty transgression of his Fathers will it was to call home Gaveston: and seeing the charge was no less given to them then to him, if he did not perform it they would; and therefore unless he would remove Gaveston from the Court and Kingdom, they would hinder his Coronation from proceeding, which struck such a damp to Prince Edward's spirits, to think what a disgrace it would be to him, if so many of his great friends being present Charles of Valois the King of France's Brother, the Dukes of Brabant and Brabant, the Count of Luxemburg, who was afterward Emperor, the Duke of Savoy, the two Dutchesses of Brabant and Artois, with many other Princes and Great Ladies, if now his Coronation should be called in question, that he solemnly swore he would do what they desired in the next Parliament, so they would be quiet now. And thereupon on the 24. day of February, in the year 1307, his Queen and he were both Crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Henry Bishop of Winchester, by Commission from Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, being then in exile, and out of the Kingdom: At which solemnity there was so great a press of people, that Sir John Blackwell Knight was crowded to death. And now in the very act of his Coronation, there was given another provocation to the Lords against Gaveston; for the King had appointed him to carry the Crown of Saint Edward before him, (the greatest honour could be done to a Subject) which added to the other honours the King had done him, (for he had made him Earl of Cornwall, Lord of Man, and Lord Chamberlain) to incend the Lords, that they entered into consultation how to suppress this violence of the Kings affection; which shortly after they put in execution. Part of money, King Edward had none, with his Wife P... but the King of France gave him the Dutchy of Guyenne, which he had feiled upon before, as confcript to him; and thereupon King Edward did him Homage for that Dutchy, and for the County of Ponthieu.

Of his differences with his Lords about Gaveston.

We shall have here no Quinquennium Novum, No such five years, as New afforded in the beginning of his Reign; but this King at the first entrance of that which he is, and what he will be, must prove to be as long as he lives. For though he took some great and grave men to be of his Council, yet (as appeared afterward) he did it rather to the end they should be plant to him, than that he had any meaning to apply himself to them. For let them say what they would, Gaveston must be the Oracle; all the Kings actions were but Gaveston's imprerions. And now Gaveston presently after the Coronation, to let the world be a witness of his worthines, and that the King had not belewed his favours upon him with out caufe, caufed to be published a Turnament at Wallington; whither came all the great Lords of the Kingdom, as Thomas Earl of Lancaster, Humphry Earl of Hereford, Aymer Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Waren, with many others, all valiant men at Arms: yet none had the honour of the day like to Gaveston. And thus far he did well, if he could have stayed there, if having gotten true glory, he had not fallen into true ignomy. For the Lords envied him not so much for his advancement in honours, as they hated him for his insofency in Manners; for in a scornful pride he would be calling scoffs upon them all, calling Thomas Earl of Lancaster, the Stage-Player; the Earl of Lincoln Burllen-belly; Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, Joseph the Jew; and Guy Earl of Warwick the black Dog of Arden. Which scoffs together with his other insofencies, drew such a parry upon him, that in the next Parliament, the whole Assembly obtains of the King to draw Articles of their grievances, of which the chief were; that the great Charter of Magna Charta should be observed; that all strangers should be banfished the Court and Kingdom; that the builtones of the State should be treated of by the Council of the Clergy and the Nobles; and that the King should not begin any War, nor go out of the Kingdom without the consent of the Parliaments. Which Articles though seeming harsh to the King, yet for avoiding of further inconvenience, he yields into them; and specially to the banishment of his minion Gaveston, as hoping that would excite him for all the rest: and Robert of Winceby, Archbishop of Canterbury, lately called home from exile, pronounceth excommunication against all such as should oppose the Articles. Hereupon Gaveston is sent away into Ireland, where he lived a while, not as a banished man, but as Lieutenant rather of the Country; and indeed not unworthily. For in the time of his being there, he is faid to have made a journey into the Mountains of Dublin, and to have broken and subdue the Rebels there; built New-Castle in the Kems Country, repaired the Castle of Kertan, and passed up to Mounfer and Thanemun, performing every where much service, with great valour and worthines, that if he had stayed there but a while longer, he might perhaps by his defects in Ireland have redeemed his defects in England: but the King impatient of his absence, and asking advice what means might be used to recall him, It was told him, that if he could but match him with the Earl of Gloucester's Siller, a man of such greatness, and so beloved of the people, for his sake certainly no man would dare pride at his coming home. Hereupon the King sends for Gaveston, and makes up the March between them; and married they were at Barkersbost. But this did no good, for Gaveston still working upon the King in such manner, that he scarce left him means to sustain himself, and as little to maintain the Queen, nothing being done, but as Gaveston would have it, put the Lords into a new discontentment: who thereupon went again to the King and told him plainly, that unless he would put Gaveston out of the Court and Kingdom, they would rise up in arms against him as a perjured King. This put the King into a great frot: loth he was to leave Gaveston, and fearful he was to provoke the Lords; in the end his fear prevailing over his love, he was content he should be banished; and in such fhort banishment, that if ever he returned, or were found in the Kingdom, he should be held and proceeded against as an enemy of the State. So once again is Gaveston sent packing out of the Kingdom, and goes to France, but found no safe harboring there; For the King of France hearing of it gave a strait charge, if he were found in his Dominions to apprehend him. Then he paffeth into Flanders, but is no foter there than in France. After, waving about, and finding no place to refit in safety, he returns secretly into England, relying upon the Kings love, and the Duke of Gloucester's favour. The King receives him as an Angelfent from heaven; and to be out of the Lords eye, goes a journey to York, taking Gaveston along with him; and there thinks to be in quiet. But the Lords hearing of it, follow him thither, chufing for their General Thomas Earl of Lancaster, a man poftife'd of five Earldoms, Lancaster, Leicester, Ferrers, Lincoln, and Salisbury, besides the Liberties of Pickering, and the honour of Cogkamame, and other Lands in Wales, and there was not a man of the whole Assembly was willing to fave him. But the Duke of York, and Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, the King lifts Son. These Lords sent to the King, either to deliver Gaveston into their hands, or at least to fend him preemporily out of the Kingdom. But the King led by ill counfel, and little regarding the Lords meffage, takes Gaveston with him to New-Castle upon Tyne, thence to Tinnsmouth, where the Queen then lay, (who though great with Child, and entreating the King with tears to stay with her) yet fuch was his defire to fee Gaveston put into fome place of security, that hearing of the Lords approaching, he took a Ship, and paffed with Gaveston to Scarborough; and leaving them there in a strong Caffle, not easy to be won, he went himfelf into Warwicke, perhaps that the Lords might fee he had not Gaveston with him. But the Lords hearing where where Gaweston was, assaulted the Cattle with such violence, that Gaweston seeing no means to escape, was content to render himself: requesting only that he might but once be allowed to see the King's face; and the King hearing he was taken, desired as much. To which the Earl of Pembroke conformed; and taking Gaweston into his custody, promised upon Forfeiture of all he had, to have him forth coming: but desiring to be with his Wife that night, who lay not far off, at Dedington, he delivers him to his servants to carry to Wallingford; from whom as they paffed by Warnwik, the Earl of that place bearing of it, took him forcibly from his Keeper, and brought him to his own Cattle. Where after long deliberation, whether it were wisdom to suffer Gaweston to speak with the King or no; it was at last concluded to take off his head; which at a place thereby called Blacklow, was presently put in execution. His corps was carried to Oxford, and kept there two years, till the King caused it to be brought to Langley, and there built a Monastery of purpose, where his soul should be prayed for.

This Gaweston was the Son of a Gentleman of France, who had done good service for King Edward the first in France; and for his face this Son of his was taken and brought up with the Prince. A man of excellent parts of body, and of no less endowments of mind. Valiant and Witty; to which if we might add Vertuous, he had been compleat. Though the Lords (whether they had heard of, or whether they said he was that wicked man, the King from him) told them, that his Father was a Traitor to the King of France, and for the same was executed; and that his Mother was burnt for a Witch; and that this Gaweston was banished out of France for confessing to his Mothers Witchcraft; and that he had now bewitched the King himself. But why should the Lords be so violent against Gaweston? Might not the King place his affection where he pleased? Might not he make his own choice of what companion he liked? No doubt he might; and he should: but yet in this case the Lords had great caufe to do as they did; both in regard of the King, of themselves, and of the Commonwealth. It is true, if the value of Gaweston could as well have made the King valiant, as his riot made him riotous, there might some good have come of their extraordinary conjunction; but seeing virtues are so partial, voices only are communicative. In the King's case, the King would make such a man; but otherwise he would have been, but vicious wherever else otherwise he would not have been; and therefore great caufe in regard of the King to remove Gaweston from his company; and no less in regard of the Lords themselves. For Gaweston's advancing was their debaup: his greatnefs with the King made them but Cyphers: but in regard of the Commonwealth, most caufe of all; for while the King was altogether ruled by Gaweston, and Gaweston himself was altogether irregular, the Commonwealth could have but little hope of Justice, but was fure to suffer as long as Gaweston was suffered. And this may be sufficient to justify the Lords, that it be not interpreted to be Rebellion, which was indeed but Providence.

And now we have been two of the charges of his Fathers Will broken by the King, and punished in him; the two and thirty thousand pounds appointed for the Holy War, bestowed upon Gaweston, and the King for it punished himself with want: Gaweston called home from banishment, and the King for it punished, with the los of his Subjects love. It remains to see how well he performed the third charge of his Fathers will, for subduing of Scotland. It was now the fifth year after the death of his Father King Edward; and Robert Bruce now pretend to be King of Scotland, had thayed all this while to see how this new King Edward would prove. And when he found by the courses he held, that he was like to prove a good eafe enemy, he thereupon took heart, and began to stir, and in a very short time had brought all Scotland under his obedience; and finding no opposition he entered the English Borders, took and burnt Towns: that now King Edward, unless he would fit still, and suffer Bruce to come and pull his Crown from his head, he could not chufe but do something to stop his proceeding. Hereupon he prepares an Army, but like himself, fitter for a Court then for a Camp. Many men and great bravery; but reader to take spoils, then to make spoils: and accordingly they spent. For going to raise the siege at Stirling, defended for King Edward; and not being able to take the Mowbray, the Kings Army consisting of a hundred thousand, was defeated and overthrown by the Scots Army, consisting of scarce thirty thousand: So true is that saying of an ancient Souldier, There is more hope of an Army where the General is a Lion, though the Souldiers be but Sheep, then of an Army where the General is a Sheep, though the Souldiers be Lions. But indeed the Scots besides Valour used Policy; for having in their own Army none but Foot, no Horse at all, they had made Trenches in the ground three foot deep, covering them with Twigs and Hurdles, where the English Horsemen were to pass; who flounding in those Trenches, were killed no less by their own Fellows, then by the Enemy. In this Battle, called of Bannockburn, or Bannackburn, were slain the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Tiptoft, the Lord William Mar- shall, Sir Giles, Doctor Argents, and seven hundred Knights and Equires, specially Gilbert Earl of Glouceter, who had showed much valour that day; and whom the Scots would willingly have kept for ransom, if they had known him: but he had forgotten to put on his Coat of Arms whereby to be known. The slaughter of common Souldiers was certainly great, though perhaps not so great as Helver Brittan speaks of, who faith they were fifty thousand. There were taken Prisoners Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, John Seagrave, John Clauningham, William Latimer, and Sir Roger North- brook, bearer of the Kings Shield; the King himself with the Bishops, the Earls of Hert- ford, and Pembroke, and Hugh Spencer, saved themselves by flight: Humphrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford was afterward released in exchange for...
for Bruce’s Wife, who had been long kept a prisoner in England. After this many English fell away to the Scots; and all the North parts from Castile to York, came under their subjection: and the English grew so faint-hearted, and in to each contempt, that three Scots darted venture upon a hundred English, when a hundred English darted scarce encounter with three Scots. And what can be thought the cause of this great disharmony to this King, but the want of his Fathers Bleffing for not performing the charge he gave him dying, which is commonly accounted for in the want of a higher Bleffing, without which a Vizet is set upon the labours of men, that makes them all fruiteless? But Bruce not satisfied with his acquittals in England, sends his Brother Edward into Ireland also; who so far prevailed, that many Irish came in unto him, and in the end crowned him King of a great part of that Island: and he continued the space of three years, till the Primates of Armagh, and the Lord Birmingham, Justiciar of Ireland, gathering Forces together opposed him, and in a Battel taking him Prisoner at Dundalk cut off his head, with the slaughter of many thousands of the Scots besides. With which the Scots are so incendiated, that they invade again the English borders, foraging as far as York; whereupon a Parliament is assembled at London, wherein an aid is granted of armed men to go against them. London lets forth two: Hundred, Courtefly forty, Saint Almuns, and so proportionably for all Cities and Boroughs, whereby a great Army was levied: which coming to York, through mutiny, emulation, and other impediments was soon disolved, and returned back without effecting anything. Not long after the Town of Berwick was betrayed to the Scots, through the Treason of Peter Spalding the Governor, and other English men; whom the King of Scots to make them an example, caufed to be hanged for being Traitors to their Country. King Edward hearing of the surrendring of Berwick, raiseth an Army, and beleaguer it; but the Scots to divert his Forces, enter upon England by other ways, and were like to have surprized the person of the Queen, lying then near York. The siege of Berwick is notwithstanding eagerly continued, and the King in great difficulty to have regained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaster with his followers withdrawn himself upon difcontent; hearing the King say he would give the keeping thereof to Hugh Spencer the younger, who was now grown a special Favourite of the Kings, and therefore not to be endur’d by the Earl. In the mean time the Scots won the Battles of Harkefton, Work, and Misfard, so as they poiffessed the greater part of all Northumberland, burning all before them till they came to Ryton, which Town they spoiled: and carrying there three days, they received a Thouldan Marks to save the Town from burning, as they had done the Towns of Northallerton, Borough-Bridge, and others. In their returning back they burn Knarlsborough, and Skipton in Craven, and all other before them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous number of Castel, besides Prisoners, men and women. The Yorkifhe men thus grievously endamaged, gather together the number of ten thousand; and at the Town of Mitten, ten miles from York, encounter the Scots, where they loit three thousand of their men, and were defeated: which Bittel, because of the many spiritual men that were in it, was called the White Bittel. Whereof when the King heard he left the siege of Berwick, to follow the Scots, but they returned another way. The year following, King Edward once again with a great Army entered Scotland; but the Scots having destroyed all afore, the King oppreffed with Famine, was forced to return, whom the Scots followed, and in a place of the Forest of Blackmore fet upon him, that he hardly escaped; where were taken John Earl of Bristol, and the Lord of Silvas, the French Kings Ambafassador, and many other. After this King Edward finding the Scots either too strong or too wile for him, made a truce with them for two years, some fay for thirteen. And this was the succes of this unfortunate King in his Wars with Scotland.

But his troubles abroad were not fo grievous as those at home; or rather, they were those at home that made his troubles abroad fo grievous. For though the Lords having made an end of Gavefon, and cut off his head, though they had made an end of their need to bear Armine, and had cut off the head of all their difcontents; yet as if Gavefon had beft a Phoenix, as it were out of his afs another Phoenix rifeh prefently up, and puts the Lords to as much trouble as ever Gavefon did. For now the younger Spencer upon a sudden grows as great a favourite of the Kings as ever Gavefon was: and indeed in all points juft fuch another, equal to him in goodines of personage, in favour of the King, and in abuting the Lords. For though they were the Lords themselves that brought him at firft to be the Kings Chamberlain, the rather (as was thought) because he was one whom the King did not love; yet being once in the place, he foon won upon the King by diligent service, and by complying with the Kings humour, that he brought the King at laft to comply with his humour, and nothing must be done but as Spencer would have it. It feemes it was the Kings nature that he could not be without a bofom-friend; one or other to be an after friend: and to fek to remove fuch one from him, was to fek to remove him from himself: as improbable a thing as to alter nature. Yet the Lords being more fensible of their own grievance, to be influffed on by a Favourite, then of the Kings grievance to be aflronted by his Subjects, are more intentive to work their own ends than the Kings; and therefore to remove Spencer and his Father from the King, which they knew was a work not to be done but by ftrong hand, they continue their Arms; and condefcending together, they fend to the King, peremptorily requiring the confirmation and execution of the Articles formerly granted; threatening withal, that unlefs he prefently perform the fame, they would contrai him to it by force of Arms: and thereupon assemble strong Forces about Donfike; where the King then then lay. The great Prelates of the Kingdom, with the Earl of Gloucester, labour to appease them; and with two Cardinals lent lately by the Pope, to reform these disorders, they repair to Saint Albans, and desire conference with the Lords, who receive them peaceably: but the Letters which the Pope had written to them, they refuses to receive, saying, They were men of the Sword, and cared not for reading. Letters: there were many worthy and learned men in the Kingdom, whose counsel they would use, and not strangers, who knew not the cause of their commotion: so the Cardinals with this answer returned to London. But the Prelates of England to labour the business, that the Lords were content to yield up to the King such Horses, Treasure, and Jewels, as they had taken of Pierce Gaveston at New Castle, so as the King would grant their Petitions; and thereupon John Sandal, Treasurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Worle, keeper of the Wardrobe, are sent to Saint Albans to receive those things at their hands.

Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains of the great contempt was had of him by the Barons, their rising in Arms, their taking and murthering Pierce Gaveston, and such other affronts: whereunto with one accord they answer, that they had nothing but liberty in their own possession, but rather merited his love and favour, having taken Arms for and against the contempt of his Royal Person, but to destroy the publick enemy of the Kingdom, which otherwise would never have been done. Which stout resolution of theirs, the Queen with the Prelates and the Earl of Gloucester seeing, they seek by all means to qualify their heat; and at length so prevailed with them, that they humble themselves to the King, and crave pardon for that they had done, which they obtained; and the King receives them into grace, as his loyal Subjects, grants them their Articles, and particular pardons by his Charter, for their Indemnity concerning the death of Gaveston. And for the greater gleeu of true reconciliation, Guyde Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, is made of the Kings Counsell, though shortly after he ended his life; not without suspicion of poison: as being a man much envied by such as poss'd the King. The King kept his Christmas at Clapham, and his Easter at Claremont; and they seem'd to be all good friends: but this reconciliation of the King with his Barons, was but as the covering of fire with ashes, every little wind that blew, made it break out into flames again; and the time being so unsettled as it was, it was impossible but such winds would continually strive blowing. It was such a wind blew, when the great Earl of Lancaster had his Wife (a Lady who had lived with him always in good name) taken out of his house at Confort in Dorsetshire, by one Richard Saint Martin, a deformed giant, who challenged her to be his Wife; and had lien with her before the Earl married her. And this wind was made to blow the stronger, by the Ladies own confession; for upon examination, voluntarily averred, it was all true: and thereupon the ugly fellow in her right, claimed the two Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, which he durst not have done, if he had not been back'd with great Abbeytours: and it was not without after-portion upon the King himself. It was another such wind blew, when at the Feast of Pentecost, at dinner in the open Hall at Westminster, a woman fantastically disfigured, entered on horseback, and riding about the Table, delivered the King a Letter, whereon he signified the great neglect he flewed of such a Son, and cursed his Father Noble Services, taking him for an advance man of various parts, and such other complaints. Which Letter read, and the woman departed, put the King into a great rage; they who guarded the door being sharply reprehended for sufferings her to enter in such manner, answered, It was the fashion of the Kings house in times of Festivals, to keep out none that came as this woman did, to make sport. Search being made for the woman, she is found, and examined who set her on; she confessed a Knight gave her money to do it; the Knight is found, and upon examination, boldly answered, he did it for the Kings honour, and to no other end, and thereupon escaped without further trouble. It was such another wind blew, when a Knight was taken putting by Pomfret, with Letters sealed with the Kings Seal, directed to the King of Scots, about murthering the Earl of Lancafter; which meffanger is executed, his head fer upon the top of the Column and other Letters referred to the beneis the intended plot. Which whether it were infamous or true, the report thereof reflected upon the King; and made many to take the Earls part. It was such another wind blew, when a fansticket fellow, one John Powdrat, a Tanners Son of Exeter gave forth, that himself was the true Edward, eldest Son of the late King Edward the first, and by a false Nurse was changed in his Cradle; and that the now King Edward was a Carriers Son, and laid in his place. But this wind was soon blown over, when at his death, being drawn and hanged, he confessed he had a familiar Spirit in his house in the likeness of a Cat, that assured him he should be King of England; and that he had served the said Spirit three years before to bring his purpose about. But most of all, it was such a wind blew, when a Baron named William Browne, having waited his estate, offers to fell unto divers men, part of his Inheritance called Pounts; Humphrey Bishop of Hereford, obtains leave of the King to buy it, and bargain for it. The two Roger Mortimers, Uncle and Nephew, great men likewise in those parts, not understanding, it seems, any thing of the former bargain, contract also for the same Land with the said Sir William Browne. Hugh Spencer the younger, hearing of this fale, and the Land adjoining to part of his, obtains a more special leave of the King, being now his Chamberlain, and buys it out of their hands. The Earl of Hereford complains hereof to the Earl of Lancaster, who thereupon at Shrewsbury enters into a new confederation with divers Barons there assembled, taking their Oaths intermutually, to live and dye together in maintaining the Right of the Kingdom, and to procure the banishment of the two Spencers, Father and Son, whom they now hold to be the great Seducers of the King, and the opprefours of the State, dispossess of all things in Court.
The Life and Reign of King Edward the Second.

Court at their pleasure, and suffering nothing to be obtained but by their means. And under this pretence they take Arms, and coming armed to St. Albans, they fend to the King, being then at London, the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Hereford, and Chichester, (who were there assembled to consult for peace) requiring him as he ombmed to the quiet of the Realm, to rid his Court of those Traitors, the Speners, condemned in many Articles of high Treason, by the commody of the Land; and withal to grant his Letters Patent of Parliam and Indemnity both to them and all such as took part with them. The King returns answer, that Hugh Spencer the father was now beyond the Seas, employed in his business, and he son was guarding the Cinqueports, according to his office; and that it was against Law or Custom they should be bane without being heard: and withal swore he would never violate the Oath made at his Coronation, by granting Letters of Parliam to such notorious Offenders, who contemned his person, disturbed the Kingdom, and violated the Royal Majesty. Which answer so exasperated the Lords, that presently they approached to London; and lodged in the Suburbs, till they had leave of the King to enter into the City, where they peremptorily urged their demands. To which at length by mediation of the Queen, and the chief Prelates, the King is brought to condescend; and by his Edict, published in Welfmifnor-Hall, by the Earl of Hereford, the Spencers are banished the Kingdom. Hugh the Father bearing it, keeps beyond the Seas, but the Son secretly hides himself in England, expecting the turn of a better feasom. And indeed shortly after the Archbishop of Canterbury in a Council holden at London, pronounced the banishment of the Spencers to have been erroneous; and thereupon the Edict is revoked, and the Spencers are called home, and fet in as great authority as they were before. But the Lords having thus obtained their desire, with the Kings Letters of indemnity, return home; but yet not with such security as to give over the provision for their own defence. Not long after there fell out an unexpected accident, that suddenly wrought the Lords confusion. The Queen making her progress towards Canterbury, intended to lodge at the Castle of Leeds, belonging to the Lord Baffe done, (who had been long the Kings Steward, but now took part with the Lords) and sending her Marshal to make ready for her and her train, they who kept the Castle told him plainly, that neither the Queen nor any else should enter there without Letters From their Lord. The Queen her fel goes to the Castle, and finding the Marshal not there, she is driven to take such lodging elsewhere as could be provided. Of which indignity the complaints to the King, who took it to heart, that presently with a power of armed men out of London, he lays siege to the Castle, takes it, hangs the Keeper Thomas Cheppper, fends the Wife and Children of the Lord Baffe done to the Tower, and seizes upon all his Goods and Treasure, and having this power about him, and warmed with success and the irritation of the Queen, suddenly directs his course to Chichester.

The King answers for them.

The King is found to Indecit in Leeds Castle.

The King answers to the indignity.
The Life and Reign of King Edward the Second.

Not coming to the Kings landing yet, they proclamed enemies to the State.

The Queen, having upon a match of war for Prince Edward with a Daughter of the Earl of the Earl of Hereford was aiding by him.

The Queen sent to England many Lords return unto her. The King feeling the Queens forces, flies to the Isle of Lundy.

The Queen takes the Dutchy of Aquitaine, with the Earldom of Ponthieu, and send him over to do his homage for them. Which after many consultations, the King is wroth to yield unto; and the Prince is sent with the Bishop of Exeter and others, to the Court of France accordingly; but others say, she went out of decent, to complain to her brother the King of France for wrongs offered her by the Spencer, who had so alienated the Kings mind from her, that he would scarce come where she was, nor allow her fit maintenance for her calling. But whatsoever was the cause of her going, there appeared no cause of her staying, but that she had gotten into her company, Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, a gallant young Gentleman, whom the specially favoured, lately escaped out of the Tower of London, by giving his keepers (as was said) a leaping drink. And withal, the Bishop of Exeter perceiving some plots to be in hand, and their close consultations made without him, withdraws himself secretly, and discovers to the King what he observed in their courses. Whereupon the King sends presently for the Queen and Prince, and solicits the King of France to hale them their return; which when he was negatived and delayed, he caueth them openly to be proclaimed enemies to the Kingdom, banished them, and all their adherents out of the Land; and withal caueth all the ports to be strongly kept, and sends three Admirals to attend in several Coasts to hinder their landing. It was not without suspicion, that the King for love of the Spencer, had his minde alienated from loving the Queen; so the Queen for love of Mortimer had her minde alienated from loving the King; and therefore having him with her, cared not how long she stayed. However it was, when the Queen heard of the Kings Proclamation, she knew there was no returning for her into England without some good assurance. Whereupon soliciting her brother the King of France he aided her with men and money, say others, but others, that he refuling to aid her, as being wrought under hand by the Spencer against her, the King now being in her behalf, sent to Henry the Earl of that Country, who upon a contract between her son Prince Edward and Philippa the Earl's daughter, aided her with a competent Army under the conduct of his brother John; and with them and her beloved Mortimer, she took shipping and landed at Orwell a Port near unto Harwich in Suffolk, where presently came to her the Earl Marshal, Henry Earl of Leicester, and Henry Earl of Lancaster with the wry neck called Turrell, with many other Lords and Bishops. The King at this time being in London, and hearing of the Queens landing with such Forces, and chiefly how all the Realm ran flocking to her, was suddenly, strucken into a great amazement; and though he had his great Counsellors the Spencer about him, yet now he found what little good their counsel could do him; and indeed in this case what should be, or what could he do? To stay in London was appearing hard, for he plainly saw the Londoners to be more in her favor than in his. Whereupon the Queen and her part then his; and to go from London to any other place was as unsafe, all places being possed either with certain enemies, or uncertain friends; at last the Isle of Lundy is thought of, a place plentiful of provision, abounding with Conis, Fishe and Fowl, and the Island of hard access, as having but one place in it where it could be enter'd; and that so narrow that a few might easily keep out many. Upon this place he resolves, and taking with him the Earl of Gloucester, the Spencer, and Robert Baldock, with some few others, he takes shipping, but by contrary winds is driven back, and gains through Tempests to land in Wales; and there in the Abbey of Nestle in Glamorganshire kept himself close. In the mean time the Queen was come to Oxford where Adam Bishop of Hereford took for his Text, Cyprian men, and thereupon inferred, that the Kingdom being now deadly sick of its head, it was fit to remove that head and put a founder in the place. At this time also, the Londoners to shew their love to the Queen, feized upon Walter Stapleton, the good bishop of Exeter and Lord Treasurer of England, left Governor there by the King; and with great delight...
The Life and Reign of King Edward the Second.

Steward of the King's house, brake the Staffe of his Office; and William Trufle, Speaker of the Parliament, in the name of the whole Kingdom, pronounced a Form of renouncing all Alliance to Edward of Carnarvon. Here Caxton writes, that from the time of this King deposing, which was in December, to the time of his Son Crowning, which was in St.1213, following, all Pleas of the King's Bench were stayed, and all Prisoners arrested by Sheriffs, commanded to be set at liberty; which seems to have little probability, seeing his Son Edward presently upon his depoings was received for King. But howsoever to great a Dowry was then assign'd to Queen Isabel, that scarce a third part of the revenues of the Crown is left for the new King and his Wife. And to the late King is allowed a hundred Marks a month for his maintenance, with which he lived with his Cousin Earl of Leicester, in good plenty and contentment for a time; only this griev'd him most of all (he said) that the Queen his Wife would never be gotten to come to see him: For he feared most devoutly, that from the time he first saw her face, he could never like of any other woman. By which it may appear, that neither Gawen nor the Spencers had so debauch'd him, as to make his life most miserable, or to be diabolical to his Queen. But the Queen was hardened against him, and conceiving he had too great liberty under the Earl of Leicester, by advice of her petitun Counsellour, Adam Tarleton, Bishop of Hereford, appoints Thomas Gourney, and John Matrevers Knights, to take him from the Earl into their own custody, and to carry him whither they thought good. Who thereupon take him from Kenilworth, and carry him first to Carf Castle, and from hence to Briflow; where they shut him in the Castle; till upon knowledge of a Plot laid to get him out, and send him beyond Sea, they took him in the night and carried him to Berkley Castle, where by the way they abus'd him most inhumanly, as Sir Thomas de la Mare a Knight of Gloucestershire, in his life related. For to the end he should not be known they shav'd his head and beard, and that in most beastly manner; for they took him from his Horfe, and fet him upon a Hillock, and then taking puddle water out of a Ditch there by, they went to wash him, his Barber telling him that cold water must serve for this time: whereas the miserable King looking fiercely upon him, said, That whether they would or no, he would have warm water to wash him; and therewithal to make good his word, he presently shed forth a showre of tears. Never was King turned out of a Kingdom in such a manner. Many Kingdoms have been lost by the chance of War, but this Kingdom was lost before any Dice were cast; no blow struck; no Battel tought; done forcibly, and yet without force; violently, and yet with content; both parties agreed, yet neither pleas'd; for the the King was not pleas'd to leave his Kingdom, and the Queen was not pleas'd to leave him his life. It was not fife to leave him a part, by which he might afterwards better the whole; and therefore this is the mark now aimed at, having taken away his Kingdom openly, how they might take away his life secretly; be the Authors depflight beheaded him, as also divers others, only because they favoured the King. In the mean time the Queen went from Oxford to Gloucester, and from thence to Biflow, where Hugh Spencer the Father was, a man of ftrong curre and tenacious, who is there taken, and, without examination of Judgement, in most cruel manner executed, having his heart pulled out of his body being yet alive, and his body left hanging upon the Gallows. After this the Queen stayed at Hereford the space of a moneth, and then divid- ing her Army, the fends one part of it under the Conduct of Henry Earl of Leicester, and Rice ap Powel, a Clerke, to finde out the King; and this Rice being a Welfman, and knowing the Country well, brought the Earl to the Mon- atery of Nethe, where the King was, whom they there take together with Spencer the Son, Robert Baldock, and Simon of Reading. The King is by the Bishop of Hereford committed to the custody of the Earl of Leicester; where all that Winter he was ufed no wofe then was fit for a captive King: but Edmund Earl of Arnalds, John Denil, and Thomas Micheline, at the instance of Mortimer, are all three beheaded. Presently after is Hugh Spencer, the younger, who was the Earl of Gloucester, drawn, hanged, and quartered, as Edward had left him: at London Bridge, and his four quarters bellow'd in feveral Cities. The like is done with Simon of Reading, but Robert Baldock is committed to New Gate, against whom, when no just caufe of death could be found, there was ufed fo much cruelty in his imprifonment, that he shortly after died.

By this King it appears there is something else besides the grievance of Taxations, that alienates the minds of English Subjects from their King; for never were fewer Taxations in this King's time: yet never were the Subjects minds more alienated from their King, than they were from him. Before his Coronation in a Parliament holden at Westminster, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Clergy, and a twentieth of the Temporality. In his fifth year in a Parliament at London, was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporality. In his fifteenth year was granted the sixth penny of temporal men's goods, through England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his Wars with Scotland. And more than these we read not of; but then at the defeat of the Earl of Lancaster, there were Confiscations that supplied the price of Taxes, by which (as one faith) he became the richest King that had been since the Conquest.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

He ordained that the money of his Father, though counted base by the People, should be currant. In the eighth year of his Reign, by reason of a dearth which raised the price of all Virtualls, it was ordained by Parliament, that an Ox farted with Grasf should be sold for fifteen shillings, fathered with Corn, for twenty, the bell Cow for twelve shillings; a fat Hog of two years old, three shillings four pence; a fat Sheep thorn, fourteen pence, with the Fleece twenty pence; a fat Goose for two pence half penny; a fat Capon two pence; a fat Hen a penny; four Pigeons a penny; whosoever fold for more, should forfeit their ware to the King. But after these rates imposed, all kinds of Virtualls grew so scarce, that Provisio- on could hardly be made for the Kings House; whereupon shortly after, the Order was revo- ked, and Market folks permitted to make the best of their Wares. In this King's time an Ordi- nance was made against Knights Templars, ac- cused of Heretie and other crimes; and they were all apprehended, and committed to divers Prisons. The like was done by all the Kings of Christendom, at one instant, being condemn- ed in a General Council at Vienna. In the four- year of his Reign, on the 15. of October, the Clerks of the Exchequer went towards York, with the Book called Dominus Dei, and other Records, and Provision that laded one and twenty Carres; but in half a year they were brought back again.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In the 17. year of his Reign the Bishop of Hereford was arrested, accused of high Treason, for aiding the Kings Enemies in their late Rebellion; but he refused to answer, (being a consecrated Bishop) without leave of the Archbishops of Canterbury, whose suffragan he was, (and who he said was his direct Judge, next the Pope) or without the consents of his fellow Bishops, who then all arose, and bumble craved the Kings Clemency in his behalf; but finding the King implacable, they took him away from the Bar, and delivered him to the custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Shortly after he was again taken and convented as before, which the Clergy understanding, the Archbishops, Canterbury, York, and Dublin, with ten other Bishops, all with their Croffes erected, went to the place of Judgement, and, again took him away with them; charging all men, upon pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent hands upon him. With which audacious Act, the King was so much displeased, that he presently commanded inquiry to be made ex Officio judiciae, concerning those Objections against the Bishop; wherein he was found guilty, though absent, and had all his Goods and Possessions forfeited into the Kings hands. In this Kings time the Crookchet Fryers came first into England. In his time Pope John the two and twentieth, first intituled the Feast of Corpus Christi, begun before by Urban the fourth.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

His King founded Oriel Colledge, and St. Mary Hall in Oxford: He built a Church of Fryers at his Manour of Langley, where the soul of Grayston should be prayed for. In this Kings twentieth year, Richard Ra- thing Sheriff of London, built the Parish Church of Garlick-Hill in London; Ralph Bal- dock Bishop of London, gave two thousand Marks to the building of the New work of the Chappel, on the South side of Pauls Church: and left much more by his Testament.

Casualties.

In the eighth year of this Kings Reign, was so great a dearth, that Horses and Dogs were eaten, and Thieves in prison pluckt in pieces, those that were newly brought in amongst them, and earthen half alive; which continuing three years, brought in the end such a pestilence, that the living scarce sufficed to bury the dead. In the fourth year of his Reign, the Church of Mid- dleton in Dorsetshire, with all the Monuments, was consumed with Lightning, the Monks being at Mattins. In this Kings time, digging the Foundation of a Work about Pauls, were found more then a hundred heads of Oxen and Kine, which confirmed the opinion, that of old time it had been the Temple of Jupiter, and that there was the Sacrifice of Beasts.

Of his Wife and Children.

He married Isabel, Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France, the being but twelve years of age; who lived his Wife twenty years, his Widow thirty, and dying at threecores and three years old at Nynges near London, was buried in the midst of Gray-Friers Quire in London. By her he had issue two Sons and two Daugh- ters; his eldest Son named Edward of Windsor, because became born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second son named John of Eltham, because born there, was at twelve years old created Earl of Cornwoll: He died in Scotland in the flower of his Youth, unmarried. His eldest Daughter Joan, being a Child, was married in the fourth year of King Edward her Brother, to David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert Bruce, at seven years old; who coming afterward into England to visit his Brother, died here, and was buried at the Grey Friars in London. His second Daughter Eleanor, was married to Robert, the second Earl of Gelder, with a portion of fifteen thousand pounds; and had issue by him two Sons, who were Earls successively.

He was fair of body, and of great strength, but given much to drink, which made him oftentimes bewray his own Secrets. For his other conditions, his greatest fault was, he loved but one; for if his love had been divided, it could not have been so violent. He was extreme in raving but in loving; and though love moderated, be the bent of affections, yet the extremity of it is the worst of passions. He was rather unfortunate then unhappy; seeing unfortunateness is the event, unhappiness in the cause: and if his fortune had been to love good, he would have made him happy. Two virtues were eminent in him above all his Predecessours, Continence, and Abstinence: So continent, that he left no base issue behind him; so abjinent, that he took no base courses for raising of money. They who defpised him being alive, so much honoured being dead, that they could have found in their hearts to make him a Saint.

Of his Death and Burial.

Many ways were attempted to take away his life. First, they vexed him in his diet, allowing him nothing he could well endure to eat; but this succeeded not. Then they lodged him in a Chamber over Carrion and dead Carcasses, enough to have poisoned him; and indeed he told a workman at his Window, he never endured to eat a morsel in all his life: but neither did this succeed. Then they attempted it by poisons, but whether by the strength of his Constitution, or by the Divine Providence, neither did this succeed. At last the peevish Archbishops, the Bishop of Hereford, devised a Letter to his Keepers, blaming them for giving him too much liberty; and for not doing the service which was expected from them: and in the end of this Letter wrote this Line, Edwardum occidere notitc timere bonum est: Craftily contriving it in this doubtful sense, that both the Keepers might finde sufficient warrant, and himself might finde sufficient excuse. The Keepers greedily at his meaning, took it in the worst sense, and accordingly put it in execution. They took him in his Bed, and casting heavy Bolts upon him, and pressing them hard down, stifled him; and not content with that, they heated an iron red hot, and through a Pipe thrust it up into his Fundament, that no marks of violence might be seen: but though none were seen, yet some were heard; for when the Paff was in doing, he was heard to roar and cry all the Castle over. Guenevyr and Mauers in, his murdurers, looking for reward, had the reward of Murdurers. For the Queen and Bishop Tarleton disfavoring the command, threatened to question them for the Kings death; whereupon they fled beyond Sea: and Guenevyr, after three years, being taken in France, and sent into England, was executed away upon the Sea, beheaded. Mauers flying into Germany, had the grace to repent, but lived ever after miserably. Thus died this King in the year 1327, more then half a year after his deposing; when he had reigned almost 19. years, lived 43. His body was carried to Gloucester, and there without any Funeral Pomp buried in the Monastery of Saint Peter, by the Benedictine Friars.

Of Men of Note in his time.

In this Kings time, of Martials men were many, whole acts have been spoken of in the late Kings life. Of learned men also many, as John Duns called Per, a Doctor of Subtilty, born in Northumberland, at Emblenhe a Village three miles distant from Alnwick; though both the Scots and the Frye challenge him for theirs, Robert Walshingham a Carmelite Friar, who wrote divers Treatises; Robert Bafon born in Nottinghamshire, a Carmelite Friar of Scarborough, whom King Edward took with him into Scotland, to write some Remembrances of his Victories: but being taken by the Scots, was constrained by Robert Bruce to write Remembrances of his Overthrows; William Riffanger, a Monk of Saint Albans, an Historiographer; Ralph Baldock, Bishop of London, who wrote a History, entitled, Historia Anglica; John Walsingham, a Carmelite Friar, who wrote divers Treatises; Nicholas de Lyrs a Jew by Birth, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity; William Ockham a Friar Minor, who wrote divers Treatises, and namely against John Duns, and also against Pope John the 23. in favour of the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria; Thomas Halshewick, a Canon of Ledy in Kent, who wrote a Chronicle called Chronicon commendatorum; Robert Perpendicular born in Yorkshiur, a Black Friar and a Philosopher, or rather a Magician; and last, though not least worthy to be remembered, John Mandeville, the great Traveller, a Doctor of Physicke and a Knight.

KING EDWARD
THE THIRD.

Of his coming to the Crown, and Acts done in his Minority.

D W A R D of Windsor, eldest Son of King Edward the Second, by the Order of Parliament, upon his Fathers Resignation, was proclaimed King of England, on the fifth and twentieth day of January, in the year 1327. And because he had not yet received the Order of Knighthood, he was by Henry Earl of Lancaster girt felonily with the Sword; and on the first day of February following, was Crowned at Westminster by Walter Reginald Archbishop of Canterbury; and thereupon a general Pardon is proclaimed, which hath since been used as a Custom with all succeeding Kings; that at their first coming to the Crown, a general Pardon is always granted. And because the King was under age, scarce fifteen years old (though Frofield faith he was then eighteen;) there were twelve appointed Governors of him and the Kingdom; namely the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; the Bishops of Winchester, Hereford, and Worcester; Thomas of Brotherton, Earl Marshal, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncles; John Earl Warren, Thomas Lord W芍t, Henry Lord Pierse, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Ruffe: but though these were appointed and bore the name, yet the Queen and Roger Mortimer took all the authority to themselves. The first action that was undertaken, was an expedition against the Scots; for Robert Bruce, though now old and sickly, and (as was said) Leprous: yet considering the youth of the new King, and the distractions of the Kingdom, thought it now a fit time to do some good upon England; and entering the English borders with an Army, sent defiance to King Edward. Whereupon an Army is raised, and the Hymenians (whom the Queen had brought) are joyed with the English; but a variance falling out between the two Nations, made the action not successful. For the Kings Army encountering the Scots at Stanhope Park in Wednes in the Bishoprick of Durham, though three times as many as the Scots; as being thirty thousand; yet through this variance, but more through treachery of some great men, suffered them all to escape their hands, and the Scots returned home in safety, the English with diffolution; and after this, the English seeing the Hymenians could do them no good, sent them away to their own Country. In King Edward's second year, his marriage with Philippa of Hainault is annulled; (as pence being first gotten, because of their nearness in Blood) and a Parliament is holden at Northampton, where the King made three Earls; John of Etham his Brother, Earl of Cornwall; Roger Mortimer, Earl of March; and James Butler of Ireland, Earl of Ormond. And in this Parliament a dishonourable Peace is concluded with the Scots; and confirmed by a match between David Bruce Prince of Scotland, being but seven years old, and Joan, sister to King Edward not foold. At which time by the secret working of Queen Isabel, Roger Mortimer, and Sir James Douglas, the King surrenders by his Charter all his title to the Kingdom of Scotland, restores divers Deeds and Infruments of their former Homanes and Fealties, with the famous Evidence called Ragman Roll, and many ancient Jewels, and Monuments, amongst which was the Black Crofs of Scotland; and besides, any English man is prohibited to hold Lands in Scotland, unless he be a dweller there. In consideration whereof King Bruce was to pay 30000 Marks, and to renounce his claim to the Counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, and any other place possesed by him in England. This was no good beginning, and yet worse followed after. For another Parliament being holden at Winchefter, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncle, is there accused, and condemned upon his confession for intending to restore his Brother, the Late King Edward; an intention only without any fact, yet condemned he was, and brought to the Scaffold: but generally so beloved of the people, that he flando on the Scaffold from one a Clock till five, before any Executioner could be found that would do the Office; till at last a sly wretch of the Marhalley was gotten to cut off his head. But the Authors of his death escaped not long themselves, for in the third year of the Kings Reign, another Parliament is holden at Nottingham, wherein the Queen hath all her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to her Pention of a thousand pounds a year, and her self confined to a Castle, where she remained the rest of her days, no fewer than thirty years. A time long enough to finde that her being the Daughter of a King, the Sitter of a King, the Wife of a King, and the Mother of a King, were glorious Titles, but all all not worth the liberty of a mean Estate. And as for Mortimer, (lying then in the Castle of Nottingham and lately created Earl of the Marches of Wales) he was feized on in this manner, the King taking with him William Montague, Robert Holland, and others, go secretly one night by Torch-light, through a privy way under ground, till they came to the Queens Chamber; where leaving the King without; they entered and found the Queen with Mortimer, ready to go to bed; then laying hands on him, they led him forth, after whom the Queen followed, crying, Bel fites, ayer pite de gentil Mortimer; good fon, good fon, take pity upon the gentle Mortimer, flattering that her fon had been amongst them. This course was taken to apprehend him for avoiding of tumult, he having no fewer then ninecore Knights and Gentlemen, besides other meaner servants continually about him. But thus feized on, he is committed presently to the Tower, accused of divers great crimes, whereof there were chief; That he had procured the late Kings death; That he had been the Author of the Scots false escaping at Stanhope Park, corrupted with the gift of thirty thousand pounds; That he had procured the late Marriage and Peace with Scotland, so dishonourable to the King and Kingdom; That he had been too familiar with the Queen, as by whom she was thought to be with Child. Of which Articles he was found guilty and condemned. and thereupon is drawn and hanged upon the common Gallows at the Elms, now called Tyburn, where he was put to his death, as an approbrious spectacle for all beholders.

After these bulleines in England, there comes a new business upon him from the King of France; for about this time Philip le Bel, King of France, the Queens brother, dying without issue, the right of succession to the Crown is devolved upon the Heir to Charles a former King, wherein are Competitors Philip Duke de Valois, and Edward King of England. Edward is the nearer in blood, but draws his Pedegree by a Female: Philip the farther off, but descending by all Males: and because the Law Salique excluding Females, was conceived as well to exclude all descendants by Females; therefore is Philip's title preferred before King Edward's, and Philip is received and crowned King of France: to which preterment of his, Robert de Artois, a Peer of great power, gave no small furtherance. And now as soon as Philip was invested in the Crown, he summons Edward to come to his domage for the marriage of the King of France with the Princess in his Blood, and his other lands in France, held of that Crown, according to the Custom; which though it were some prejudice to King Edward's claim afterward, yet in regard his Kingdom of England was scarce well settled, and himself was young, he was contented to do it: and thereupon the sixth of June, in the year 1329. King Edward in a Crinmon Velvet Gown, embroidered with Leopards, with his Crown on his head, his Sword by his side, and Golden Spurs on his heels, presents himself in the Body of the Cathedrall Church of Amiens before King Philip, sitting in his Chair of Eilace, in a Velvet Gown of a violet Colour, embroidered with Flowers de ly of Gold, his Crown on his head, and his Scepter in his hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him. The Vicount Melun Chamberlain of France, first commands King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and to kneel down, which he did on a Crimson Velvet Cushion before King Philip; and then the Vicount putting both his hands together between the hands of the King of France, pronounced the words of the Homage, which were these: You become Liegeman to my Matter here present, as Duke of Aquitaine, and Peer of France; and you promise to bear faith and loyalty so to. Say you, and King Edward said Yes, and kissed the King of France on both cheeks, as Lord of the Fee. The like homage also he did for the Earldom of Pembroke. But this act of submission left a rancour in King Edward's heart, which afterwards brake o'er out, that it had been good for France it had never been executed.

This done, King Edward returns home, and there finds a new business with Scotland, upon this occasion. Edward Baliol, Son to John Baliol, (sometimes King of Scotland) two and thirty years after his Fathers depollition, began now to shew himself, attempting the recovery of that Crown; and coming out of France, where he had all that while remained, and getting aid under-hand in England, with them he suddenly affairs those who had the Government of Scotland, during the Nonage of the young King David (being at that time with the King of France) and in a Barreland came them, with the slaughter of many Nobles of the blood of the common people; and thereupon was immediately Crowned King of Scotland at Stene; But notwithstanding his great defeat, King Baliol was forced to retire him into England to get more aid of King Edward. Who now shews himself in the action, joyns with Baliol against his Brother-in-law King David; goes in person with a strong Army to recover Berwick, which after three months siege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Stew, was taken in, and the Army of the Scots which came to the rescue thereof, at Hallidown-Hill, utterly defeated: where were slain seven Earls, ninety Knights and Bannerers, four hundred Esquires, and about two and thirty thousand common Souldiers, as our Writers report: as theirs, but fourteen thousand. And with this effusion of blood is Baliol returned to his miserable Kingdom; and to hold good correspondence with the King of England hereafter, doth him homage for his Realm of Scotland, and the 10lands adjacent. But though he had a Kingdom, yet he had not quietness, for many of the Scots aided by the French, made War upon him divers years after; during all which time, King David with his Wife remained in France. If any man marvel why King Edward would aid Baliol against King David, who had married his fitter, he may consider that alliances, how near forever, weigh but light in the Scales of State.

About this time, the Isle of Man is conquerred by William Montague, Earl of Salisbury, for which service King Edward gave him the title of King of Man.
The Life and Reign of King Edward the Third.

Of his AIs after he came of age.

And now Robert of Artois banished out of France, comes into England, whom King Edward makes Earl of Richmond, and of his Council. This Robert perwades King Edward to make War upon France, to which Crown (he said) he had more right then he held it. With whose perwations, King Edward is at last resolv’d to undertake the enterprize; and to furnish himself of noble Chevaliers, he at one time in a Parliament at Westminster, the eighth year of his Reign, creates six Earls, Henry of Lancaster he made Earl of Derby, William Montacute he made Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Audley Earl of Gloucester, William Clinton Earl of Huntington, and Robert Clifford, or Safford, Earl of Suffolk: also twenty Knights of whom Thomas de la More, who wate the sire of the Kings Father was one. Whithal he sends the Bishop of Lincoln, with twenty leagues of men with divers Princes abroad. Where it is scarce worth remembering, what Freisford mentions here, that certain young Gentlemen covered one of their eyes with a piece of silk, and vowed to fee but with one eye, till it might be seen, what great deeds of Arms they performed; but for all this vow of theirs, we hear nothing of their exploit. And as the King of England laboured to procure himself friends, so likewise the King of France got to take his part, the Bishop of Leis, with the Dukes and Earls of Gelders, Juliers, Cleve, Hoynsul, and Brabant, and with the Archbishop of Celen, and Waleran his Brother; John King of Bohemia, Earl of Luxembury, Henry Count Palatine, Albert Bishop of Miniz, Otto Duke of Austeria, Ame Earl of Graves, with many other Princes and Captains out of Germany, Spain, and other Countries. King Edward thus resolv’d in himself, and filleth with friends abroad, goes over into France with his Queen and Child, makes his residence at Antwerp; there he forfakes the Flemings, he takes upon him the Style, Title, and Arms of the King of France: for by this they accounted themselves disoblige of the Bond of twenty hundred thousand Crowns, which they had entred into, never to bear Arms against the King of France: and hereupon the League was establisht between them and King Edward. And from this time forward the Kings of England quartered the Arms of France with those of England; and took upon them the name of Kings of France. And now King Edward for a beginning to put his claim in execution, sets upon Cambrai, and enters France by the way of Vermandouce and Tiieres: On the other side King Philip feith on the Dutchy of Guenuen, and sends thither the Constable, Conteable, and Guergnez of France, with the Earls of Fize and Lewes and Caen. At last both Armies came near together, that a fight was appointed the Friday after: but upon better consideration, the English thought it no direc- tion to give Battell to an Army so much greater then their own, if they could avoid it; and the French thought it as little discretion for them to hazard the person of the Prince within his own Kingdom; and perhaps were not a little moved with the warning given them by Robert King of Sicilie, a great Astronomer, that he foresaw by the Stars, some great misfortune to the English, if they should that day fight with the English, King Edward being present. And thus both Armies having their several reasons to decline the battell, they parted without doing any thing; only an accident happened scarce worth remembering, yet must be remembered. A Hare starting out before the head of the French Ar- my, caused a great shout to be made; whereupon, they who saw not the Hare, but only heard the shout, supposing it to be the onset of the battell, dispofted themselves to fight: and four-teen Gentlemen for encouragemente sake, as the custome was, were knighted; called afterward in merriment, Knights of the Hare.

But now King Edward must a little look home, and therefore leaving the Queen in Brabant, he passeth himself into England about Candlemas, leaving his in Brabant about a year; and landing at the Tower about ane midght, and finding it unguardtd, was so much pleas’d that he presently sens for the Mayor of London, command- ing him to bring before him the Chancel- lour and Treasurer, with Sir John Saint Paul, Michael Wath, Philip Thorp, Henry Stratford, Clergie men, (who it seemes were officers for his Receipts) and John Sewer Justice of the Bench: all which, except the Chancellor, were apprehended and committed to prison; as were afterward in like manner, divers Officers of Ju- stice, and Accomptes, upon inquiry of their unjust proceeding. During the Kings abode in England, William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and Robert Safford Earl of Suffolk left in Flanders to oppose the French, having performed divers great exploits, were at last in an encounter about Life, so overlaid by multitude, as they were both taken and sent prisoners to Paris. Besides, about this time two accidents happened that were thought would be of great tending in King Ed- ward’s proceeding; one was his Wife, William Earl of Hoynsul, dying, and leaving his Son to succeed, this son left his Brother King Edward, and fell to take with the King of France; the other, that the Duke of Normandy, thinking himself as strong as ever William Duke of Normandy was that conquered England, he saw no reason but he might conquer it as well as that William; and thereupon makes preparation by Sea and Land to attempt the enterprize: but these were but vapours that never came to be withers, at last brought no formes. For John Earl of Hoynsul had quickly enough of the King of France, and was soon after reconciled to his Brother King Edward; and the Duke of Normandy went no further then preparations: for indeed King Edward prosecuted his couries against France with such heat, that all the neigh- bouring Princes fearing a like kindred to near their borders, were glad to lock to them- selves at home. But now to impede the King of England’s return into France, King Philip had provided a mighty Navie in the Haven of Sines, consisting of two hundred fable of Ships, (besides many Gallies) and two thousand armed men in the Port ready to encounter him upon his land- ing; whereof King Edward being advertised, prepares the like number of Ships, and sets out Sea Sea upon Midsummer Eve, is met theorrow after with a Navy likewise from the North parts, conducted by Sir Robert Morley; and encounters his enemy who lay to intercept him with such force and courage, and such advantage of Wind and Sun, that he utterly defeated their whole Navy, took and sank all their Ships, flew thirty thousand men, and landed with as great glory, as such a victory, (the greatest that ever before was gotten by the English at Sea) could yield; though King Edward himself was there wounded with an Arrow in the thigh. Most of the French, rather than to endure the Arrows of the English, or be taken, desperately leapt into the Sea; whereupon the French Kings, Jefter, let to give notice to him of his overthrow, (which being so ill news, none else would willingly impart unto him) laid, and oftentimes repeated it in the Kings hearing; Cowardly English men, Dishonestly English men, Faint-hearted English men! The King at length asked him why? for that (said he) they durst not leap out of their Ships into the Sea as our brave French men did. By which speech the King apprehended a notion of this overthrow, which the French attributed to Nicholas Butchel, one of their Chief Commanders, who had armed his Ships with men of base condition, (content with small pay) and refused Gentlemen and sufficient Souldiers, in regard they required greater wages. And indeed it often happens that the savorie of Commanders is the occasion of great defeats.

By this Victory King Edward gained a free entrance into Flanders, and presently went and beleaguered Tournay with an Army of five and fifty thousand, but was to vallyantly encountered by the Duke of Burgundy, and the Earl of Arminnec, that they routed his Army, and flew four thousand upon the place: which so enraged King Edward, that two days after he sent a challenge to King Philip to meet him in a single Combat, or with an hundred against as many, before the Walls of Tournay, King Philip answers that his challenge being made to Philip de Valois, without mention of King, he took it not to be to him, who was truly King of France; but he wished him to remember the Homage he had done him at Amiens, and the wrong he did it to the Christian world, by his troubleshoot courses to hinder him from his Voyage intended to the Holy-Land. Besides this answer in writing, he sends to him by word of mouth: that by his challenge he hazarded nothing of his own, but caposed only the Dominion of another, which was against all reason; but if he would meet him, he would go to him in the Field for Combat, and meet him in the field in single Combat. But this King Edward would not bearken to, for as he was valiant to make the challenge, so he was circumcpe to look to the conditions. But hereupon he continues his siege of Tournay; to the relief whereof King Philip sends all the Forces he could possibly make by himself or his friends; and after the siege had continued three months, partly by mediation of Robert King of Sicilie, but chiefly by the Lady Jane of Valois, sister to King Philip, and mother of King Edward's wife, (who had vowed her self a Nun, but to do this good office, travelled from one to another) a Truce was concluded for a year, and both their Armies are dissolved.

After this, King Edward returning into England, was aduertised how the Scots after many other places gained, had beleaguered the Castle of Stirling; for relief whereof, the King makes all the haste he can: and yet before he could come, it was by force of battery, compelled to render it self upon conditions. Then King Edward being at Berwick, paffeth to New-Castle upon Tyne, where he lays a month, waiting for his provision that was to come by Sea; but that being driven into other parts by trempel, he makes a Truce with the Scots for three or four months, and then returns home. In the time of this Truce, the Scots send to King David, to come and govern the Kingdom in his own person; who thereupon taking his leave of the King of France, with whom he had remained seven years, he with his Wife,King Edward's father, returns into Scotland, where, after he had been most honourably received by the Prince of Orkney, and the other Lords and Barons of the Kingdom, as soon as the Truce was ended, with a strong Army enters Northumberland, paffing on to New-Castle upon Tyne, where he plants his Camp. Of this Castle, John Neville was left governor by King Edward, who sending out certain companies, took the Earl Marmort prisoner, and with the slaughter of divers of his men, and rich booties, returned back to his Castle: which incensed King David, that he assaulted the Castle as a man enraged, but finding it too strong for his taking, he then passed into the Province of Durham, where he used all kinds of cruelty, first upon the Countrey, and then upon the City, killing Men, Women, and Children, Clergy, and others; burning and destroying Houses, and Churches, and utterly defacing it. From thence he paffeth on to the Castle of Salisbury, which Castle belonged to William Montaun, Earl of Salisbury, in right of his Wife; but himself being then prisoner in France, only his Counseys, and one William Montaunse a Cousin of his, was in the Castle. This William perceiving the Scottifh horse to be so over-charged with pillage, that they were scarce able to go, ifues out of the Castle with forty horse, jets upon them, kills two hundred, and takes fçx-score, whom he brings with their rich pillage, into the Castle. King David soon after with his whole Army arrived, but hearing of King Edward's coming, (who certified of these things) made all the haste he could, he returns himself from thence; and King Edward finding him gone before he came, yet would needs go in and visit the Counseys: of whom as soon as he saw her, he was so enamoured, that he laid more battery to her Chastity, then King David had done to his Castle; but finding it inexpugnable, after a day and a night he left it, and followed after the Scots, with whom for three days together he had many skirmishes, till at last a Truce was concluded for two years, and amongst other conditions, William Earl of Salisbury, a prisoner with the King of France, was set at liberty by exchange.

About this time another difference fell out between the Kings of England and France. John Earl of Mortford laid claim to the Duchy of Brittany, but in the quarrel was taken prisoner by the King of France. His Lady fled to King Edward for succour; which King Edward grants upon condition that his marriage be made between his Daughter Mary, and the Earl of Mortford's son, which being agreed on (he fends over to her aid, first, Walter de Manny, a valiant Knight, and afterward Robert d'Artou. But while his Army was preparing, King Edward was informed by Edward Balis, the pretended King of Scotland, and Governor of Berwick, that the Scots had not kept the conditions of the Truce; whereupon King Edward draws a great Army to Berwick, with a purpose to do great matters, but nothing was done, for a new Truce was again concluded for two years. By this time Robert d'Artou had made ready his Army, and taking with him the Countes of Montfau, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Suffolk, and many other Barons, after great tempels and encounters at Sea, landed safely at last near to Vannes, which was held by the French; and laying siege to the City, with the assistance of Wallers, the Army of the Duke of Brittany, he came upon the gates and inns of the City, and after an affault, at last he took it, to the great joy of the Countes of Montfau, though he held it not long: for certain refo- late French Knights assaulted it soon after, and recovered it from the English. In which action many Lords were slain or wounded, and particularly Robert d'Artou himself; who passing over into England, for the better curing of his wounds, soon after died, and was buried in Pauls Church in London. And now King Edward himself with a strong Army paideth over into Brittany, and plants his Camp before the City of Vannes, where it is like to have been a cruel Battel; but in the incontinent there came from Pope Clement the sixt, two Cardinals, the Bishops of Prentia and Taffinum: who upon certain conditions concluded a Peace. Amongst other conditions this was one, that the City of

King Philip informed of so many ludes, assenishes a mighty Army, no less than a hundred thousand men, with which he recovers Miramar, and Villefranche, and then proceeded to besiege Angoulême: whom the Earl of Derby having not time to engage, King Edward (leaving for Warden of England in his absence, the Lords Percy and Neville) goeth himself in person with an Army (as Frisfaith) of fourscore thousand men at Arms, and ten thousand Archers, besides those out of Wales and Ireland; taking with him his Son, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Guern, being then but at the age of fifteen years. It may be thought preposterous in King Edward to purpos his Son to be a Souldier before he was come to be a man; but it seems he had a longing to try his sons valour in the field, and perhaps was loath to omit any thing that might give any countenance to this Battel, in which the two Kingdoms were laid as it were at stake: but howsoever, taking him along with him, and almost all the Lords of his Kingdom, he takes Shipping, and lands at Normanby, where at his first setting his foot on ground, he took such a fantome, that the Earl of Mortford was gushed at his note; which the Barons took for an ill augury, and indeed King Edward himself went on in the same manner. King Edward took it for a good: saying, it was wise that the Land desired to have him. And indeed he presently took the Towns of Hauport, Maul- brough, Carenton, and Saint La, and afterward the City of Caen it self; and from thence paf- sed to the County of Eureaux, facced and pillaged it, as also the City of Gysers, Vernon, Meslay, and Boulogerne to the City of Poissy. King Philip all this while stayed about Paris, as looking for King Edward to give him Battel there; and for that purpose had planted his Camp near to Saint Germain: but King Edward deceived him. For going from Poissy, he palled into Picardy, and Ponthien, where he took and burned many Towns and Castles; and then paf- sed the River of Somme, though not without danger: For King Philip had sent thither Gando- man of Egy, with a thousand horse, and six thousand foot to stop his passage. King Edward notwithstanding refoloves to pass on, and on, and plunged foremost into the River; crying out, They who love me will follow me. At which voice every man frowne who should go for- mott; and so the shore was presently gained by the English. Gandoemar affonished with his bold adventure, affonished his people with his fearful countenance: so that the English encoun-tering the French all in disorder, put them to flight. King Philip enraged with this diffavour, refoloves to revenge it; and presently provokes King Edward to Battel. King Edward had now encamped in a Village called Creffy, his Army consisted of thirty thousand men, which he di- vided into three Battalies: the first was led by the young Prince of Wales, with whom were joined the Earl of Warwick, Geoffrey of Har- cot, the Earl of Holland, Richard Stafford, John Chandies, Robert Neville, and many other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand thousand welsh. In the second were the Earls of Northampton and of Arundel, the Lords, Raffe, Baffet, and others, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. In the third the King was himself, having about him seven hundred men at Arms, and three thousand Archers. The Barrels thus ordered, mounted on a white Hobby, he rode from rank to rank to view them; encouraging every man that day to have regard to his right and honour. The French Kings Army was far greater, consisting of above sixty thousand combatants well armed; whereof the chief were Charles Duke of Alenfon the Kings Brother, John of Luxemburgh King of Bohemia, Charles de Blais the Kings Nepeux, Ralph Duke of Lorraine, the Earls of Flandres, Normes, Sancors; of Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, about three thousand. The Vaunt-guard he commit to his Brother the Count de Alenfon, the Rest to the Earl of Sancors, the main Barrel he leads himself; his heat out of confidence of Victory, was so great, that it scarce permitted time for a little counsel what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised that the Army should take some repast; and that the Infantry consisting of Genoese (which were above fifteen thousand Cross-bows, and five men) should make the first Front, and the Cavalry to follow; which was agreed on. But the Count de Alenfon, contrary to this order, took it ill that the Genoese were in the first rank; and in fury caused them to change place, which bred that discontentment, that it irritated them more against the Leader then the enemy. Besides, there fell at the instant such a shower of rain, as disflowed their flings, and made their Bows of little use; and at the breaking up of the shower, the Sun shone full in the face of the French (dazzling their sight) and on the back of the English, as if all made for them. King Edward who had gotten to a Windmill, beholding as from a Sentinel, the countenance of the enemy, and discovering the disturbance made by the change of place, instantly sends to charge that part, without giving them time to re-accommodate themselves; whereupon the discontented Genoese recoil, which the Count de Alenfon perceiving, he comes on with the horse, and in great rage cries out, On, On. Let us make way upon the bellies of these Genoese, who do but hinder us: and instantly pricks on a full carrier through the midst of them, followed by the Earls of Lorraine and Savoy, and never stays till he came up to the English Barrel, where the Prince was. The fight grew hot and doubtful, insomuch as the Commanding the Prince, and the King Edward to come up with his power to aid him. The King asks the messengers whether his Son were slain or hurt; who answering, No, but that he was likely to be overlaid; well then (said the King) return and tell them who fent you, that so long as my Son is alive, they send no more to me whatever happens; for I will that the honour of this day be his. And so being left to try for themselves, they wrought it out with the Sword; the rather because the French King having his horde lain under him, and in danger to be troden to death, had he not been recovered by the Lord Beaumont, was to the great discouragement of his people, withdrawn out of the field: whereof notice being once taken by the English, the day was soon after theirs; and the greatest Victory they ever had yet against the French; and so bloody, as there is no men on made of any one prisoner taken in the Barrel, but all slain out-right; only some few Troops that held together, saved themselves by retiring to places near adjoining. The French King himself with a small company got to Bray in the night, and approaching the Walls, and the Guard asking who he was there? he answered the Fortune of France. By his voice he was known, and thereupon received into the Town, with the tears and lamentations of his people. The number of the slain are certified to thirty thousands, in which were, Charles de Alenfon, John Duke of Barbon, Ralph Earl of Lortain, Lewis Earl of Flandres, Jacques Daphnis de Vennes, fon to Inbert, (who after gave Daphnis to the Count of France) the Earls of Sancors, Harecourt, and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteen hundred. This memorable Victory happened upon the Saturday after Bartholomew day, in the year 1346. The next day early in the morning, being Sunday, he sent out 300 Lances, and 3000 Archers, to discover what was become of the enemy, who found great Troops coming from Artois, Saint Remi, Rouen, and Beauvais (ignorant of what happened) led by the Archbishop of Rouen, and the Prior of Forest, whom they likewise defeated, and flew from the field. But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward that year; there was another of no less importance gotten in England, by the Queen and her people at home, against the Scots; who being set on by the French to divert the War there, entered upon this Kingdom with three thousand men (as our Writers report) affuring himself of success, in regard (as he supposed) the main strength thereof was now gone into France; but he found it otherwise. For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Umbraville, the Earl of Angus, Henry Percy, Ralph Neville, William Douglas, with the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gathered so great Forces, and so well ordered them, by the animation of the Queen (who was there in person,) as fighting a great Barrel at Neville Cros, in the Bishoprick of Durham, they utterly defeated the greater Army, and took their King princes, with the Earl of Fife, Menteith, Murray, Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbishop of Saint Andrews, and others; and put to the Sword fifteen thousand Scots. This Victory also fell upon a Saturday, five weeks after that of Crécy. He that took King David Prisoner, was one John Copeland, an Esquire of Northumberland, whom King Edward rewarded with five hundred pound land a year, and made him a Banneret. And as all concurred to make their... make this year Triumphate, the aids sent to the Countess of Monford in Britain, led by Thomas Dagworth a valiant Knight, overthrew and took prisoner Charles de Blairs, Pretender to that Dukedom, and with him Monier la Val, the Lords Richford, Beamper, Lycuyce, with many other Barons, Knights and Esquires; Wherefore the Lord De la Val, Father to him that was taken, Viscount Eban, Monier de Cottiers, Vizier de Saint, de Divoire, besides many other Knights and Esquires, to the number of seven hundred. And now King Edward without meddling with the great Cities of Amiens and Albevile, marched directly, and sits down before Calliers, a Town of more importance for England and the Gate to all the rest: Wherein John de Vienne, Marshal of France, and the Lord de Andreghien, (a great man in his time) commanded. The King being to make it a Winter siege, erected for him and his people, so many houses and lodges, that it was named New-Callis.

All that Winter King Edward lay without any molestation by the French King, who was busied at home in his own State about raising of money; wherewith supplied at last, he raised an Army and approached Calliers, but finds no way open to come to relieve it. The King of England was both Mafter of the Haven and posfess all other waies that were paffable; and the Flemings, though they had besieged afore. To op- pose whom, John Duke of Normandy is sent for out of Guienne: who departing leaves Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby, Mafter of the Field; and he having an Army consisting of twelve hundred men at Arms, two thousand Archers and three thousand other Foot, takes in most of the Towns of Neivaiguer, and Piolten, and in the end besieged and lacked Pooles, and then returns to Beaufort, with more pajlage then his people could well bear: Thus the English pro- pere every where, and the French suffer. During the siege of Calliers, (in which some think King Edward first used Gun) the Flemings send to King Edward, to make a marriage between his Daughter Isabel and their Lord, the young Count Louis; to which the King consented, and the Duke of Bucking gets the King of France to make the match for a Daughter of his. The Flemings press their Lord with the match of England; but he obstinately refused it, saying, he would never marry a Daughter of him, that had killed his Father, though he would give him half his Kingdom. This answer so incensed the Flemings, that they put their Lord in Prifon, till with long durance he was at last confented; and thereupon King Edward and his Queen, with their Daughter Isabel came over to Bucking, and there the young Earl is affianced to her: but returning afterwards into Flanders, as soon as he found opportunity, he went to King Philip, and left his affianced Lady unmaried; and married afterwards a Daughter of the Duke of Brabant. But all this while the siege of Calliers was continued; and King Philip not being able to come to relieve it, follicits King Edward to appoint four place of battall, and he would meet him. But King Edward returns answer, that if he would make his own way, to come thither with him, there he should finde him, but from thence he would part; having lain there so long to his great labour and expence, and being now to near the point of gaining the place. Two Cardinals are sent from the Pope, to mediate a Peace, but could effect nothing; so as the French King was forced to break up his Army and retire to Paris; leaving Callier to the mercy of the besiegers: which when the Town understood, they fent to desire Paris, had it granted, and therein received the formal answer, that fix of the chief Burgeses should first be to the King bare-headed, and bare-footed, in their shirts, with halter about their necks, the keys of the Town and Callier in their hands, and sum- mons to all with halter about their necks, whom he judged to be put to death.

The manner as shall be to the King's advantage, and thereupon is sent back to Callicie. The King, the night before the time of agreement arrives with three hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Archers: Meunier de Charmy sets out likewise the same night from Saint Omer with his Forces, and sent a hundred men before with the Crowns to Aymerie. The men are let in at a Portem Gare, the Crowns received, and affirmed to be all weight: which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and our marches the King before day to encounter Meunier de Charmy; who receiving himself betrayed, defended himself the belt he could, and put King Edward to a great fear, who for that he would not be known there in person, put himself and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and was twice bearen down on his knees by Meunier de Riboumont, a hardy Knight (with whom he fought hard to hand) and yet recovered, and in the end took Riboumont prisoner. Riboumont was likewise taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the night after (which was the first of the new year, fealed with the prisoners; and gave Riboumont in honour of his valour, a rich Chapter of Pearl, which himself wore on his head; for a New-year's-gift) forgave him his ransom, and set him at liberty. But the English not long after, in the like practice, had better success, and got the Castle of Gujfires, (a piece of great importance near Callicie) for a sum of money, given to one Desouiers a French man. Of which Castle when the French King demanded restitution, in regard the Lord Trincas, King Edward returns answer that for things bought and sold between their people, there was no exception, and so held it.

About this time Philip King of France died, leaving his son John to succeed him; in the beginning of whose Reign, Humbert Prince of Dampphin dying without issue, made him his heir; and thereupon Charles, King John's Son was created the first Dampphin of France from whence it grew to be a custom that the King of France his heir should always be called Dampphin of France. About this time also the Duke of Lancaster was to perform a Combar, upon a challenge with a Prince of Bohemia; but when they had entred the Lists, and had taken their Oaths, King John interposed and made them friends. And now when after many means of mediation, no peace could be concluded between the two Kings, the Prince of Wales being now grown a man, is appeased by Parliament to go into Gascony with a thouand men, to vise the French forces, and a great number of Walfomen; and in June following be fets forth with three hundred Sali, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford; the Lord Chandos, the Lord James Audley, Sir Robert Knoll, Sir Francis Hall, with many others. About Michaelmas following, the King himself pasteth over to Callicie with another Army, taking with him two of his Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulster in right of his Wife, and John of Gaunt, Earl of Richmond. There met him at Callicie of Mercenaries out of Germany, Flanders, and Brabant, a thousand men at Arms; so that his Army consisted of three thousand men at Arms, and two thousand Archers on horse-back, besides Archers on foot. The City of London sent three hundred men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one livery, at their own charge; but all this great Army effected nothing at that time, by reason the King of France would not be drawn to any Encouner, and had to disarm the Country of all provisions, that the King of England was forced to return. King Edward sollicited by the King of Navarre to aid him against the King of France, sends over the Duke of Lancaster with four thousand men at Arms, who wins many Towns; and the Prince enters into Parthenay, paileth over Langnebuck to Thomas, Northumberland, without any encounter, sacks, spoils, and destroys where he goes, and loadeth with booties, returns to Burdeaux. The French King thus assaulted on all sides, gathers all the power he possibly could; and first makes against his Enemies in Normandy, recovers many of his lost Towns, and was likely to have there prevailed; but that he was drawn of force to oppose this fresh Invader, the Prince of Wales, who was come up into Touraine, against whom he brings his whole Army, consisting of about three thousand men; whereupon the Prince, whose Forces were not likely to be able to encounter him (being fix for one) was advised to retire again to Burdeaux. But the French King to prevent this course, follows; and within two Leagues of Poylter, hath him at a great advantage. At which instant two Cardinals came from the Pope to mediate a Peace. But the French King supposing he had his enemy now in his mercy, and accepted of none other conditions, but that the Prince should deliver four Hottages; and as vanquished, render himself and his Army to his discretion. The Prince was content to restore unto him what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice of his honour, wherein he said he stood accountable to his Father, and to his Country. But the French King would abate nothing of his demands, as making himself sure of Victory; and thereupon was instantly ready to set upon the Prince: who seeing himself reduced to this straight, takes what advantage he could of the ground, and providently got the benefit of Vines, Shrubs, and Buffes, on that part he was like to be affailed, to impede and intangle the French Horse, which he knew were to come furiously upon him. The successe answered his expectation, for the Cavalry of his Enemies upon their first assault were so wrap and encompassed amongst the Vines, that his Archers galloped and annonied the Prince of their pleasure. For the French King to give the honour of the baggage, ordred the Army, to imployed them only without his Infantry; so as they being disordred and put to rout, his whole Army came utterly to be defeated. In this Battle were taken prisoners King John himself, with his youngest Son Philip, by Dennis de Merlebeke, a Knight of Artois, the Earl of Cambrai, the Archbishop of Sens, John de Artois, Count de En; Charles de Artois; his brother Count de Longueville; John de Melun; Count de Tankerville; the Counts of Vendome, Valenlum, Efampage, Salbourg, Dampmartin and La Roche; and John de Caure, accounted as Poylter, the best Knight of France, with many other Lords besides two thousand Knights and Gentlemen;
infomuch as the Conquerours holding it not safe to retain so many, let many of them go. The French who can give best account of their own losses, report there died in this Battle, a thousand seven hundred Gentlemen, amongst which were fifty two Banneters: the most eminent Peter de Bourbon, the Duke of Atheb Constable of France, Johan de Clermont, Marshal; Geoffry de Cheyni, high Chamberlain; the Bishop of Chaton, the Lord of Landas, of Perp, and of Cambly. There escaped from this Battle three of the French Kings Sons, (for he brought them all thither) Charles Prince Dauphin; Louis after Duke of Auisyn, and John Duke of Berry: all great actors in the time following. The special great men of the English in this fight, were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, Stafford; the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Berkeley, Bishop of Gafcoynes, Le Capitale de Besly; the Lords, Palmer, Chamberlain, and others. The Lord James Audley won many plucks, by his valor, in the battle: for having vowed to be foremost in this fight, he performed his word, and sealed it with many wounds: for which the Prince having rewarded him with the gift of five hundred Marks. Fie-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Equires. Whereupon the Prince demanding whether he accepted not his gift: he answered, that these men had deferred the same as well as himself, and had more need of it: with which reply the Prince was so well pleased, that he gave him five hundred Marks more in the same kind. A rare example, where deference in the Subject, and reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater.

But there great strife arose between many, who should be the man that took King John prisoner; but the Prince commanded them to forbear their claims, till they came into England: where the matter being heard, it was adjudged by the Council of the Netherlands, that one Serjeant Hus Marbuceque of Saint Omer's, had taken him prisoner: for which service the King rewarded him with a thousand Marks.

And now, though King John had the misfortune to fall into the hands of his enemy, yet he had the happiness to fall into the hands of a noble Enemy; for Prince Edward used him with such respect and observance, that he could not find much difference between his captivity and liberty. After the Battle, which was fought the nineteenth day of September, in the year 1537. Prince Edward leads King John and the captive Lords to Bordeaux, where he retains them till the Spring following; but lends frequent news of this Victory to his Father: who thereupon caueth a general Thanksgiving all England over eight days together. And in May following King John rather coming over with the Prince, then brought over by him, is lodged by the City of London, to hear the Duke of Lancaster, and the fairest at that time about London. And King Edward, as though he thought it honour enough to have one King his Prisoner at once, at the suit of his Sister Queen Joan, sets her Husband David King of Scots at liberty, after he had been prisoner in England eleven years; but not without paying a ransom, which was a hundred thousand Marks to be paid in ten years.

After this, by mediation of Cardinals sent by the Pope, a Truce for two years is concluded between the two Kingdoms of England and France; and in the time of this Truce, Articles of Peace between the two Kings are propounded. King Edward requires the Dutches of Normandy and Guyrane, the Countries of Poitou, Thoarnes, Maine, and Aisyn, with all their appurtenances as large as King Richard the first held them, and many other Provinces besides, and to hold them all without Homage or any other service; to which Articles King John (wary of imprisonment) affents and seals, but the Dauphin and Council of France utterly reject it. Whereupon King Edward in great displeasure resolves to make an end of this work with the Sword, and to take possession of the Kingdom of France; and leaving his younger Son Thomas Governor of his Kingdom at Rome, with a Fleet of eleven hundred Sail, and taking with him the greater part of his Army, he passed over to Calais, dividing his Army into three Battells, whereas one he commits to the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself. And first marching through Picardy, where he takes in many Towns, he plants his siege afterwards before Rheims: but having spent there six or seven weeks without effecting any thing, he passeth thence, and taketh in the Cities of Sens and Nevers: the Dutchy of Burgaine redeems it from spoil with paying two hundred thousand Francs of Gold. Then he marcheth up to Paris, and plants his Camp within two miles of the Leagues of the Town, where he honoured 400. Equires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood: but when Sir Walter de Manny had made a Bravado before the Gates of the City, and the King saw that the Dauphin would by no provocations be drawn out to Battle, he retired his siege, and returns into Britain to refresh his Army, on the expectation of men towards Charles with a purpose to beleaguer that City; and though great offers were made him by the French, and Commissioners from the Pope solicited him with all earnestness to accept them: yet neither they, nor the Duke of Lancaster's persuasions could prevail with him, till a terrible storm of Hail with Thunder and Lightning fell upon his Army, which so terrified him, being a warning, as it were from Heaven, that he presently vowed to make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable conditions, as shortly after he did at a Treaty of Briggay near to Chartres upon these Articles: that the Feifs of Thouars and Belleville, the Duchy of Guayenne, comprising Gafcoynes, Poi- tou, Saintonges, Lomarday, Perigay, the Counties of Rode, Angouleme, and Rachel, together with the Counties of Giffay and Calais, and some other places with the Homage of the Lords within those Territories, should be restored to King Edward of England, who besides was to have three millions of Crowns of Gold; whereas six hundred thousand in hand, four hundred thousand the year following, and the rest in two years after; and for this the King of England, and his Son the Prince of Wales, for them and their succes- sours for ever, should renounce all their right pretended to the Crown of France, the Dutchy

The Treat. of Chartres: and the Truce between the King of France and King Edward, did not prevail to the satisfaction of either party.
Duchy of Normandy, the Countries of Touraine, Anjou, Maine, the Homage and Sovereignty of Brittany, and the Earlome of Flanders; and within three weeks King John to be rendered at Calais, at the charge of the King of England, except the expenses of his house. For suffrage of which accord should be given into his hand five and twenty of the greatest Dukes and Lords of France for Hostages. The Scots not to be aided by the French King, nor the Flemings by the English. This accord and final Peace signed by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldest Sons, Edward and Charles, and sworn unto by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hostages are delivered to King Edward, who brought them into England; and thereupon King John is honourably conducted to Calais, after he had remained prisoner in England near about five years; but being come to Calais, he was detained there above three months, till the money whereof he was detained in King, could be provided; and for providing thereof, he was put to hard stricts, being feign to give the Jews leave to dwell in France for twenty years, paying twelve Florens a man at the entry, and six every year after. At this time the Prince by dispensation, marries the Countess of Kent, Daughter to Edmunds, brother to Edward the second; and his Father investing him with the Duchy of Aquitain, he was now Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester and Kent; and not long after, with the Prince's wife, he passed over into France, and keeps his Court at Bordeaux.

This was now the year 1362. and the fiftieth year of King Edward's age, wherein for a while, he flew himself extraordinarily gracious to his people, freely pardoning many offences, releasing prisoners, revoking exiles; with many other expressions of his love and bounty. The year following was famous for three Kings coming into England; John King of France, Peter King of Cyprus, and David King of Scots. The King of Cyprus came to solicit King Edward to join with other Princes in the Holy War, but receives only royal entertainment and excuses. The King of Scots came for busines and visitation, but why the King of France came is not so certain; whether it were about taking order for his Hostages; or to satisfie King Edward for breach of some Articles; or else for love to the Countess of Salisbury; or perhaps out of a desire to let England see his Majest, being at liberty, which had been darkened before by the cloud of captivity: but whatsoever the cause of his coming was, the cause of his staying (at last, of longer staying then it meant) was mortal sickness, whereof (having lien all the Winter at the Savoy) in March or April following he died; and his body conveyed over into France, was buried at St. Dennis with his Ancestors.

The Prince of Wales was now grown famous all the Christian world over, and the man to whom all wronged Princes seem to appeal, and to fly for succour; for which end there came at this time to his Court, James King of Majorque, and happened to come at a time when the Princes lay in; and thereupon he and Richard King of Navarre were taken to be God-fathers to his Son Richard. For the like affiance also there came at the same time to him, Peter King of Castile, driven out of his Kingdom by the French, in favour to Peter King of Aragon; and Prince Edward, partly out of charity to succor a disstraffed Prince, and partly out of policy, to keep his Souldiers in exercise, undertakes the enterprise, and was so prosperous in it, that with one Battle (having but 3000, against 10,000,) he put King Peter in possession of his Kingdom, though he was ill rewarded for his labour; for the imprudent King would not so much as pay his Souldiers. And it is memorable which Froissart writes, that of the enemies were slain and drowned above 2000. and of the Princes partly not above 40. But yet an unfortunate journey for the Prince, for though he came back with victory; yet he brought back with him such an indiposition of body, that he was never thoroughly well after, nor perhaps by pay, not given him by a Brother of the House of Dacles, though both were suspicious; but there were causes of dismannerly him enough besides, the Country, the Seaon, the Action it self; and it might be more marvellous that his Souldiers came home so well, then that he came home so ill. But however, being now returned, there was presently to his indiposition of body, added dishonour of mind; for not having means to pay his Souldiers, which forced him to wink at, which he could not chuse forbear, and feeling grieved at, how they preyed upon the County, and thereupon how the County murmured against him. And now to stop this murmuring, his Chancellour, the Bishop of Rhodes, devised a new imposition, of levying a Frank for every Chimney; and this to continue for five years to pay the Princes debts; but this Imposition made the murmuring the more. For though some part of his Dominicans, as the Polemis, Xaviers, and Lusbausers, in a fort contended to it, yet the Count of Armagnac, the Count of Comines, the Vifcount of Carmain, and many others so much disdained it, that they complained thereof to the King of France, as to their Supreme Lord; who upon examination finding their complaint to be just, he thereupon by advice of his Council, summons Prince Edward to appear in person to answer the complaint: Whereunto Prince Edward made anfwere, that if it must needs appear, he would bring three score thousand men in Arms to appear with him; and had certainly brought his Army that Summer against Paris, if he had not fallen into symptoms of a Dropie which (Walfingham faith) was wrought by enchantment. But upon this answer of the Prince, King Charles sends defiance to King Edward, who thereupon prepares Arms both by Sea and Land to oppose him. The French enters upon the Territories of the Prince, and thereupon enters of his Troops; in revenge whereof John Chancellor the Prince's Lieutenant affails Terriers in the Province of Thoulaus, and takes it. The Count of Perigord affails Kynvill in Quercy, and put all the English to the Sword; in revenge whereof James Anderley Senechal of Poitain, affails the City of Breif, and takes it. In the mean time Robert Knoll, by some called Robin, and by others Arnold, or Reynold Knoll, had drawn closely the Portuguese, and inter-exchangeably take Towns. this great Army on a sudden came to nothing. It seems Knolly’s action was the least successful, by reason of some young Lords that went with him, scorning to be under his command; as being now a new man, and riven from a low estate, were refractory to his directions: and indeed what can a General do, if he have not as well reputation of person, as of place?

And now the Prince of Wales, his eldest Son Edward dying at Bardeaux, the Prince with his Wife, and another Son Richard, came over into England; at which time the valiant Knight Walter de Manny died at London, and was buried in the Monastery of the Chartres which he had built; leaving one only Daughter, married to John Earl of Pembroke. This Earl of Pembroke, was soon after sent Governor into Aquitaine; but set up by the way by Edward and of that of the French, was by them taken prisoner, and carried with others into Spain; who being chained together, as the manner is, one Events a Wele Family, who gave himself out for the right Heir of Wales, came upon him, foolishly playing upon him with scornful language; as though to insult over another man’s misery, could serve for a cordial to mitigate his own.

And now upon the taking of this Earl, the Princes Dominions in France, are either taken away, or fall away faster than they were gotten. Gueschlyn enters Poitou, takes Montmorillon, Cherbourg, Lausick, and Moncontour: straight after follows the Country of Amiens, or Xantignies, and the rest of Poitou: then St. Maxent, Nede, Abbevill: then Benin, Marins, Surigue, Fontenay: and at last they came to Thiers, where the most part of the Lords of Poitou, that held with the Prince were assembled. At which time King Edward, in favour of the Prince, the Duke of Lancaster, and all the great Lords of England, set forward to their succours, but being driven back by tempest, never came to give them audience, so as Thomas yielded upon composition. Yet did this preparation of the King stand him in nine thousand Marks; that it may be truly said, it cost him more now to lose Towns, then it had cost him before to win them: so great odds there is between the Spring and fall of Fortune. After this the Duke of Lancaster is sent over with another great Army, who puffed up into many parts of the Country, but King Charles resolved to hazard no Batter: saying, They were but clouds, and would soon pass away; yet so watched him, that what with lightskirmishes, and what with scarcity of Victuals, his Forces were so diminished, that of thirty thousand which went out of Caflle, there scarce returned six thousand horse.

The Duke of Lancaster is sent over with an Army of thirty thousand, but scarce fix thousand returned home.
In the time of the Princes sickness, King Edward calls a Parliament at Westminster; in which when demands were made for supply of the King, demands were presently made for reliefe. It was required that the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Lancaster then Lord Chamberlain, Dame Alice Pierse the Kings Concubine, and one Richard Story might be removed from Court; and this was so vehemently urged by their Speaker, Sir Peter de la More, that the King rather than be supplicied, gave way unto it; and thereupon all these persons are presently put from Court: but the Prince soon after dying, they are all recalled to Court again, and restored to their former places.

About this time exemplary Justice was done upon Sir John Midderworth, Knight, who was drawn, hanged, and quartered at Tylers for Trelion by him committed, in defrauding Soldiers of their wages.

About this time the Duke of Lancaster, being at Bordeaux, and hearing of the death of Peter King of Coffle, whom Prince Edward had visited in his Kingdom, and that he left estates, the heirs of his Kingdom, who were then at the City of Gasgoigne, for their safety, he sent and caused them to be brought to Bordeaux, and there himself married the elder sister Cousin: in whose right he afterward took upon him the title of King of Coffle and Leon: and not long after his younger Brother, Edmund Earl of Cambridge married the younger sister Isabella.

This was the fiftieth year of Edward’s Reign, and he for another Jiule, grants another general pardon to his Subjects, only William Pickham Bishop of Winchester is excepted, being lately by procurement of the Duke of Lancaster, fallen into the Kings displeasure, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. This Parliament was called the good Parliament; though it wrought ill effects; for Sir Peter de la More at the suit of Alice Pierse, is committed to perpetual imprisonment at Fortibingham, though within two years after by important suit of friends he regained his Right. This Alice Pierse presuming upon the Kings favour, grew in insolence, that she intermeddled with Courts of Justice, and other Offices; where the her suit would fit, to Courtenance her Causes. And now the Duke of Lancaster is come to have the Regency, and to manage all the Affairs of the Kingdom; but King Edward to prevent the mischief, which by disordering the succession might grow in the Kingdom, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Bordeaux, creating him first Earl of Chester and Connaught, and then Prince of Wales; and caused all the Lords of the Realm to take an Oath, to accept him for their King, as his lawful Heir, when himself should be dead. In this mean time a Treaty was had about a marriage between this Prince Richard, and Mary a daughter of Charles King of France: and an offer was made to King Edward, to leave him fourteen hundred Towns, and three thousand Fortresses in Aquitania, upon condition he would render Calais, and all that he held in Picardy; but before any thing could be concluded, King Edward died.

Of his Taxes.

In the eighth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at London, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporalties, a twelfth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a tenth of the Clergy. In his tenth year, in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted a tenth penny of Cities and Boroughs, a fifteenth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy. Also all such Treasuries as was committed to the Churches through England for the Holy War is taken out for the Kings use, towards his Wars with France. The next year after all the goods of three Orders of Monks, Lombarde, Clarenians, and Clericans, are likewise seized into the Kings hands: and the like Subsidy as before granted at Nottingham. In his twelfth year (and as we say, in absence of the King) in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted by the Laty, one half of their Wool, but of the Clergy the whole. The next year after a fifteenth was likewise paid in Wool by the Commonalty. In his fourteenth year, in a Parliament at London, is granted him for allum of every piece of thirty shillings, by one hundred three hundred Wool-Fells forty shillings, for every Lott of Leather forty shillings; and of other Merchandizes, according to the rate: the same to endure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve Month after. Besides there was granted of Citizens and Burgesse, a ninth part of their goods; of Foreign Merchants and others, a fourteenth; of Husbandmen, the ninth Shesh, the ninth Fleece, the ninth Lamb for two years; also another tenth of the Clergy: and for his present supply he had Loans of divers persons; and the City of London lent twenty thousand Marks. For the grant of which mighty Subsidy, the King (besides his pardon to divers kinds of offenders) remits all amercements for transmissions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage to the first time of his going into Flanders, besides all aids for the marriage of his Sons and daughters during his Reign; pardoning and remitting all ancient debts and arrears, both of his Farmers and others; till the tenth year of his Reign; and likewise confirm the great Charter of Magna Charta. In his eighteenth year in a Parliament at London, a tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laty; besides a Commission is sent into every Shire to enquire of mens abilities; and all of five points to ten of Lay Fee, were appointed to finde an Arriuer on forrebecke; of twenty five a Demy, and so ratably above. There had formerly been made a certain coin of Gold called the Florin, of base alloy for the Kings benefit, towards... towards his Wars in France, but this was now called in, and Nobles of finer metal coined, to the great contentment of the people. In his nine and thirtieth year, he hath by Parliament granted unto him fifty shillings upon every sack of Wool, for six years next ensuing; by which imposition, it was thought the King might dispense a thousand Marks sterling a day, the vent of Wool was so great in that time: but that which exceeded all his Taxations, was the Roman-furnishing of his time and thirtieth year, the King of France making millions of crown of gold. In his twelfth year, he had taken from the Priors Aliens their Houses, Lands, and Tenements, for the maintenance of his French Wars, which he kept twenty years in his hands, and then restored them again. In his six and thirtieth year was granted twenty six shillings eight pence, for transportation of every sack of Wool for three years. In the five and fortieth year of his Reign in a Parliament at Westminster, the Clergy granted him fifty thousand pounds to be paid the same year, and the Livery as much; which was yielded by letting a certain rate of five pounds fifteen shillings upon every Parish, which were found in the thirty seven Shires to be eight thousand and six hundred, and so came in the whole to fifty thousand, one hundred eighty one pounds and eight pence: but 181. L was abated to the Shires of Suffolk and Devonshire, in regard of their poverty. In his eight and fortieth year, in a Parliament, it granted him a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Livery. In his fifteenth year a Subsidy of a new nature was demanded by the young Prince Richard, whom (being but eleven years of age) the Duke of Lancaster had brought into the Parliament of purpose to make the demand; to have two tenths to be paid in one year, or twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandize sold for one year; and one pound of silver for every Knights Fee, and of every Fire-house one penny; but instead of this Subsidy, after much altercation, there was granted another of as new a nature as this, that every person, man and woman within the Kingdom, above the age of fourteen years, should pay four pence (those who lived of Alms only excepted) the Clergy to pay twelve pence of every Parson benefited, and of all other Religious persons four pence. A mighty aid, and such as was never granted to any King of England before.

He inflicted the Order of the Garter, upon what cause is not certain. The common opinion is, that a Garter of his own Queen, or (as some say) of the Lady Jane, Countess of Salisbury, slipping off in a Dance, King Edward stooped, and took it up; whereas some of his Lords that were present, smiling, as at an amorous action, he seriously said, it should not be long ere Sovereign honour should be done to that Garter; whereupon he afterward added the French Motto, Honi soit qui mal y pense; wherein checking his Lords finiter suspicion. Some conjecture that he inflicted the Order of the Garter, for that in a Battle wherein he was victorious, he had given the word Garter, for the word or sign: and some again are of opinion, that the institution of this order is more ancient, and begun by King Richard the first. But that this King Edward adopted it, and brought it into splendour. The number of the Knights of this Order is twenty six, whereas the King himself is always one, and Preident; and their Feast yearly celebrated at Windsor on St. George's day, the Tutelar Saint of that Order. The Laws of the Order are many, whereof there is a book of purposé. In the five and thirtieth year of his Reign, he was exactly petitioned by a Parliament then held, that the great Charters of Liberties, and the Charter of Forells might be duly observ'd, and that the great Officers of the Kingdom should (as in former times) be elected by Parliament. To which Petition, though the King at first would touch upon his own Election and Pregressive; yet at last (in regard to have his present turn serv'd, as himself after confessed) he yielded that such Officers should receive an Oath in Parliament, to do justice to all men in their Offices; and thereupon a Statute was made and confirmed with the Kings Seal, both for that and many other Grants of his to his Subjects; which now withstanding were for the most part shortly after revoked.

This King also caugheth all Plies, which were before in French, to be made in English, that the Subject might understand the course of the Law. Also in his time an Act was passed for Purveyors, that nothing should be taken up but for ready money upon hifts punishment. In the next Parliament held the thirty third year of his Reign, certain customary Lawes were ordained both for apparel and diet; appointing every degree of men the figure and habits theyshould wear, prohibiting the wearing of Gold and Silver, Silks, and rich Furs to all, but eminent persons. The Labourer and Husbandman is appointed but one meal a day, and what means he should eat. Also in his time at the instance of the Lords, an Act was made that no common Whore should wear any Hood, except striped with divers colours; nor Furs, but Garments reverred the wrong side outward. This King also was the first that created Dukes, of whom Henry of Bulgingmook, Earl of Lancaster created Duke of Lancaster, in the seven and twentieth year of his Reign was the first. But afterward he created Cornwall also into a Duchy, and conferred it upon the Prince: after which time, the Kings eldest Son used always to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. This King also altered many, and abated them in weight, and yet made them to pass according to the former value. Before this time there were no other pieces but Nobles and half Nobles, with the small pieces of silver called Sterling; but now Groats of four pence, and half Groats of two pence, equivalent to the Sterling money, are coined, which enhanced the Prices of things, that rise or fall, according to the plenty or scarcity of croy; which made Servains and Labourers to raise their wages accordingly: wherein on a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the former rate. Also an Act was made in this Kings time, that all Wears, Mills, and other stopages of Rivers, hindering the passages of Boats, Lighters, and other Vessell should be remou'd; which though it were most commodious to Hounfode's appointed what men they should eat.

Whores to wear their garments reversed. Dukes first created.
King Edward upon some displeasure, had imprisoned divers Clergy-men: whereupon John Stradford Arch-bishop of Canterbury writes him a Letter, charging him with violation of the Rights of the Church, and with the breach of Magna Charta; and after much good counsel gives him his threatment, that if he amend not these disorders, he must and will execute his Ecclesiastical Authority, and proceed to Excommunication of his Officers, though not of himself, Queen, or Children. The King answers, and sends his Letter to the Bishop of London, charging the Arch-bishop to be the cause of all this disturbance, having been the man that first let him upon the War with France, affuring him he should want no money; and now had been the hinderance, that money given him by Parliament, were not duly levied: and after many remonstrances to fuch purpose, concludes, that if he defiled not from his rebellious obstinacy, he would use his Temporal Authority, and proceed against him as against a Rebel. But this difference between them was not long after, upon the Archbishops submission, reconciled. And indeed the great account which this King made of Clergy-men, may appear by his employing almost none but Clergy-men in all his Offices of account: Simon Langham Arch-bishop of Canterbury, was Chancellor of England; William Wickham Arch-bishop of Lincoln, Keeper of the Privy Seal: David Will Parson of Somerford, Master of the Rolls; ten Bene-

The custom of washing poor men's feet on Manusly-Thursday, thought to have been first brought in by this King. This King also confirmed the Franchises of the City of London, and ordained that the Mayor for the time being, should sit in all places of Judgement, within the liberty of the fame, as chief Justice, the Kings person only excepted: and that every Alderman that had been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace in all London and Middlesex; and every Alderman that had not been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace within his own Ward. Also he granted to the Citizens of London, that they should not be constrained to go out of the City to fight or defend the Land for any need. Also that after that day the Franchises of the City should not be feited into the Kings hands, but only for Treason and Rebellion done by the whole City. Also that Southwark should be under the rule of the City, and the Mayor to choose a Bayliff there, as he liked. He also granted to the Citizens of London, that the Officers of the Mayors and Sheriffs, should from that day forward use Maces of silver parcel-gilt.

The Pope refrained from conferring of Benefices in England.

In the seventeenth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, complaint is made of the great inconvenience that came by the Popes Collation of Benefices in England, conferring them upon strangers, who understand not the Language; and therefore not fit to be Pastours over a flock they could not feed: and hereupon Sir John Sordich is sent to Pope Clement the sixth, to require him to forbear such Collations, and to signify his content therein: but this Message was so unwelcome to the Pope, that the Messenger came back unheard, at least unanswer'd; and the King taking his silence for content, or perhaps not much caring whether he consented or no, proceeded to a prohibition of all such Collations within his Realm, on pain of imprisonment, or death, to whomsoever should in time to come, present or admit any such person, who by the Pope were so preferred to the prejudice of the Kings Prerogative. These were Disturbances in matter of Discipline, but towards the end of his Reign, there fell a Disturbance in matter of Doctrine, for a certain Divine named John Wickhiff, inveighed in his Sermons, and other acts in the Schools, against the abuses of Church-men, Monks, and other Religious Orders: and had by his Doctrine won many Disciples unto him, (who after were called Lollards,) professing poverty, going bare-foot, and poorly clad in Ruffian. Amongst other his Doctrines, he taught that neither King nor other secular Lord, could give any thing in perpetuity unto Church-men; and that temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take the goods of Religious persons to relieve them in their necessities, by the example of William Rufus, and others. This man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Percy Marshal, much favour and cherish him, exalting him for his learning and integrity of life; which made him so far to presume, that daily in one Church or other he published his Opinions. Whereupon at length he is cited to answer before the Archbishops, the Bishop of London, and others, in Pauls. At the day appointed, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Marshal go to conduct him; when they were come to our Ladies Chapel, the Duke and Barons with the Bishops sitting down, John Wickhiff was by the Lord Marshal willed to sit down, in regard (he said) the man had much to answer; and needed a convenient seat. The Bishop of London told him, it was against all Law and Reason, that he who was
The life and reign of King Edward the third.

Whereupon a great contention between the Lord Marshall and the B.ishop, the Duke takes the Marshals part, and sharply reprehend the Bishop, who in a great rage swore he would pull down the pride of him, and of all the Bishops in England; and whispering in his ear, told him he had rather pull him out of the Church by the hair of the head, than to suffer such indignities. Which words the Lord Marshals over-hearing, swore with a loud voice they would rather lose their lives than suffer their Bishop to be thus injuriously used. Their fury was the more against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament (whereof he was President) it was required in the Kings name, that from thenceforth there should be no more a Mayor of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City; and that the Lord Marshall of England should arrest offenders within the Liberties, as in other places. The moment after the Bishop's affambling to confute this bullen, it happened the Lord Fitz-Water, and Guido Bryan, came into the City, which the people seeing, furiously ran upon them, and were like to beat them down for coming at that time. The Lord Fitz-Water protected he came to no other end, but to offer his service to the City, being by inheritance his Standard-bearer, and to take injuries offered to them, as to himself; and therefore willed them, to look to their defence. Whereupon they presently take Arms, affill the Martha's Inn, break open the Gates, brought forth a prisoner in his Gaves, and set him at liberty, but found not the Lord Marshall, who with the Duke was that day to dine with one John de Ypres. Then this furious multitude ran to affill the Savoy, which a Knight of the Dukes feeling, hasted to the place where his Lord dined; and acquaints him with this uproar in the City. The Duke upon hearing it, leaps from the Table, and says, that he himself will go to the form, and with Sir Henry Piercy alone takes horse, and goes to Kennington near Lambeth, where the Princes with the young Prince lay to whom he complains of this riot, and the violence offered him. In the meantime the multitude coming to the Savoy, a Priest inquisitive took noe know the bullens, was answered, they went to take the Duke, and the Lord Marshall, and compel them to deliver Sir Peter de la More, unjustly kept in prison. The Priest replied that Sir Peter was a Tractator to the King, and worthy to be hanged; at which words they all cried out, This is Piercy, This is the Tractator of England, his speech bewrays him, though his apparel be digigned and presently they ran upon him, and wounded him to death. The Bishop of London bearing of this out-rage, leaves his dinner, hastes to the Savoy, and methim of the holy time being Lent, affiling them, all should be kindly ended for the good of the City. With whole persuasions they were somewhat pacified, but yet they took the Dukes Arms, and hung them up reverend, in sign of Treason, in all the principal parts of the City. Upon the Princesses advice, the Chief Citizens send to the sick King, to excuse this tumult, saying it was not in their power to suppress it, the Commonalty being in commotion, upon an information that their Liberties should be taken from them by Parliament. The King told them, it never was in his thought to infringe their Liberties; but the rather desired to enlarge them. But this affront of the Citizens would not down with the Duke till he had pulled down some of the principal of them, for he caused the Mayor and Aldermen to be displaced, and other put in their rooms. A revenge he had better been without, for he never had the love of the City after, and to want their love is a kinda of blamishment. Wickhiffe himself, cenured by the Bishops to oblige his Opinions, chose rather to leave his Country then his Doctrine; and going over into Bohemia, was there much honoured while he lived, and hath been more since he died: at least a great part of his Doctrine continues in veneration amongst that people to this day.

Works of Pity done by him, or by others in his time.

His works of Pity were great and many, as the founding of Easf-Minster, an Abbey (of the Celles Order) near the Tower. An Abbey for Nuns at Dartford in Kent. The Kings Hall in Cambridge for poor Scholars. An Hospital for the poor at Calliche. He conferred upon the University of Oxford, where he had himself been trained up, under the learned Walter Barley, the chief rule of the City, subordinating the Mayor and Citizens to the Chancellor of the University. He built Saint Stephen's Chappel at Welfminister, with the endowment of 360. pound per annum. He augmented the Chappel at Windfor, and made provisions there for Church-men, and four and twenty poor Knights. There were his publick works. But besides these, his private Building were the Castle of Windfor, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Castle at Quisto-rough, Fortifications at Calliche and other places. His Queen Philippa built a Chappel at Oxford, the Priory of Orford, the M.C. of Lambeth, the College called Pembroke Hall in Cambridge. In this Kings time Sir John Poultney, Mayor of London, built the College in London called Saint Lawrence Poultney; and little Altholm, a Pariif Church in Thomas-Street; and also the Carmelitri Friers Church in Coventy, Henry Earl of Lancaster and Leicester founded the Hospital by the Castle of Lieffer, wherein a hundred poor impotent people were provided for with all things necessary. William Elfging Mercer of London, made a new Hospital of an old house of Nuns by Cryplage: and placing Canons regular there, he became the first Prior thereof. Walter Stapton Bishop of Exeter founded Exe- ter Colledge, and Hart Hall in Oxford. William Bateman Bishop of Norwich, built Trinity Hall in Cambridge. Simon Ihip Archbpishop of Canterbury, founded Canterbury College in Ox- ford. William Edendor Treasurer of England, founded the Monastery of Edendor; the Relig- ious Brethren whereof were called Batsbamus. Sir Walter de Monny, born in Cambridge, purchased a piece of ground called Spittle-Croft, containing thirteen Acres, without the Bars of Welf, Smithfield, and caused the same to be enclosed; where he built a Chappel, and after founded the same to be a House of Charter youths. Monks.
Monks. Humfry Beham Earl of Hertford and Exle, re-edified the Augustine Fryers Church in London, and was buried in the Chare there. In the two and thirtieth year of this Kings Reign, John Stede Mayor of London, gave unto the Venneres of London all the Quadrant where Vinners Hall now standeth, with the Tenements round about, from the Lane to this day called Stede's Lane; where are founded thirteen houses for thirteen poor people, which are there kept of Charity. Also in this Kings time Sir John Cobham founded the College of Cobham in Kent. John Lothkin four times Mayor of London, builded at Kingsine upon Thames, where he was born, a Cappel called Magdalen, to the which he joyned an Hospital, wherein was a Master, two Priests, and certain poor men: and for that the Parish Church of Saint Michael by Crooked-lane, where he dwelled, was a very homely thing, and the ground thereabout a filthy plot, by reason of the Butchers in Kaffle-shop, who made the fame their Lay-hall, he on the fame ground buildled the fair new Parish Church of Saint Michael near St. Paul's, and was buried there in the middle of the Quire, under a fair Tomb of Stone. He also founded a College to the fame Church, near thereunto adjoyning. John Barnes Mayor of London, gave a Chett with three Locks, and a thousand Marks to be lent to young men upon security, so that it pass not one hundred Marks; and for the occupying thereof, if he were learned to say at his pleasure, De profundis for the soul of John Barnes; if he were not learned, to say Peter Nofter: but howsoever the money is lent, the Chett at this day standeth in the Chamber of London, without money or pledges. Thomas of Woodfleck, the youngest Son of King Edward, founded a College at Playfie in Exle, where in his life he had prov'd a famous Tomb, where he was first laid, but translater afterward to Westminster.

In the two and twentieth year of his Reign, a contagious Pestilence arose in the East and South parts of the world, and spread it self all over Christendom: and coming at last into England, it so wasteth the people, that scarce the tenth peron of all forts were left alive. There died in London (some say in Norwich) between the first of January and the first of July, 5774 persons. In Tarmouth, in one year, 7052. men and women before which time, the Parfonge there was worth 700. marks a year, and afterwards was scarce worth forty pounds a year. This Plague began in London about Allholliside, in the year 1348, and continued till the year 1357. Where it was observed, that those who were born before the beginning of this mortality had but twenty eight teeth, where before they had two and thirty. In the twelfth year of his Reign, a sudden Inundation of Water, at New-Collers Fens, bare down a piece of the Town Wall, and six perchs in length, near to a place called Waternew; where a hundred and twenty men and women were drowned. In the five and thirtieth year of his Reign, another Pestilence happened in England, which was called the second Pestilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaster, also Reginald Lord Cobham, and Walter Fitz Warren, two famous men, and five Bishops, of Worcester, of London, of Ely, of Lincoln, and of Chichester. In this Kings time a Froft lasted from the middle of September to the month of April. In the fourth year of his Reign a Soffe Jutting or Turnament was holden at London in Chafjford, betwixt the great Crofs and the great Conduit, nigh Super-Lane, which lasted three days; where the Queen Philippa, with many Ladies fell from a Stage, set up for them to behold the Putting: and though they were not hurt at all, yet the King threatened to punish the Carpenters for their negligence, till the Queen interceded pardons for them upon her knees: as indeed she was always ready to do all good offices of mercy to all people. In the eleventh year of his reign was so great plenty, that a quarter of Wheat was sold at London for two fullings, a fat Ox for a Noble, afat Sheep for fix pence, and six Pigeons for a penny, a fat Goofe for two pence, a Pig for a Penny, and other things after that rate. And indeed in his twenty seventh year there was a great scarcity, by reason there was not, or very little, from the end of March to the end of July: and was therefore called the dry Summer.

He married Philippa, the Daughter of William Earl of Herefay at York. A match made up in hate by Queen Idefel his mother, for her own ends, although a better could never have been made upon deliberation for King Edward's ends. For though her Parentage was not great, and her Portion left; yet the amends made for both, in vertue for never King had a better Wife. By her King Edward had seven sons, and five daughters. His eldest son Edward Prince of Wales, and commonly called the Black Prince, (but why so called uncertain; for to say, of his dreadful acts, as Spead faith, hath little probability; and indeed he was no better) who hath writ the Reign of King Edward the third, more particularly then any other, and lived in his time, never calls Prince Edward the Black Prince, nor any where makes mention that he was so called) was born at Woodfleck, in the third year of his Fathers Reign. He was married Joan, the daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, brother by the Fathers side to King Edward the second. She had been twice married before; first to the valiant Earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced; next to the Lord Thomas Holland; after whole deceafe, this Prince passionately loving her, married her. By her he had issue two sons, Edward the eldest, born at Angolestre, who died at seven years of age; and Richard born at Burdeaux, who after his Father, was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather, King of England. This Prince had also natural issue, Sir John Bourder, and Roger Clarendon, Knights; the latter being attainted in the Reign of King Henry the fourth, is thought to have been Ancestral to the House of Smithes in Exle. He died at Canterbury in the fif and fortieth year of his age, and of his Fathers Reign the nine and fortieth, and was buried at Chritis Church there. His second son William was born at Hotfield in Hertfordshire, who deceased in his childhood, and was buried at S.

buried at York. His third son Lionel was born at Antwerp, in the twelfth year of his Fathers reign. He married first Elizabeth the Daughter and Heir of William Burgh, Earl of Ulster in Ireland, in whose right he was created Earl of Ulster; and because he had with her the honour of Clare, in the County of Sussex, as it was in the Country about the town and honour of Clare: from which Dutton, the name of Claremont (being the title of the King of Arms, for the South parts of England) is derived. This Duke had issue by her one only daughter, named Philippa, afterward Wife of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Mother of Earl Roger, Father of Anne Countess of Cambridge, the Mother of Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the Fourth. The second Marriage of this Duke was at Millain in Lebanon, by the Lady Isabel, daughter of Gaunt; the second Duke then created, but through intermission he lived not long after. King Edward's fourth son named John, was born at Guasc in the fourteenth year of his Fathers Reign. He had three Wives, the first was Blanche, daughter and co-heir, and in the end the sole Heir of Henry Duke of Lancaster, son of Edmund, surnamed Crouch-back; by whom he had issue Henry of Ballingbrooke, Earl of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crown in the hoafe of Lancaster. By her also John of Guasc had two Daughters, Philippa Wife of John the first, King of Portugal, and Elizabeth married first to John Undland, Earl of Huntingdon, and after him to Sir John Constable, Baron of Pembroke. John of Guasc's second Wife was Constance, the eldest Daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he espoused, and led himself King of both those Realms. By her he had issue one only Daughter named Katherine, married to Henry the third, son of King John, in possession before, and in her right, after King of both the said Realms. John of Guasc's third Wife was Katherine, the Widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest Daughter and Co-heir of Pain Roet, a Gorseyne, called Giana King of Arms for that Country; his younger Daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue born before Matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament in the twentieth year of King Richard the second, John Earl of Somer- set, Thomas Duke of Exeter, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, and Joan (who was first married to Robert Ferrers, Baron of Wenne, and Osney, in the Counties of Salisbury and Warwick.) and secondly to Ralph Neville, the first Earl of Westmorland. Shee and all her Brethren were surnamed Beaumont, of a Castle which the Duke had in France, where they were all born; and in regard thereof, bare the Portcullis of a Castle for the Cognizance of their Family. This Duke in the thirteenth year of his Nephew King Richard was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixteenth year he was called home, and this title recalled; and the third year after in the sixtieth of his age, he died at Elly house in Holbourn, and is thence honourably Entombed in the Quire of St. Paul. King Edward's fifth son Edmund, surnamed of Langley, was first in the year 1362, created Earl of Cambridge; and afterward in the year 1386, made Duke of York, he married Isabel Daughter and Co-heir to Peter King of Castile, and Leon: his Son Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, took to Wife Anne Mowbray, Heir of the foresaid Lionel elder brother to Edward of Langley. King Edward's sixth son William, surnamed of Windsor, where he was born, died young, and is buried at Westminster. King Edward's youngest son Thomas, surnamed of Woodstock, where he was born, was first Earl of Buckingham, and after made Duke of Gloucester by his Nephew King Richard the second. He was a man of valour and volteme, but the King forummimg him to be too fierce an observer of his doings, confulted with Thomas Mowbray, whom Ambrose unwares surprized, conveying fecretly to Colisse, where he was thronged the twentieth year of King Richards Reign. He had issue one Son, Humphrey Earl of Buckingham, who died at Chester of the Pestilence, in the year 1400, and two Daughters, Anne Married first to Edward Earl of Stafford, by whom she had Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, secondly to William Bourchier Earl of Ewe, by whom she had Henry Earl of Essex, and Joan married to Gilbert, Lord Talbot, and had issue by him a Daughter, who died young. Of King Edward's Daughters, the eldest named Isabel, was married at Windsor to Ingraves of Guinefort, Lord of Camoe, Earl of Suffolk, and after Archduke of Austria, created also by King Edward Earl of Bedford: by whom she was Mother of two Daughters, Mary married to Henry Duke of Barre, and Philip married to Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marquefs of Dublin. This Robert in the height of his fortunes forsook his Lady Phillip, and married one Lanczours, a Joyners Daughter (as was said) which came with King Richard the second's Wife out of Bohemia; and being for abusing the Kings ear, driven out of the land by the Lords, he died at Louvain, in extreme poverty in the year 1392. Isabel his Wives Mother, was buried in the Church of Friers Minor near Allgate in London, King Edward's second Daughter Joan was married by Proxy to Alphonso, King of Castile and Leon: but passing into Spain, died by the way, and King Alphonso met her instead of confumming his Efpoused, to solemnize her Funeral. His third Daughter Blanch died young. His fourth named Mary, was married to John Monford Duke of Britain. His youngest named Margaret, born in Colisse, was the first Wife of John de Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, but died without issue.

Of his Personage and Condition. He was of stature indifferent tall, of sparkling eyes, of a comely and manly countenance, in his latter time somewhat bald; and concerning his conditions, no man was more gentle, where there was submision: where opposition, no man more stern. He was a Prince no less of his passions, then of his people; for he was never to loving, as to be fond, nor ever to so angry, as to be inexorable; but this must be underfoot of the time while he was a man, for in his old age, when he came to be a child again, he was a Prince of neither. Hewas no less fortunate than valiant, and his fortunate was the greater by a kinde of Antiprotaxis, as coming between two unfortunate Princes; successfull to one, and Predecessor to another. He was of so warlike a disposition, that his very sports were warlike; for no delight were so frequent with him as Juits and Turnaments. To shew his devotion, one example may be sufficient; for when neither Cardinals nor Counsellours could move him to make Peace with France, a Tempete from Heaven did it: to which may be added, that he never won great Battel, of which he won many, but he presently gave the glory of it to God by publick Thanksgivings. He one-lived the best Wife, and the best Son the ever King had; and to say the truth, he out-lived the bell of himself, for his latter years were not answerable to his former.

Of his Death and Burial.

King Edward besides his being old, and worn with the labours of War, had other causes that halted his end; his grief for the loss of so worthy a son, dead but ten months before; his grief for the loss of all benefit of his Conquests in France, of all which he had little now left but only Cattile. And oppressed thus in body and minde, he was drawing his last breath, when his Concubine Alice Pierse packing away what she could catch, even to the Kings of his Fingers, left him; and by her example, other of his attendants, feiting on what they could come by, shift away: and all his Counsellours and others forsook him, when he most needed them, leaving his Chamber quite empty. Which a poor Prieft in the house feesing, he approaches to the Kings Bed-side, and finding him yet breathing, calleth upon him to remember his Saviour, and to ask mercy for his offences; which none about him before would do. But now moved by the voice of this Prieft, he shews all signs of contrition, and at last breath he expresseth the name of Jesus. Thus died this victorious King at his Manor of Sheen, (now Richmond) the 21. day of June, in the year 1377. in the 64. year of his age, having reigned fifty years, four months, and odd days. His body was conveyed from Sheen by his four Sons, and other Lords, and solemnly interred within Welfmunder Church, where he hath his Monument: and where it is said the Sword he used in Battel, is yet to be seen, being eight pound in weight, and seven foot in length.

Artial men were never more plentiful then in this Kings Reign: whether it was that the Stars have an influence to produce such men at one time more then another: or whether it was that Regis ed exemplum, the Kings example made his Subjects like himself: or lastly, that his continual exercise of arms put them as it were into a mood of fortitude. The first of this kinde is worthily Edward the Black Prince, and so worthy the first, that Lunge erit a primo quippe secundus erit. Next him Henry Earl of Lancaster, the Princes right hand, in all his great achievements; then William the valiant Earl of Salisbury; then John Eure, Ancestor to the L. Eure that now liveth; then followed the Lord John Chandos, Sir James Audley, Sir Walter de Manny, Sir Robert Knollys; and then Sir John Hankwood born in Essex, who thought not much honoured at home, having been a Taylour: yet in foreign parts, and specially in Italy so famous, that his Statue was erected in publick, for a Monument to testify his valor to posterity. And here must not be forgotten Robert Venile, Knight, a Norfolk man; who when the Scots and English were ready to give Battel, a certain foot Champion of great stature, commonly called Ironbowl, coming out of the Scots Army, and challenging any English man to meet him in a single Combat, this Robert Venile accepteth the challenge, and marching towards the Champion and meeting him, he at the certain Black Maffiff, Dog, which waited on the Champion, he suddenly with his Sword cut him off at the loyes; and afterwards did more to the Champion himself, cutting his head from off his shoulders. And as there was this great plenty of Martial men, so there was no less plenty of Learned men; John Bonchaverse born in Norfolk, a Carmelite Friar, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Divinity; Nicholas Travis born also in Norfolk, a Black Friar, who wrote two Histories, and a Book of Annals: Richard Stradley, born in the Marches of Wales, a Monk and a Divine, who wrote divers excellent Treatises of the Scriptures: William Herbert a Welshman, and a Frier Minor, who wrote many good Treatises in Divinity: Thomas Walker a Dominic Friar, and a Writer of many excellent Books: John Eversley a Monk of Bury in Suffolk, an Historiographer: Walter Barley a Doctor of Divinity, brought up in a Famous College in Oxford, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Natural and Moral Philophy, which remain in estimation to this day, and who for the great fame of his Learning, had the honour to be one of the great Instructors of Edward the Black Prince: Roger of Chelser a Monk of that City, and an Historiographer: John Barish a Monk, who wrote a History, and also divers Homilies: Richard Angersvill Bishop of Durham, and Lord Chancellour of England, born in Suffolk: Walter Hemisford, an Historiographer: Richard Chichester a Mask of Welfmunder, who wrote an excellent Chronicle from the year 449. to the year 1534. Richard Rolle alias Hampole, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity: Robert Holme a Black Friar, born in Northampton, a learned Schoolman, and wrote many Books in Arguments of Divinity: Thomas Brodward, born near Chichester in Sussex, Archiduch of Canterbury who wrote against the Pelagians, and for his depth of Learning, had the Title of Doctor Præstantia: Richard Fice Ralph, Archiduch of Armagh in Ireland, a learned Writer: William Gryfion, named Angius, a notable Phisitian, whose Son came to be Pope, and was called Rome the fifth: John Kilvingworth an excellent Philosopher, Astronomer, and Physician:

THE SECOND.

\footnotesize{\textit{Ann. Dom. 1577.}}

ICHARD called of Bur-deaux, because born there, the only son of Edward the Black Prince, was by his Grandfather in his life time, declared to be his Heir and lawful Succesor; and accordingly

after his death was crowned King of England at Westminister, the sixteenth day of July, in the year 1577, by Simon Sidbury Archbp of Canterbury. And for the more solemnity of his Coronation, he then made nine Knights, and created four Earls; Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward the third's youngest son, was created Earl of Buckingham, and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, younger Brother of John Lord Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham; Gifford Anganlellne a Gafcelne, was made Earl of Huntington; and Henry Percy, son of Henry Lord Percy, was created Earl of Northumberland. At the time of the Coronation, the Duke of Lancaster, by the name of John King of Caftle, and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, put in his claim as

Earl of Leicester, to have the place of Earl Mar-chif of England; Duke of Lenox, to carry the Sword called Carvans; as Earl of Lincoln, to be carver that day: all which to be executed by himself, or by his sufficient Deputy, which with the Fees thereunto belonging, were confirmed unto him. As Likewise, divers others made their claims: Robert de Peres, Earl of Oxford, to have the Office of Chamberlain, and to pour out water for the King to wash: John Wiltshire Citizen of London, by reason of a moi ty of the Manour of Helden, holden in Sergeanty, claimed to hold a Towel for the King to wipe with when he went to meat; Thomas Beauchamp

Earl of Warwick, to bear the third Sword before the King; and also to exercise the Office of Panter: Sir John Argentine, by reason of his Manour of Wimborne in the County of Haf-ford, to serve the King at his Cap; William L.

Furnival for his Manour of Ernham, to support the King right Arm when he held the Royal Scepter: Anne late Wife of John de Hoftings

Earl of Pembroke, for his Manour of Abhe in Norfolk, to have the Office of Naper; which she was admitted to do by her Deputy Sir Thomas Bium; Richard Earl of Arundel, for his Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chief Butler: The Lord Mayor of London, to attend in his own person as chief Cup-waiter: Sir John Dimmick, for his Manour of Scrivley, and Sir Baldwin Frevile, for his Castle of Tam-worth, in the County of Warwick, contended for the Office of being the Kings Champion, but adjudged to Dimmick; William de Latimer, and John the son and heir of John Mowbray of As-holt, joyntly petitioned to have the Office of Almoner; but adjudged to Latimer: Richard Lion, as Tenant of the Manour of L. held by the service of making Wafers for the King at his Coronation, was thereunto admitted: The Barons of the Cinque-Ports were admitted to bear the Kings Canopy, upon four flames of Silver, over the Kings head; and also to sit at meat in the Hall, at the highest Table on the Kings right hand: John Fitz-John, by reason of his Manour of S. in Norfolk, was admitted to be chief Larderer: Richard Herin, for the Manour of the C. in the County of Sarry, claimed to be Usher of the Kings Chamber; but because that claim did no way concern the Coronation, he was left to pursue his Right some other time. The Coronation it self was performed with great solemnity: After a Sermon, the King took his Oath; and then the Archbishop blessed the King: which done, he tore off his Garment, and stripped him into his Shift; then he anointed his Hands, Head, Breast, Shoulders, and thejoynts of his Arms, with the Sacred Oyl; and after certain Prayers, he then clad him, first with the Coat of St. Edward, and after with his Mantle: after which the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, saying, Accipe Gladium; with which two Earls girded him:

Then he gave him Bracelets, saying, Accipe Armillas. After this he put upon him an upper Vesture called a Pall, saying, Accipe Pallium. In the mean time, while the Archbishop blessed the Crown, he to whose office it pertained, put Spurs on his heeles; after the Crown was blessed, the Archbishop set it on his head, saying, Coron tes te Deus: then he delivered him a King, saying, Accipe Annulam. Immediately hereafter came the Lord Farnival by virtue of his Office, offering him a red Glove; which the Archbishop blessed, and putting it on his hand, delivered him a Scepter, saying, Accipe Scipram:

and after that, into his other hand, delivered him a Rod, on the top whereof a Dove flying, saying, Accipe Virginis Virtutis; and then blest the King, saying, Benedicte te Deus: which done, the King kissed the Bishops and Abbots, by whom he was afterward led to his feet: and found the Solemnity.

The tender years of the King, being but eleven eleven years of age, required a Protecor: but being perhaps thought dangerous to commit that Authority to one only, who might rather seek to get it for himself, then to keep it for another, it was thought fit to commit it to many; and thereupon John Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Unklers, with some Lords and Bishops, were joined in some Commission to manage the State: and Guichard de Angouleme appeared to be his School-master. And now the Kings minority made foreign Princes conceive, that this would be a time of advantage for any that had quarrel to England: which the French and Scots took presently hold of. For, the French came now, and burnt the Town of Rye; and soon after, entering the Isle of Wight, burnt divers Towns there; and though they were repelled from the Caille by the valiant Sir Hugh Tyrrel Captain there, yet they constrained the men of the Isle to give them a thousand Marks, to spare the residue of their houses and goods: and departing thence, they set on Land where they saw advantage, burning fundry Towns near to the shore, as Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and then2 saying towards Dover, they burnt Hasting, assaulted Winceby; but being valiantly defended by the Admiral Basset, were forced to retire. But thereupon, they landed not far from the Abbey of Lewes, at a place called Rottington, where the Prior of Lewes, with Sir Thomas Chelney, and Sir John Fallely, encountering them, were overthrown and taken prisoners. And no less then the French were the Scots also now busie; for coming one morning by stealth, they won the Cattle of Berwick: but shortly after, upon knowledge thereof, they were driven out again by the Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham: and all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramley their Captain, put to the sword. About Michaelmas a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein Alice Pierce, the late Kings Concubine, was banished the Realm, and all her good confeciate and two Tenths of the Clergy, and two Fifteenths of the Temporality were granted: but, so that two Citizens of London, Williams Walworth, and John Philip, should receive and keep it, to see it bestowed for defence of the Realm. In this time, Sir Hugh Calverley, Deputy of Callicie, burnt six and twenty French Ships in the Haven of Bologne. And at the same time a great Navy set out, under the guiding of the Earl of Buckingham, the Duke of Britain, the Lord Lieutenant, Sir Robert Knollys, and others, with a purpose to intercept the Spanish Fleet: but through tempest was twice driven back. When in the mean time, one Mercer, a Scottish Pirate, came to Scarborough, took there divers Ships, and committed many out-rages: and no order being taken to repel him, a Citizen of London, named John Philips, at his own charges set forth a Fleet, and in his own person encountering them, took the said Mercer, and all his Ships: and returning home, instead of being rewarded for his service, he was called in question for presuming to raise a Navy without acting for the Kings Council: but he gave such reasons for that he had done, that not only he came off then with credit, but lives in reputation for it to this day. Indeed reasons of State, though they may be secretely cenured, yet they must not openly be controled; for this were to bring Authority into contempt, and instead of errors to bring in confusion: but yet when wrongs are offered that are publick, every particular person seems to have an interest in taking revenge; and though the king may be no manners to lay the States leasure, yet it can be no offence to do their work for them.

Many actions paffed at this time with the French and Scots, some prosperous, and some adverse. The Scots burn Rockwith, this was adverse; but the Earl of Northumberland entering Scotland with ten thousand men, spoileth the Lands of the Earl of March, the chief Incentury; this was prosperous: but when the Northern men would make a Road into Scotland, and were encountered by the Scots, and put to flight, this was adverse. Anon after Midsummer, the Duke of Lancaster, with the Earls of Buckingham, Warwick, St. John, and others of the Nobility, with a strong power took the Sea, and landing in Britain, belighted the Town of St. Maws, but finding strong opposition, is forced to raise his siege, and return adverse. And now again, the Scots by night entered secretly in the night of Berwick, and slew Sir Robert Bayton, thereupon the Town was Contable there; this was adverse. But when the Earl of Northumberland, being advertised thereof, came with a power, assaulted the Caille, and after two days defence recovered it again: this was prosperous. William Montague Earl of Salisbury, the Kings Lieutenant in Callicie forsooth the Country round about, and furnisht with boats of French Cutle. Sir Hugh Calverley, and Sir Thomas Piercy made Admirals, put to Sea, and take divers Ships laden with Merchandize, and one Ship of War: Sir John Harleston, Captain of Cheereburgh in France, illusing forth, assaults a Fortress of the French, which was the fore-house of their provision; and with much valour takes it: these were prosperous. But when Sir John Clerk lying in Garrison in a Castle in Britain, where lay many English Ships in the Haven, had thefe Ships set upon by the French; where though he threw incredible valour in the action, yet the Ships were taken, and himself slain: this was adverse. Also in the third year of this Kings Reign, Sir John Arundel, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Tho. Piercy, Sir William Elmbish, Sir Thomas Banister, and many other Knights went to Sea, with a purpose to pass over into Britain: but were to beaten back with Tempell, that divers of their Ships were cast away; and Sir John Arundel, Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Nicholas Trumbian, Sir Thomas Dale, and above a thousand others were all drowned; only Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Elmbish, and certain others escaped. It may not be imperative to note here the sumptuousness of those times; for this Sir John Arundel was then said in his Familiar to have two and fifty new suits of apparel of Cloth of Gold and Tiffine, all fast at Sea.

This year also the name of the King became so evident in having many governors of the King and Kingdom, it was by Parliament decreed. That the Lord Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, should should himself alone hold the place of Protector. About this time Sir John Armesley Knight accused Thomas Karrington Eliz; for betraying the Fortref of S. Savvin to the French: which Karrington denying, at the suit of Armesley, a solemn combat is permitted to be between them; at which combat the King and all the great Lords were present. The Esquire Karrington was a man of a mighty stature, the Knight Armesley a little man; yet through the justice of his cause, after a long fight, the Knight prevailed, and Karrington the day after the Combat dyed. Fabian Faith, he was drawn to Tyburn and there hanged for his false accusation. In the beginning of the fourth year of this King, Thomas of Woodock Earl of Buckingham, the Kings Unkle, with divers Earls and Lords, and an Army of seven or eight thousand, was sent into France, to aid the Duke of Brittain; but the King of France at that time dying, the Duke of Brittain grew to have peace with the new King: wherupon the Earl of Buckingham came home again, without doing much, but making of Knights, and forraging the Country. In this time the French and Spanish Gallies did much mischief on the Coast of England: they burnt Ry, Haslings, and Portsmouth; and at last entering the River of Thames, they came up to Greenwich, where they burnt most part of the Town, and taking many Prisoners and Booties returned into France.

At this time also, there fell out an Accident of great disturbance to the Realm, for the Commons rose in divers parts, beginning at Derbyford in Kent: and the cause of their rising grew (as was thought) through the rude behaviour of a Collector of the Poll-money, whose coming into the house of one John Tyler, and demanding Poll-money of his wife for a daughter of hers; and she saying that her daughter was not of age to pay, the rude fellow said he would presently see whether that were so or no, and thereupon forcibly turned up her Cloaths; whereat the Mother making an out-cry, her husband being at work hard by, and hearing the noise, came in with his Jaching-staff in his hand, with which he gave the Collector such a blow on the head, that his brains flew out, and he presently died. Upon this, at the complaint of Tyler amongst his neighbours, and with divers others, the Towns-people of Kent, taking occasion hereat to rip up the ground of this mis-government, and telling the people that this difference of mens Eftates, where some be Potentates, and some are Bond-men, was against Christian Liberty, taking for his Theme, When Adam delo'd and Eve span, who was then a Gentleman? He fo incensed them that the Commons, in divers parts drew together; and whether beginning in Kent, or otherwise in Essex, they drew at last into their Faction the Commons of Suffolk, Hertfordshire, Cambridgehire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and other Shires; and arreting all such as pulled, made them swear to be true to King Richard, and to the Commons, and never to receive any King that should be called John; which they did for the envy they bore to John Duke of Lancaster. Thus their number still increased, that by that time they were come so far as Blackheath, they were encouned to be a hundred thousand. The first thing they did when they came to London, was to send for one Richard Lion, a grave Citizen, who had been Tyler's Master, and his head he struck off, and carried it upon a pole in Triumph before them. The next day they came to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaster's house, where they forced fire, burning all his rich Furniture, breaking in pieces all Plate and Jewells, and throwing them into the Thames, saying, They were men of Justice, and would not like Robbers enrich themselves with any mans Goods: and when one of their fellows was eyed to thrust a fair silver piece into his bosom, they took him, and cast both him and the piece into the fire. Two and thirty of them were got into the Dukes Wine-Cellar, where they stayed drinking so long, till the rafters of the house on fire, fell upon them, and so covered them, that not able to get out, they were heard cry few days after, and then peri-

An Insurrec-

In Kent, and the whole.

They came to the Tower of London and abd the King's Mother.

They beheaded the Chancellor and the Treasurer.

The French burnt divers Towns in England pursuing on towards Northwoldham in Norfolk, where the Commons stayed for an answer from the King. By that time he came thither, where he had at first but eight Laurencies, and a small number of Archers in his company, his number was so increased, that it came to be complete Army; with which he set upon the Rebels, discomfited them, and took John Lister and their other Chieftains, whom he cauſed all to be exe‌cu‌ted: and by this means the Country was quieked. After this the Mayor of London sat in Judgement upon Offenders; where many were found culpable, and lost their heads; amongst others, Jack Sivam, John Kirke, Alan Trededer, and John Sterling, who gloried that he was the man had flain the Archbishop. Alto Sir Robert Treffiton Chief Justice was appointed to sit in Judgement against the Offenders; before whom above fifteen hundred were found guilty, and inunday places put to death: amongst others John Ball Priet, their Incendiary. Of whom it is not inproper to relate a Letter he wrote to the Rebells, rabble of Eftacy by which we may fee how fit an Orator be fay for fuch an Auditor; and what strength of persuasion there was in Non-fene. John Sheph St. Mary Priet of York, and now of Colcefler, greeteth well John Numfells, and John the Miller, and John Carter; and biddeth them that they beware of guile in Borough, and fland together in Gods names: and biddeth Piers Flomman go to his work, and chaffile all Hob the Robber, and take with you John Tremman, and all his fellows, and no moe. John the Miller ye ground small, small, small; the Kings Son of Heaven shall pay for all. Beware ye be wое: Know your friend from your foe: Have enough and say hoard: do well and better: Fleec him, and feck peace, and hold you therein: and so biddeth John Tremman and all his fellows.

Neither is it impopert to declare the Con‌fe‌tion of Jack Sivam at his Execution. When they brought them (as they did) upon Blackbeard, and had fent to the King to come to us: our purpoſe was to have flain all Knights and Gentlemen that should be about him: and for the King, we would have kept him amongst us: to the end the people might more boldly have repaired to us; and when we had gotten power: enough, we would have flain all Noblemen, and specially the Knights of the Robes and Lawly, we would have killed the King, and all men of poſſeions, with Bishops, Monks, Parfons of Churches, only Riffers Mendicakes we would have spared, for administration of the Sacra‌ments. Then we would have devis'd Laws according to which the people should have lived; for we would have created Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and others in other Countries; and the fame evening that Wat Tyler was killed we were determined to set fire in four corners of the City, and to have divided the spoil amongst us; and this was our purpose, as God may help: me now at my last end. For the service done in this feditious business, the King Knighted the Mayor Pull, Walworth, and gave him a hundred pounds a year in Fee. Also he Knighted five Aldermen his brethren, girding them about the wafte with the girdle of Knighthood, which was The manner of Graduating in those days: but as Stow saith, the manner of Knighting was rather thus: to cause him to put a Halbert on his head, and then the King with a Sword in both his hands, to strike him strongly on the neck. And so, doth it appear, the King at this time granted there should be a Dagger added to the Arms of the City; for till this time the City bore only the Crofs without the Dagger.

And now all parts being quiet, the King by Proclamation revoked and made void his former Charters of Infranchising the Bondmen of the Realm, and that they should stand in the same condition they were before. In the time of this fëdation, the Duke of Lancaster had been sent into Scotland, to keep the Scots quiet; who so carried the matter, that before the Scots heard of the Sedition, a Truce was concluded for two or three years. But the Duke coming back to Berwick, was denied by the Captain Sir Matthew Redman, to enter the Town, because of a Commandment given him by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the Marches, not to suffer any person to enter the same; which the King indeed had appointed to be done, forgetting the Duke of Lancaster that was then in Scotland: but howsoever, this bred such a spleen against the Earl, that as soon as he came home he laid many things to the Earl charge, and the Earl as obstinately answered his Objecions: and so far it proceeded, that both of them came to the Parliament which was then beginning, with great numbers of armed men, and themselves in Armour, to the great terror of the people: but the King wisely taking the matter into his own hands, made them friends. At which time the Lady Anne, Sifer to the Emperour Winchester, and affianced Wife to the King, was come to Callis; whereupon the Parliament was prorogued. The Lady was brought to London, joined in marriage to the King, and Crowned Queen at Westminster by the Archbishop of Canterbury with great solemnity. After the marriage, the Parliament began again: in which William Stafford Earl of Suffolk being chosen by the Knights of the Shires to deliver in behalf of the Commonwealth, certain matters concerning the same, the very day and hour in which he should have done the business, he was sent up the stairs towards the upper House, he suddenly fell down and dyed, having been merry and well before, to all mens judgements. About this time the Lord Scroop was depoited from the Chancellourship, for refusing to feal some Grants which the King had made; and the King receiving the Great Seal at his hands, kept it a certain time, and sealed with it such Grants and Writings as he pleased: till at length it was delivered to Robert Bridgwater Bishop of London, who was made Lord Chancellour.

Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich, had lately with the King's leave, raised an Army, and was gone into France in behalf of Pope Urban, against the Anti-Pope Clement; and entering into Flanders he took and sacked many Towns; at hit belièved Trier, till by an Army of French (greater then was thought could have been raised) he was forced to raise his siege; and then passing divers places, he came to Graveling, from whence he writ to King Richard, that if ever he meant to try Battel with the French, now was the time. The King was at that time at Dunbar in Northumberland: and being at supper when the word was brought him, he instantly rofe from the Table, got to Horseback, and rode in Poole with such speed, that he came to St. Albans about midnight, where making no stay, but while he borrowed the Abbots Griffing, he halted forth till he came to Westminster, as though he had meant never to ret till he had given Battel to the Frenchmen. But after he had taken counsel of his Pillow, his mind was altered, and he thought it better to employ some other, then to go himself: so the Duke of Lancaster is thought the fittest man: but he procrastinated the time so long in making preparation; that before he could be gone, the Bishop was come away. And this indeed is the condition of many, to spend so much time in preparing, that they utterly lofe all opportunity of acting; like to men that are putting on their cloaths too long, till it be time to put them off them. Shortly after a Truce was concluded between England and France, to endure till the Feast of St Michael, which should be in the year 1384.

Of All done after he came of Age.

The Scots in this mean time had made Roads into England, and taken and burnt divers Towns upon the Borders; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster, with his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, is sent with a mighty Army to reprefent them: but having entred Scotland, and not able to draw the Scots to a Battel, they only burnr certain Towns, and then returned.

About this time an English Fryer of the order of the Carmelites charged the Duke of Lancaster, with heinous crimes; as that he intended to destroy the King, and usurp the Crown: shewing the time, the place, and other circumstances of the whole Plot. But the Duke called to his answer, fo cleared himself; at least gave such colours of clearing, that the accuser was committed to the custody of John Holland the King's half-brother, till a day appointed for further Trial. The night before which day, the said Lord Scroop and Sir Henry Green are laid to have come to this Fryer, and pledging a cord about his neck, tyed the other end about his privy members; and after hanging him up from the ground, laid a stone upon his belly, with the weight whereof his very back-bone burst asunder: thereby putting him to a most tormenting death. An act not more inhumane then unavidi; for though it took away the Accusser, yet it made the Accusation more fuppicious.

At this time, though a Truce had been made with the Scots, yet they would not be quiet; but entered and won the Cabtle of Berwick, whereof the Earl of Northumberland was Captain, but the King had committed the keeping of it to another: for which being blamed, he went not against them with an Army, but took an easier course, for with the fun of two thousand Marks he bought them out, and had the Castle surrendered into his hands again. The King upon some new Insolence, being now incensed against the Duke of Lancaster, had a purpose to have him arrested.
This year also King Richard holding his Christmas at Ely. came to his christening, who, in fear to have his Kingdom conquered by the Turks, was come into Christendom to seek for aid; but his chief errand into England was to have procured a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; but their spleens were so great against one another, that it was not in the power of his Physick to cure them.

At this time the Duke of Lancaster, taking with him his Wife the Lady Constance, and a daughter by him named Katherine, and two other Daughters which he had by his former Wife, failed into Spain. He was ascended in his journey with the Lord Lucy, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-Water, Pagings, Brafden, and many other Lords and Knights, to the number of fifteen hundred men of Arms, whereof a thousand at least were King's and Equites. The King at his taking leave gave him a Crown of Gold, and commanded he should be called King of Spain: and the Queen likewise gave another Crown of Gold to the Duchess. He landed first at Trafalgar, and freed that Castle from the French. From thence he proceeded, and arrived at the Camp in Spain, where he remained a month; and then went to Camelhelle, where he stayed a while: In which time his Contable Sir John Holland won divers Towns, at Castufon, the King of Portugal and the Duke of Lancaster met; where a marriage was concluded between the said King of Portugal, and the Lady Philip Daughter to the Duke; which marriage shortly after was consummated, and the Lady went into Portugal honourably accompanied. The Duke continued at Camelhelle all the Winter. At March the King of Portugal and he entered the Confin of Castile, where they took many Towns; and passing over the River of Doure, entered into the Country Del Campo; but the Spaniards not willing to come to a Battel, but meaning to wear them out with delays; the English not used to such hot air, fell daily into many Difeases, which the Duke seeing, accorded to a Truce. There died in this action, the Lord Fitz Water, Sir Richard Henry, should marry the Lady Katherine, the Duke of Lancaster's Daughter, and be intituled Prince of Auvergnes: in consideration of this this marriage, and that all claims should cease, which the Duke in right of his Wife might challenge or pretend. It was agreed, that the said Duke should receive yearly the sum of ten thousand Marks, during the lives of him and his Dutchess: and to have in hand the sum of two hundred thousand Nobles.

At this time, the French had a purpose to invade England, with no less a hope then to make a Conquest; and to that end, they prepared a mighty Navy: so in the month of September, there were number about Stin, Dam, and Blankerje, 1387. Ships, besides those which were rigged in Britain by the Confiable, who had caused an Inlosure of a Field to be made of Timber, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith inclose their Field, and so lodge at more security. But it so fortuned that the Lord William Beauchamp, Captain of Cal- lifier, took two of their Ships, whereof one was laden with a piece of the said Inlosure; and after that, another Ship laden with Guns, Gun-powder, and other Instruments of War; and after that again, two Ships more, laden with parcels of the said Inclosure, which King Richard caufed to be reared and set up about Winchelsey Town. At last the forefaid Army came into Flanders, and arrived at Ghent, where, after some halting, they were so disfitted for Virtuils, that in the end of November they were glad to be gone, and return into France.

At this time, in a Parliament, Robert Pere Earl of Oxford, and Marques of Dublin, was created Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Pole a Merchants Son, had lately before been created Earl of Suffolk, and made Chancellour of England. And now begins King Richard to enter, I may say upon the Confines of his Dethit. His grazing of underving men, and disgracing of men deferving, if they were not the caufes, they were at least the occasions of his own disgracing, and destruction in the end. He was now come to full age to do all himself, which was indeed to be of fullage to undi- himself; for the faults of his younger years might have the excuse to be but errors; but the faults of the age he was now at, were peremptory against him, and admitted no defence. And to halten the pace of his destruction, he ill counfel which he before saw but whisper'd in his ear, was now farce forborn to be given him aloud. It is told him that he is under tuition no longer, and therefore not to be controol'd, as in former times he had been; That to be croft of his will by his Subjects, was to be their Subject. It is no Sovereignty, if it be not absolute. At the inclination of which Counfel, the King in a Parliament now assembled, fell to exfozulare with his Lords, asking them what years they thought him to be of? who answering, that he was somewhat more then one and twenty; Well then (said he) I am out of your Wardship, and therefore look to enjoy my Kingdom as freely as your selves at the like years enjoy your Patri- moneies. But his flattering Favourites should have remembered, that though the King may not be controol'd, where he can command; yet he may be opposed where he can defend, as now indeed he was: for when he came to demand a Subsidy towards his Wars, he was un-there were three of the New Officers named: as the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Lord Treasurer, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal: The other ten were, William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund of Langley Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scrope, and John Lord Devon. But this participation of the Government being found inconvenient, held not long. Allô in this Parliament it was granted that Robert de Vere, lately before created Duke of Ireland, should have and receive to his own use 30000. Marks which the French men were to give for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Binary; but it was granted upon this condition, That before the next Easter he should pass over into Ireland, to recover such Lands as the King had there given him: so dolorous the Lords and Commons were to have him removed from the Kings presence. But though the King gave way to this torrent of the Parliament for the present, yet soon as the Parliament was dissolved, he dissolved also all that had been done, either against the Lord Chancellour, or against the Duke of Ireland, or against Alexander Nevil, Archbishop of York, and received them into more favour than ever he had done before.

In his tenth year, about the beginning of March, Richard Earl of Arundel, appointed Admiral, and Thomas Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Devonshire, and the Bishop of Norwich, went to Sea, with a warlike power of men and Arms, to watch for the Fleece, that was ready to come from Rochell with Wines, and meeting with them, they set upon them, and took of them to the number of a hundred Vessels, all fraught with Wines: so as Wine grew so plentiful, that it was sold for thirteen shillings four pence the Tun; and the bale and choice for twenty shillings. Besides this, they landed in Flanders, where they relieved and fortified Bruges, and demolished two Forts which the Enemy had built against it. But this happy service of the Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Scarry, who continued still about the King, feemed rather to enve then to command; inofmuch that when the Earl of Northumberland, that had ever been the play-fellow, and of equal age to him, came to the Court, he was neither received by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome, nor by the King with any good countenance: and therefore indeed, not by the King with any good countenance, because not by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome.

About this time the Duke of Ireland thought to be divorced from his lawful Wife, Daughter to the Lady Isabel, one of King Edward the third's Daughters; and took to Wife one Lancreone, a Vintners Daughter of Bohemia, one of the Queens Maids: at which indignity, the Duke of Gloucester, that was Unle to the Lady thus forsaken, took great displeasure; which the Duke of Ireland understanding, studied how by some means he might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester out of the way. Easter was now past, the time appointed for the Duke of Ireland's going over into Ireland; when the King with a shew to bring him to the waters side, went with him into Wathes: and in his company Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Robert Tristian, Lord Chief Justice, and divers others; who there confulted how they might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Arundel, Warington, Dr. By, Northampton, with divers others of that Faction. But when the King had remained in those parts a good while, he returned, and brought back the Duke of Ireland with him; and so his Voyage into Ireland was clean forgotten. About the same time Robert Tristian, Chief Justice, came to Coventry, where he indited two thousand perons. The King and the Queen came to Groby; and thither came by his Commandement, the Justices of the Realm, Robert Beknap Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, John Hoth, Roger Fulfiorpe, and Wiliam Borough, Knights: to whom it was propounded, to answer to these Questions following:

Firstly, Whether the new Statute and Commission made in the late Parliament, were against the Kings Prerogative, or no? To which they all answered, It was.

Secondly, How they ought to be punished, that procured the said Statute and Commission to be made? They answered with one accent, that they deserved death, except the King would pardon them.

Thirdly, How they ought to be punished, who moved the King to consent to the making of the said Statute and Commission? They answered they ought to lose their lives, unless the King would pardon them.

Fourthly, How they ought to be punished, that compelled the King to the making of that Statute? They answered, they ought to suffer as Traitors.

Fifthly, Whether the King might cause the Parliament to proceed upon Articles by him imprinted, before they proceeded to any other? They answered, That in this the King should over-rule, and if any presumed to do contrary, he was to be punished as a Traitor.

Sixthly, Whether the King might not at his pleasure dissolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart? They all answered, He might.

Sevently, Whether the Lords and Commons might, without the Kings will, impeach Officers and Justices, upon their Offences, in Parliament, or no? It was answered, They might not; and he that attempted contrary, was to suffer as a Traitor.

Eighthly, How he is to be punished, who moved in the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward the Second was Indicted in Parliament, might be kept for; by Inspection of which Statute, the present Statute was devised? It was answered, That as well he that moved it, as he that brought the Statute into the House, were to be punished as Traitors.

Ninthly, Whether the Judgment given in Parliament against Michael de la Pool were erroneous and revocable? They answered, It was erroneous and revocable: and that if the Judge-Judgement were now to be given, the Justices would not give the same.

In witnesses of the Premises, the Justices aforesaid, to these Presents have set their Seals; in the presence of Alexander Archbishop of York, Robert Archbishop of Dublin, John Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of Chester, John Bishop of Banger, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earl of Suffolke, John Ripon Clerk, and John Black.

At this time the Londoners incurred much obloquy; for, having before been pardoned by the King of some crimes to which their charge, they were now ready to comply with the King in his desires: and thereupon being impanneld, they indicted some Lords of many crimes informed against them. But not only the Justices aforesaid, but all other Justices and Sheriffs of the Realm were called at this time to Nolle prosequi: the chief cause was, to understand what power of men they could allure the King of, to serve him against the Lords; and further, that whereas he meant shortly to call a Parliament, they should so use the matter, that no Knight or Serge of arms should be chosen, but such as the King and his Council should name. To which the Sheriff made answer, that it lay not in their power to assent any forces against the Lords, who were so well beloved: and as for choosing Knights and Serge, the Commons would undoubtedly look to enjoy their ancient liberties, and could not be hindered.

But yet the King and the Duke of Ireland sent into all parts of the Realm, to raise men in this quarrel against the Lords; whereof the Duke of Gloucester being advertised, he came secretly to conference with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby: who upon consultation determined to talk with the Kings, with their Forces about them, and the King on the other part, took advice how he should pretend them apart; and thereupon sent the Earl of Northumberland, and others, to the Castle of Rye, to take the Earl of Arundel, who lay there at that time; but howsoever it fortune, they failed of their purpose. After this he sent others to apprehend him: but he being warned by a Meflenger from the Duke of Gloucester, conveyed himself away by night; and by morning was come to Haringay Park, where he found the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earl of Warwick with a great power of men about them. The King hearing of this Assembly at Haringay Park, called his Council, to hear their opinion what was fit to be done. Some were of opinion, that the King should assemble his friends, and joyning them with the Londoners, give them Battel; the chiefest of this minde was the Archbishop of York. Others thought bett, the King should seek to appease the Lords with fair promises, till a fitter opportunity to suppress them. But the King not yet resolved what course to take, caufed only order to be taken that no Citizen of London should fettle to the Duke of Gloucefter, the Earl of Arundel, or to any other of the Lords, any Armour or furniture of War, under a great pain. But for all this the Lords proceeded in their course and fent the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord John Lovel, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Devereux, requiring to have delivered to them such as were about the King, that were Traitors and Seducers both of him and the Realm: and further to declare, that their assembling was for the honour and wealth both of him and the Kingdom. The Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolke, and two or three other about the King, persuaded him to offer Calles to the King of France, to have his alliance against the Lords. Wthal, the King sent to the Mayor of London, requiring to know how many able men the City could make? To which the Mayor answered, that he thought it could make fifty thousand men at an hours warning. Well then (said the King) go and prove what will be done. But when the Mayor went about it, he was answered, They would not fight against the Kings friends, and defenders of the Realm. At the same time the Earl of Northumberland laid his forces before the City, and the King, so doubt but the Lords have always been, and still are, false and faithful Subjects, though now distemder by certain persons about you, that seek to oppreft them; therefore my advice is, that you tend to them, to come before your presence in any publike place: and I verily believe they will fiew such reasons of their doings, that you will hold them excused. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellour, and other of the Bishops there present, approved all of the Earls advice; whereupon the King sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely to the Lords, requiring them to come to him to Westminster, on Sunday then next following: which upon oath given by the Archbishop and the Chancellour, that no fraud nor evil practice should be used against them, they were content to do. But when the Lords were ready to come at the day appointed, the Kings lords of an Ambush lay to entrap them the Mews, and thereupon they layed, so as they came not at the time appointed: Whereupon the King asking why they came not according to their promise? It was answered, Because he kept not his promise: there being an Ambush of a thousand armed men laid to surprize them at the Mews. The King hearing this, was astonied, and swore he knew of no such thing, and commanded presently the place should be searched: but it was true, an Ambush was laid; but not at the Mews, but in a place about Westminster, where Sir Thomas Tryset, and Sir Nicholas Brember had assembled them. This one action might have made the King fensible of his favours abuting his Authority; but that where affectation makes the conformation, all things are taken in a good fense. Or was it perhaps they had a Warrant Dormant, to prosecute the Kings lords without the Kings knowledge? Yet the Lords after this, receiving a fale condud from the King, came to Westminster; of whom coming when the King heard, he appreihed himfelf in his Royal Robes, and with his Sceptre in his hand, came into the great Hall, before whom, the Lords upon their knees presented themselves, the King bidding them welcome, and taking each of them by the hand. Then the Lord

What prov'd the City could make upon a sudden?
Lord Chancellor making a speech wherein he blamed them for railing of Arms and requiring to know the cause; they answered, they had done it for the good of the King and Kingdom, and to take away the Traitors about the King. Upon this the King himself spake, asking them whether they thought to compel him by strong hand. Hereupon (faintly) he suffered best you down? truly in this behalf I make no more account of you then of the basest skalation in my Kitchin. Yet after these great words he lift up the Duke of Gloucester who all this while was kneeling, and commanded the rest also to rise; and then led them courteously to his Chamber, where they fast and drank together: And finally it was concluded they should all meet again, as well these Lords, as those they acced at the next Parliament; which the King promised to call speedily, and each party to receive there according to Justice, and in the mean time all parties to be in the Kings protection. But when the Favourite-Lords heard this, they told the King plainly, they neither durst nor would put themselves to the hazard of such a meeting; and therefore the Duke of Ireland, and the rest of that faction left the Court to be out of the way: But the King not enduring their absence, appointed Thomas Malineck, Comtabel of the Castle of Cheffer, to raise an Army, and to cease-codct the Duke of Ireland to him. But they being come as far as Radcoast-Bridge, were encountered by the Earl of Derby; and the Duke of Ireland not daring to joynt Battel with him, fled, and being to pass a River, cast away his Gentlers and Sword (to be the more nimble) and giving his horse the spur, leapt into the River, and so escaped: but when these things were afterward found, it was verily thought that he had been drowned, till news came he was got into Holland; where being no very welcome guest, he went from thence into the Bishoprick of Yorwich, and after two or three years scambling about in manner of a fugitive, at Luton in Brabant he ended his life. A man of many good parts, and worthy enough of his Princes favour, if with that favour he had not so often concerned himself with such serious and influring over others no less deferving then himself. He was valiant enough against any man but the Earl of Derby, and of him indeed both the Genius of the Duke of Ireland, and of King Richard himself seemed to stand in fear; for neither of them durst meet him in the field, though encouraged to it by those about them. About this time the Duke of Suffolk doubting some plots laid to forripze him, fled over to Callic in disguise, shaving his beard, and counterfeiting himself a Poultier, to fell certain fowl which he had gotten; but being come to Callic, was by the Lord William Beauchamp, Deputy of the Town, sent back into England: whom the King notwithstanding permitted to go at large, to make it be thought he was more afraid then hurt, more fupicious then he needed. By this time the Lords had gotten master enough against the King, at least tojustify their Arts; and thereupon with an Army they forthwith went, and came to London, where after some debate, they were received: and then the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Derby and Nayingham, went to the King in the Tower. To whom, after humble submissions, they shewed the Letter which he had written to the Duke of Ireland, to levy an Army for their destruction: likewise the Letters which the French King had written to him, containing a false conduct for him to come into France, there to do acts to his own dishonour and the Kingdom.

This done, upon the Kings promise that he would come the next day to Westminster to treat further of these matters, the Lords departed; only the Earls of Navingham and Derby, at the Kings instance, stayed all night: but before the King went to bed, his mind was clean altered for keeping his promise to meet the Lords the next day at Westminster: which the Lords understanding, they sent peremptorily to him, that if he came not according to his promise, they would choose another King, that should hearken to the faithful counsel of his Lords. This touched the King so to the quick, that the next morning he went and met the Lords; who there declared to him, how much it concerned the good of the Kingdom, that those Traitors so often spoken of, should be removed from the Court. To which the King, though much against his will, yet at last consented and presently Alexander Nevil Archibishop of York, and Thomas Rake, Bishop of Chichester, and Confessor to the King, were expelled the Court; who not willing to come to after-reckonings fled no man knew whether. They expelled also John Fordham, Bishop of Durham, Lord Treasurer; the Lord-Zouch of Haringworth, the Lord Burrell, the Lord Beaumont, Albrey de Vere, Baldwin de Berford, Richard Alderbury, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Leylo, Knights: but constrained to put in sureties to appear at the next Parliament. Also certain Ladies were expelled the Court; as the Lady Poynings, the Lady Moulting, and others, bound to appear at the next Parliament. There were also arrested and committed to several Prisons, Sir Simon Burley, William Elingham, John Beauchamp, Steward of the Kings House, Sir John Salibury, Sir Thomas Tivoler, Sir James Brey, Sir Nicholas Dignarous, and Sir Nicholas Bremer, Knights. Also Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, Richard Misford, the Kings Chaplains: Nicholas Selby, Dean of the Kings Chapl, and John Block; a Lawyer.

Shortly after the Parliament began, (called afterward, the Parliament that wrought wonders.) On the first day whereof, were arrested as they fate in their places, all the Judices (but only Sir William Shipps) as Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Sir Robert Bellkappe, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brook, and John Altton, the Kings Serjeant at Law; and were all sent to the Tower for doing contrary to an Agreement made the last Parliament. Also in the beginning of this Parliament, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevil Archibishop of York, Michael de la Pule, Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Tristhan Lord Chief Justice of England, were openly called to answer Thomas de Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earl of Arundell, Henry Earl of Derby, and Thomas Earl of Navingham, upon certain Articles of High Treason: and because none of them appeared, it was ordained by whole consent of the Parliam of Parliament, that they should be banished for ever, and all their Lands and Goods feized into the Kings hands (their innsed Lands only excepted.) Shortly after the Lord Chief Justice Rivers Trespass, was found in an Apostolical Office in Westminster: where being taken, he was brought to the Duke of Gloucester, who caufed him the same day to be had to the Tower, and from thence drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged. On the morrow after Sir Nicholas Brember was brought to his arraif, who being found guilty, was beheaded with an Axe which himself had caufed to be made for beheading of others. After this Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Barneys, lofty young men, were drawn and hanged; as also Sir John Beauchamp, Lord Steward of the Kings Houfe, John Blake, Esquire; and lastly, Sir Simon Barley, Son to the great Sir John Barley, Knight of the Garter, was beheaded on Tower-Hill: whose death the King took more heavily and more hainously then all the reft. All the Justices were condemned to dye; but by the Queens interceffion they were only banifhed the Realm, and all their Lands and Goods confiscate, only a fmall portion of money was affigned them for their fue: and finally in the next Parliament an Oath was required and obtained of the Kings, that they fhould fill unto, and abide fuch rule and order as the Lords fhould take: and this Oath was required alfo of all the inhabitants of the Realm.

In the latter end of the Kings eleventh year, the Earl of Arundel was fent to Sea, with a great Navy of Ships and Men of War: with whom went the Earls of Nottingham and Devonshire, Sir Thomas Piery, the Lord Clifford, the Lord campus, Sir William Elbarn, and divers other Knights, to aid the Duke of Britain against the King of France: but before they came, the Duke of Britain was reconciled to the King of France; and fo needing nor their aid, all this great Fleet returned with doing nothing. And it was indeed a year of doing nothing, unlefs we reckon fome petty Irrods of the Sea: and that Sir Thomas Tryer died with a fall off his Scape, and Master John Holland, the Kings Brother by the Mother, was made Earl of Huntingdon, and there was contention in Oxford between the Northern and the Southern Scholars, which was pacified by the Duke of Gloucester.

In his twelfth year, Commissioners were appointed to meet at Balingham, betwixt Calais and Boulogne, to treat of a Peace between the Realms of England, France, and Scotland: and after long debating, a Truce was at laft conclufed, to begin at Midsummer next, and to last three years. But now the King to fhew his plenary Authority of being at full age, removed the Archbifhop of York from being Lord Chancellor, and put in his place William Wickham, Bishop of Winchester; also he removed the Bishop of Hereford from being Treasurer, and put another in his place: The Earl of Arundel likewife unto whom the Government of the Parliament was committet, and the Authority of the Sea, was removed, and the Earl of Huntingdon put in his room.

About this time the Lord John Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, as he was paffing to learn to fight, was ftrenthen about the privy parts, by a Knight called Sir John St John; of which he foon after died. In whose family, it is memorable, that for many generations together, no Son ever saw his Father wrath the Pawn. The Original of this Family was from Husings the Dane, who in the Reign of King Alured, long before the Conquest, about the year 890, came with Rolf into England. But however, in this John Husings ended the then honourable Titles of the Husings: for this man dying without issue, his Inheritances were difpersed to divers persons.

The honour of Pembroke came to Francis at Comer, by the Kings gift: the Barones of Husings and Welford came to Reynold Gray of Rutland; the Baron of Abergavenny was granted to William Beauchamp of Bedford.

About this time John Duke of Lancaster was created Duke of Aquitaine, receiving at the Kings hands the Rod and the Cap, as investitures of that Dutche. Also the Duke of Yorks Son and Heir was created Earl of Richmond.

In his thirteenth year a Royal Juft was pro- claimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on Sunday next after the Feast of St. Thomas the Martyr, which being published, only in England, but in Scotland, in Altnam, in Flanders, in Brabant, and in France, many strangers came hither; amongst others Victor an Earl of S. Poll, that had married King Richardis Sister; and William the young Earl of Observants, Son to Albert de Bevertre Earl of Holland and Heinault. At the day appointed there issued forth of the Tower, about three a clock in the afternoon, fifteen Couriers apparelled for the Juft; and upon every one an Esquire of honour, riding a foft pace: After them came forth four and thirty Ladies of Honour, (Freiflafford threfcore) mounted on Palfries, and every Lady bed a Knight with a Chain of Gold. These Knights being on the Kings part, had their Armour and Apparel garnifhed with white Harts, and Crowns of Gold about their necks; and fo they came riding through the streets of London unto Smithfield. The Juft laded divers days, fanatic faith, four and twentie miles, it being the King and Queen lay at the Bishops Palace of Pauls Church, and kept open house for all comers.

In his fifteenth year the Duke of Lancaster went into France, having in his train a thousand horse; and met the King of France at Antwerp, to treat of a peace between the two Kingdoms; but after long debate, a Truce only was concluded for a year.

About this time the King required the Lon- doners to lend him a thousand pounds: which they refused to do; and not only fo, but they abu- ded an Italian Merchant, for of fer to lend it. This moved the King to fome indignation: to which was added the complaint of a Riot committed by the Citizens, against the Servants of the Bishop of Salisburn Loyd Treafurer; for that where one of the Bishops Servants, named Walter Rom, had taken a horfe-loaf out of a Bakers Basket as he paffed in the street, and put it into his Lords houfe; the Citizens thereupon af- faulted the house, and would not be quiered; till the Mayor and Aldermen were fain to come, and with much ado appeased them. hereof, urged against the Citizens, by the Bishop of Salisbury, Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellor, the Mayor and Aldermen, and divers other substantial Citizens are arrested; the Mayor is committed to the Castle of Windsor, and the Warders are ordered to other Catteries; the little Citizens of the City are sorted into the Kings hands, and the authority of the Mayor utterly ceased, the King appointing a Warden to govern the City, first Sir Edmond Dolignag, and afterward Sir Baldwin Radington: till at length, by the special suit of the Duke of Gloucester, the King was contented to come to London, to do great joy of the Citizens, that they received him with four hundred on horse-back, clad all in one Livery, and presented the King and Queen with many rich gifts; yet all gave not satisfaction, to have their liberties restored, till they afterwards paid ten thousand pounds. This it is to provoke a Loll. It may be fortune enough to us, if by any means we can but keep him quiet; for if once we provoke him to lay his paw upon us, it will be hard getting from him, and not be torn in pieces.

In his sixteenth year, the Duke of Lancaster and Gloucester were once again sent into France, to treat of a peace; but without agreeing with the French Commissioners upon Articles propounded, there was only a Truce concluded for four years; though perhaps a further agreement had then been made, but that the King of France fell newly again into his old fit of Frenie, which called away the French Commissioners from further Treaty.

In his eighteenth year, a Proclamation was set forth, That all Irish men should avoid this Realm, and return home. The occasion was, because so many Irish were come over, that Ireland in a manner was left unpeopled: insomuch, that where King Edward the third had received from thence yearly the sum of thirty thousand pounds, the King now laid forth so much to repel Rebels. Whereupon at Michaelmas King Richard went himself into Ireland, attended with the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of March, Nottingham, and Rutland, the Lord Thomas Beaumont, and Earle of Chester, together with the English Nobility; to whom came in the great Oweal of King of Athol, Bryan of Thomond King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur a King of Limerick, and Conbor King of Clevery and Dorpe: and these King Richard stayed all that Winter, and after Christmas called a Parliament. At which time also the Duke of York, Lord Warden of England, in the Kings name called a Parliament at Westminster; to which was sent forth of Ireland the Duke of Gloucester, that he might declare to the Commons the Kings great occasion for supply of money: whole words so far prevailed, that a whole tent was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteeneth by the Livery.

In his twentieth year was a famous Enterview between the two Kings of England and France, where was set up for King Richard a rich Pavillion a little beyond Gravesend, within the English pale; and another like the French King on this side Argy. The Distance between the two Tents was better on either side with Knights armed with their swords in their hands, four hundred English on one side, and four hundred French on the other. The two Kings before their meeting took a solemn oath for assurance of their faithful and true meaning, to observe the sacred laws of amity one toward another, in this enterview. After the two Kings were come together, it was accorded, that in the same place where they met, there should be builded at both their costs a Chappel for a perpetual memory, which should be called, the Chappel of our Lady of Peace. On Simon and Juse's day, the Kings talked together of Articles concerning the Peace; and having concluded them, they received either of them an Oath, upon the holy Evangelists, to observe and keep them. This done, the French King brought his Daughter Isabel, and delivered her to King Richard, who shortly after at Calais married her; and upon the 17 of January following, she was Crowned Queen at Westminster. A match of great honour, but of little convenience, and less profit; for the lady being but the age of year, there could be no hope of issue for a long time, which was King Richard's greatest want; and as little supply of his wants otherwise, her portion perhaps scarce paying the charges of his journey thither; which cost him three hundred thousand Marks.

The Duke of Lancaster, in the thirteenth year of King Richard's reign, had been created Duke of Aquitaine; but when the Gascoigners would not receive him, shewing reasons why that Duke'sdom ought not to be separated from the Crown of England, his Grant was revoked, and so it remained still in Deene of the Crown.

At this time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancaster caufed to be legitimatized, the issue he had by Katherine Swinford, before he married her, of whom Thomas Beaumont was created Earl of Somerset.

This year also, the King receiving the money back, which had been lent to the Duke of Brittany, upon Breff delivery up the Town into him: and thereafter, the English bodiers that were there in Garrison, were all discharged and sent homewards, who, at a Peacel which the King kept at Westminster, coming in companies together into the Hall, as soon as the King had dined, and was entering into his Chamber, the Duke of Gloucester asked him, if he did mark those men that stood in such troops in the Hall: yes marry (said the King) who were they? They were (said the Duke) those Souldiers, who by your rending up of Breff have been fent home, and now muft either flare or fight: and therewith-all, very unadvisedly in words, taxed the King with unadvisedness of his deed. To whom the King in great anger replied, Why Unkle, do you think me either a Merchant, or a Fool, to tell my land? By S. John Baptist, No: But could I refuse to render the Town, when tender was made upon the money lent upon it? Indeed nothing could more discover the Duke of Gloucester's either weakness if he knew not that Breff was but only a mortgage; or injustice, if knowing it, he would have had the King, though the money were tendred, to have kept it still; but such is the course of many, to take part with the Politicks against the Ethicks; work their ends by doing unjustly, when doing justly. ought to be their chiefest end. However it was, the multiplying of words about this matter, kindled in the King such a displeasure against the Duke, that it could not afterwards be quenched, but by his own. And first he complained to his other two Unkles, the Dukes of Lancaster and York, of his injurious behaviour towards him; who told the King, their Brother's words might be fallome unadvised words, but they knew his heart to be true and faithful. Yet doubting how far the King might press upon them to answer for their brothers' faithfulness, they retired from Court: which gave the Dukes enemies time to incense the King further against him.

It happened that the Duke of Gloucester had with him one day at his house, the Abbot of S. Albans that was his Godfather, and the Prior of Welfminster; and after dinner falling in talk with them, amongst other communications the Duke required the Prior to tell truth, whether he had any Vision the night before? To which the Prior was loth at first to make a direct Answer; but at last, being earnestly requested, as well by the Abbot as the Duke, he confessed that he had a Vision indeed, which was, that the Realm of England should be destroyed through the misgovernment of King Richard. By the Virgin Mary (said the Abbot) I had the very figure of the King, and an execrable premiss of his heart, discolored to them all the secrets of his mind; and by their devices contrived an Assembly of divers great Lords of the Realm, to meet at Arundel Castle that day fortnight: at which time he appointed to be there himself, with the Earls of Derby, Arundel, Marchall, and Warwick; the Abbot of St. Alban, the Prior of Welfminster, with divers others. And accordingly all these met at Arundel Castle, at the day appointed; where receiving first the Sacrament, by the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be affialert each to other, in all such matters as they should determine, They resolved to feifie upon King Richard, and upon the Dukes of Lancaster and York, and commit them to Prison: and all the other Lords of the Kings Council, they determined should be drawn and hanged. But the Earl Marshal, that was Deputy of Callice, was never married. The Duke of Arundel's daughter, discovered all their counsel to the King; who thereupon, by a plot devised by his Counsell, took his Brother the Earl of Huntingdon with him: and rising from supper, rode that night to the Duke of Gloucester's house at Plafley in Essex. When the King came thither, the Duke was a-bed; but informed of it, cast his Cloak about his shoulders, and came down, bidding the Kings grace, with all reverence, welcome. The King courteously requested him to go and make himself ready, for that he must needs ride with him a little way, to confer of some busines. The Duke prefently made him ready and came down; and as soon as the King and his company was gone a little way from the house, and the Duke with him, the Earl Marshal arrested the Duke, as he had been appointed to do by the King, who immediately was sent to Callice; where after some time he was dispatched of his life, either strangled, or else smothered with Pillows, as some write. At the very same time was the Earl of Arundel apprehended by the Earls of Rutland and Kent: the Earl of Warwick also, when the King had invited him to dinner, and showed him very good countenance, was taken and arrested in the place: as likewise at the same time were apprehended, and committed to the Tower, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheyney. Shortly after, the King procured them to be indicted at Nottingham, forbidding such as should appeal them in Parliament; namely Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marishal, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Beaumont Earl of Somerfet, John Mowbray Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer, and the Lord William Scrope. Lord Chamberlain: and in the mean time, the King sent for a power of Chriftire men, to keep Watch and Ward about his Perfon.

On the 17. of September, a Parliament began at Welfminster; wherein the King complained as well of many things done by the Lords in his Minority, as also of the hard dealing which they had used towards the Queen, who was three hours at one time on her knees, before the Earl of Arundel, for one of her Esquires, named John Calverley, who neverthelesse had his head mitten from them; and which was a thing condemned by all the other. The King would have his Maries, his wife and your Husband, and let this suit alone. Those that set forth the Kings grievances in this Parliament, were John Bultie, William Bega, and Thomas Green. The cause of assembling the Parliament was shewed, That the King had called it for reformation of divers tranfigresions against the peace of this Land, by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and others. Then Sir John Bultie, Speaker of the Parliament, made request on behalf of the Commonalty, that they might be punished according to their deservers: and specially the Archbishop of Canterbury, who then sat next the King, whom he accused of high Treson. When the Archbishop began to answer, Sir John Bulthe besought the King, That he might not be admitted to answer, left by his great wit and cunning he might lead men away to believe him. And here Sir John Bultie in his talk did not contribute to the King titles of honour due and accustomed, but such as were fitter for the Majesty of God than for any earthly Prince. And when the Archbishop was constrained to keep silence, Sir John Bulthe proceeded; requiring on the behalf of the Commons, That the Charters of Pardon, granted to the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, should be revoked. The King for his part protested that they were drawn from him by compulsion; and therefore besought them to deliver their own opinions, what they thought thereof. Whereupon, the Bishops first gave their sentence, that the said Pardons were revokable, and might be called in; but pretending a scrupulosity, as if they might not with safe confidence be present, when judgment of blood should pass, they appointed a Lay-man to be their Prolocutor for that turn. The Temporals, Lords like wise gave their sentence, That the Pardons were revokable: only the Judges and Lawyers.Sir John Bultie Speaker of the Parliament, attributes diverse titles to the King.

The Lords, spiritual and Temporal, give their opinions on every way, and the Judges and Lawyers another.
Lawyers were not of this opinion. But how-forever the Archbishops of Canterbury is hereupon condemned to perpetual Exile, and appointed to avoid the Realm within six weeks.
Also the Earl of Arundel is by the Duke of Lancaster, who fate that day as High Steward, condemned of Treson, and on the Tower-hill beheaded. There went to see the execution, divers Lords, amongst whom was the Earl of Nottingham, that had married his Daughter, and the Earl of Kent, that was his Daughters Son: to whom, at the place of his execution he said, Truly it would have beheaded you rather to be abfen; then here at this busines; but the time will come ere long, that as many shall marvel at your misfortune, as they do now at mine. After his death, a fame went, that his head was grown to his body again: whereupon, the tenth day after his burial, his body by the Kings appointment was taken up, and then found to be a Fable. After this, the Lord Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was brought forth, and charged with the like Treson; but by the intercession of the Duke of Lancaster and other Lords, after confession of his fault, was only confin'd into the Isle of Ely. Likewise the Lord Cobham, and Sir John Cheney were only banished; or (as Faith faction) condemned to perpetual Prison. The Parliament after this was held at Exeter, where the Earl of Chester the King bore to the Gentlemen and Commons of the Shire of Chester, he caused it to be Ordained, that from thenceforth it should be called and known by the name of the Principality of Chester; and herewith intituled himself Prince of Chester. At this Parliament also, called the Great Parliament, he created five Dukes, and a Duchess; one Marquefs, and four Earls. The Earl of Derby was created Duke of Hertford; the Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; the Earl of Rutland Duke of Albmarle; the Earl of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earl of Huntingdon, Duke of Exeter; and the Lady Margaret Marfhal Countefs of Norfolk, was created Duchefs of Norfolk; the Earl of Somerset was created Marquefs of Dorset; the Lord Spencer was made Earl of Cleefer; the Lord Nevil, Earl of Wolferland; the Lord Scrap, Earl of Wiltshire; and the Lord Thomas Prince Lord Steward of the King's house, was made Earl of Waretile; and for the better maintenance of their efface, he divided amongst them great part of those lands that belonged to the Duke of Cleefer, the Earl of Arundel and Warwick. Also in this Parliament, the Judges gave their opinions, That when Articles are proounced by the King to be handled in Parliament; if other Articles be handled before thefe befirft determined, that it is Trefon in them that do it. And in this Parliament, the King brought it fo about, that he obtained the whole power of the Parliament to be conferred upon certain persons, namely, John Duke of Lancasfer, Edmund Duke of York, Edmund Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marquefs of Dorfl, Roger Earl of March, John Earl of Salisbury, and divers others, or to any feven or eight of them; and thefe, by virtue of this Grant, proceeded to conclude upon many things, which concerned generally the things of the whole Parliament, to the great prejudice of the State, and a dangerous example in time to come. A general Pardon was also granted for all offences, to all the King's subjects, but only to fifty, whose names he would not express, but referred them to his own knowledge. That when any of the Nobility offended him, he might at his pleasure name him to be one of the number excepted, and to keep them still within his danger. And for the more strengthening the Acts of his Parliament, the King purchased the Popes Bulls, containing grievous cenfures and curles to them that should break them. And now the Heads of the opposite Faction having loft their heads, and all things as well fetled as could be desired, the King was secure, as thinking himself safe; and he had indeed been safe, if Time and Fortune were not Aétors in Revenge, as well as men; or rather, if a superioir power did not enter-pose, whose ways are a secret as himself is invincible.

It now fell out, (though writers differ what it was fell out) for Some write, that Thomas Mowbray accused the Duke of Hertford; Others, that Henry Duke of Hertford accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, for speaking words hounding highly to the Kings dishonour; to which the Duke of Norfolk, being called to answers, charged the Duke of Hertford with hating the King, that he lied fally. Whereupon a Combat was agreed upon between them. The King laboured to make them friends: but not prevailing, he gave way to proceed in Combat, and the place to be at Coventry; where at the day and hour appointed, the Duke of Hertford, mounted on a white Courfer, barded with green and blew Velvet, imbrodered fumptuously with Swains and Antelops of Goldsmith work, approached the Lifts. Of whom the Marfhal, being the Duke of Surrey, demanding who he was? he answered; I am Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hes-ford, that am come hither to do my endeaver against Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, as a Traitor, untrue to God, the King, his Realm, and me: Then incontinent he swore upon the holy Evangelifts, that his quarrel was true and just; and thereupon required to enter the Lifts, where in a Chair of green Velvet he fat down and repofed himself. Then came the Duke of Norfolk, his Horfe barded with Crimfon Velvet, imbrodered richly with Lions of Silver, and Molyber-trees; and when he had taken his Oath before the Confable the Duke of Au-merle, that his quarrel was juft, he entered the Lifts, and fate him down in his chair of Crimfon Velvet, curtefied about with white and red Damfek. Then the Marfhal viewed their Spear, to fee that they were of equal length; and the Heralds proclaimed, on the Kings behalf, they fhould mount on Horfeback, and address themselves to the Combat; but when they were fet forward, and had their Spears in their Reifs, the King call down his Warder, and the Heralds cryed Stay, Stay.
The King caufed their Spears to be taken from them, and deliberated with his Council, what was fliest to be done in fo weiglhy a caufe.
After two long hours it was at last concluded, that Henry Duke of Hertford fhould within fifteen
fifteen days depart out of the Realm, and upon pain of death forthfrom the Duke of Norfolk should likewise avoid the Realm, and never return into England, upon the like pain. It is observable, that this Censure was passed against the Duke of Norfolk, the very same day twelve month in which he had taken order to pursethe Duke of Gloucester to death at Callicoe, whereof he was then Governor. When these Judgments were once read, the King called before him both the Dukes, and made them swear that the one should never come in place where the other was. After this, the Duke of Norfolk went into Aitain, and from thence went to Venice; where after some time he dyed by sorrow. The Duke of Hereford, at the taking his leave of the King, had four years of his Banishment releas'd; and then went to Callicoe, and from thence to Paris: where, of the French King he was so kindly receiv'd, that by his favour he had obtained in marriage the only daughter of the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, if King Richard by Meffengers had not hindered him. The Duke might have made his banishment, in manner of a visitation, if he had gone into Spain; for there he had two sisters married, the one to the King of Portugal, the other to the King of Spain, to whom his coming would have been most welcome: but he chose rather to make his stay in France, as the place where he might soonest have intelligence out of England; and indeed before a year came about, he heard of the death of his Father, the Duke of Lancaster: and heard withal that King Richard had feied into his hands, all the Lands defenced upon him, contrary to his promise.

It was a custom in those days, to punish the delinquencies of great men by banishment out of the Realm, a Custom not more grievous to the Subject then dangerous to the Prince: for by this course they had means to work so closely in their mines of revenge, that the Fabrick of a Kingdom was in danger to be blown up before their working could be perceived. An example whereof may never more plainly be seen then at this time, in the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Hereford: For they in their banishment meeting often together, and aggravating the grievances of King Richard's Government, fell at last to confult by what means he might be removed, seeing there was no hope he could ever be reclaimed. In the time of their consultation about it, as if Fortune her self meant to do their work for them, solicitations came from many parts of England, to move the Duke of Hereford to come now and take the Government upon him, wherein they would be ready to assist him. The Duke heard before the Archbishop's intimation, and now fent on fire by this solicitation, gives Fortune no leisir to alter her minde, by delaying the time: but without further deliberation preparations to be going: and taking with him the Archbishop, the Lord Calham, Sir Thomas Erpington and Sir Thomas Remond, Knights; John Norbury, Robert Waterton, and Francis Coynt Esquires, and about some three-score other petions, as many as he could readily get, in three Ships which the Duke of Britian lend him, he put to Sea: where hovering about the Coast a while, to mark the countenance of the fores, he landed at lat, about the beginning of July, at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire. Which no sooner was known, but there proceeded to him the Lords Mollines, Rice, Darcy, and Remson; and shortly after, the Duke, the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Sir Henry Percy, with the Earl of Westmoreland, and great numbers of the Gentry and common sort: of whom though some had invited him to come to take the Government of the Realm upon him, yet he forbore to pretend that, for any cause of his coming, but made a solemn protestation, that he came only to take possession of the inheritances defenced upon him from his Father, which King Richard most unjustly, and contrary to his promise, had seised into his hands: for this was a reason why he had no objection: the other he referred, till his power should not need to regard objections. And indeed, no snow-ball ever gathered greater nefs to fall by rolling, as his Forces increased by marching forward; for by that time he came to Berkeley, he had got a mighty Army: and in three days after, all the King's Forces in those parts were gathered to him. The Duke of York left Governor of the Kingdom, used his belt means to raise Forces to refit him; but found few willing to bear Arms against him: wherupon, and perhaps hearing withal that the Dukes coming was but only to take possession of his Inheritance, he thought good to go to Berkeley to him, to have there some communication about it. At Berkeley at that time was arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmbam, and Sir Walter Barleigh, Knights; Laurence Drew, and John Golfer Esquires. From Berkeley the two Dukes went forward towards Brifaw, where in the Cattle were the Lord Williams Strop, Earl of Wiltshire, and Treasurer of England; Sir Henry Green, and Sir Henry Bulby, who were taken and brought forth bound before the Duke of Lancaster; and the Duke after arraigned before the Confible and Marshal; and whose heads were cut off, and the Governor of the King and the Realm, and presently had their heads smittken off. Sir John Ruffell was also taken there; but he resigning himself to be out of his wits, escaped for that time.

All this while King Richard was in Ireland, where he performed Acts in repressing the Rebels there, not unworthy of him; and having with him amongst other of the great Lords, the Duke of Lancaster's Son Henry, he there for his forwardness in service, Knighted him. By which it appeared that he had no great fear of the Father, when he grasped the Son; and indeed he needed not have feared him, if his own abscence out of England had not given him advantage. Six weeks were now past after the Dukes arrival in England; and in which time King Richard had no notice of it, by reason the windes were contrary to come forth of England: But as soon as he heard it, and in what hoftile manner he proceeded, he determined to return instantly into England; and had done it but that the Duke of Avonmore Amerlie his principal Counsellour (whether out of a good meaning, but grounded upon errors; or out of an ill meaning, but shadowed with colours) by all means perwaived him to stay so long till things fitting for his journey might be made ready. It was King Richard's ill luck to hearken to this ill counsellor: but he presently sent the Earl of Salisbury into England, to provide him an Army out of Wales and Cheyfrie, against his own coming; which he promised faithfully should be within fix days at the most. The Earl landed at Conwy in Wales, and had soon gotten to the number of forty thousand men: but the fix days passed and no news of the King; which made the Souldiers suspect that he was dead, and thereupon were ready to disband; but at the Earl of Salisbury's perfwation, they were contented to stay for some days longer, and when the King came not in that time neither, then they would stay no longer: but departed and went home. At length, about the middle of the day, the King had sent away the Earl of Salisbury, he took shipping, together with the Dukes of Amerlie, Exeter, and Surrey, and divers others of the Nobility; with the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carlile; and landed at Barklowly in Wales. He had about him some Cheyfrie men, and was at first in no great doubt of prevailing; but when he heard that all the Castles from the Borders of Scotland unto Brifow were delivered to the Duke of Lancafer, and that the greatest part of the Nobility and Commons took part with him, and specially that his principal Counsellours had lost their heads at Brifow; then, volvantur frigere membra, he fell so utterly to despair, that calling his Army together, he licenc'd all men to be gone, and so shif for himself. The Souldiers besought him to be of good cheer, swearing they would stand with him to the death: but the King encouraged him not at all; so as the next night he flioke from his Army, and with the Dukes of Exeter, and Surrey, the Bishop of Carlile, Sir Stephen Scroop, and some half a score others, he got him to the Castle of Conwy, where he found the Earl of Salisbury determining there to stay, till he might see the world at some better day. Here the Earl of Worfeter Steward of the Kings house, broke his white thigh, and without delay went to the Duke of Lancafer; who understanding that King Richard was returned out of Ireland, he left the Duke of York at Brifow, and came back with his power to Berkley, and from thence the next day came to Glescifer, and then to Roffe, after to Hereford, where came to him the Bishop of Hereford, and Sir Edmund Mortimer: on the Sunday following he went to Lofynfer, and there the Lord Carles came to him from thence he went to Ludlow, and the next day two of his Councellors came to him Sir Robert Leigh, and Sir John Leigh, and many others, being sent from Cheyfrie, to offer their service, which also came to him the Lord Scales, and the Lord Bordalch, forth of Ireland: From Shrewsbury he went to Cheyfrie, and from thence sent for his Son and Heir, and likewise for the Duke of Glescifer's Son and Heir (whom King Richard had left in cullody in Ireland, with all speed to come into England: but the Duke of Glescifer's Son through misfortune perished at Sea, or as some wrote he died of the plague; the sorrow whereof cauf'd, shortly after, his Mothers death. After this, the Duke sent the Earl of Northumberland to the King, who upon safe conduct coming to him, declared, that if it might please his Grace to undertake, that there should be a Parliament affembled, in which Justice might be had, and herewith pardon the Duke of Lancafer of all things wherein he had offended, the Duke would be ready to come to him on his knees and as an humble Subject obey him in all dutifull servises. Yet upon this conference with the Earl, some fay the King required only, that himself and eight more, whom he would name, might have honourable allowance, with allance of a private quiet life, and that then he would reigne his Crown; and that upon the down to meet, and finding they did their due reverence to him on their part, to make the place where they laid an Ambush, the King was enclosed, and constrained to go with the Earl of Northumberland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint to bed. The King had very few of his friends about him, but only the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlile, the Lord Scroop, Sir Nicholau Forley, and James d'Artois de Gafcoine, who still wore a white Hart, the Cognizance of his Master King Richard, and neither for Promises nor Threats would be drawn to leave it off.

The King being in the Castle of Flint, and Duke Henry with his Army approaching near the Town, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Duke of Amerlie and the Earl of Worfelter, went before to the King; whom the King fying from the Walls where he ftood, went down to meet, and finding they did their due reverence to him on their part, to make the place where they laid an Ambush, the King was enclosed, and constrained to go with the Earl of Northumberland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint to bed. The King had very few of his friends about him, but only the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlile, the Lord Scroop, Sir Nicholau Forley, and James d'Artois de Gafcoine, who still wore a white Hart, the Cognizance of his Master King Richard, and neither for Promises nor Threats would be drawn to leave it off.

they rode forward, and lodged first at Coventry, then at Daintry, then at Northampton, next day at Dunstable, then at St. Albans, and so came to London. In all which journey they suffered not the King to change his apparel, but made him ride still in one suit of raiment; and that but a simple one, though he in his time was exceeding sumptuous in Apparel, having one Coat which was valued at thirty thousand Marks. And in this fort he was brought the next day to Westminster, and from thence the next day had to the Tower, and committed to safe Custody. After this, a Parliament was called by the Duke of Lancaster, but in the name of King Richard, in which many heinous points of Mif-government were laid to his charge, and were ingrossed up in three and thirty Articles, the chief were.

That he had wilfully spent the Treasure of the Realm.

That without Law or Justice, he had caused the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earl of Arundel to be put to death.

That he had borrowed great sums of money, and given his Letters Patents to repay the same, and yet not one penny ever paid.

That he had said, The Laws of the Realm were in his head, and in his breast: by reason of which fantastical opinion, he destroyed Noblemen, and impover-ished the Commons.

That he changed Knights and Burgesses of the Parliament at his pleasure.

That most tyrannically he said, That the lives and goods of all his subjects were in his hands, and at his disposal.

That whereas Lords were by the Court of Parliament appointed to treat of matters concerning the state of the Kingdom; they being informed about the same Commissions, he went about to appear them of high Treason.

That by force and threats, he enforced the Judges of the Realm, at Shrewsbury, to confound to his way, for the destruction of divers of the Lords.

That he confided his Fathers own Brother, the Duke of Gloucesfer, without Law to be attacked and sent to Callice, and there without reason, fiercely mur-dered.

That notwithstanding the Earl of Arundel, at his arrangement pleaded his Charter of Pardon, yet he could not be heard; for was shamefully and sudden-ly put to death.

That he assembled certain Lancashire and Cheshire men, to make War upon his Lords; and suffer them to rob and spoil, without prohibition.

That though he had made Proclamation that the Lords were not attacked for any crime of Treason; yet afterward in the Parliament he laid Treason to their charge.

That notwithstanding his Pardon granted to them, he enforced divers of the Lords partakers, to be again intolerably Fined, to their utter undoing.

That without the assent of the Peers, he carried the Jewels and Plate of this Kingdom into Ireland.

Upon these, and some other Articles, he was by Parliament adjudged to be deposed from all Kingly Honour, and Princely Government. And thereupon, the King being advised by his own servants, rather voluntarily to resign the Crown, then by compulsion to be forced to it, on the Monday before the nine and twentieth day of September, in the year 1539. he made a solemn resignation, before divers Lords and others, sent to him for that purpose; and an in-strument of his resignation being made, he would needs read it before them all himself, and then subcribed it: and withal, made it his fuit, that the Duke of Lancaster might be his Succesfor, and King after him; and for a sign of his desire hereof, he took his signet Ring of Gold from his finger, and put it upon the Duke of Lancaster; that never man who had used a Kingdom with such violence, gave it over with such patience. But rather the willingness, that he seemed rather to accept it, then that he was any way forced to it. This Resignation of King Richard being publicly announced to the Parliament, both Houses gave their assent; and then Commissioners were appointed to pronounce openly the sentence of his deposing, which was done by the Bishop of Arbroth, and all Allegiance renounced to him.

And now it is easy to be observed, what a wonderful concurrence of fortunes, in behalf of the Duke of Lancaster, and against King Richard, happened together; whereof if any one had been missing, he had never been turned out of his Throne in such manner as he was: For first, if it had not happened that King Richard had been in Ireland at the time when the Duke began his attempt, it had not been possi-ble for him to compass his design as he did: And then if King Richard being in Ireland, he had not by misfortune of weather been kept six weeks from hearing of the Duke's arrival, he had not given him time to large a time for raising of Forces, and so more eaily might have refitted him: Or after King Richard heard of the Duke's arrival, if he had followed the Earl of Salisbury, and not stayed so many days longer then he promised, he had found an Army rea-dy to receive him, sufficient at least to have given a stop to the Duke's proceedings: Or when at last he came over, and found his Army to fail him, if withal his own courage had not failed him, but that he had manfully put it to the hazard of a Battel, as his Soulthers themselves would have had him to do, he could not choose but have made a better end of his batti- nes then now he did. But when all is done, there is no warring the blows of Fortune; or to say better, no refitting the Decree of He- ven: but feeling that Decree is an invincible, and may perhaps be conditional, we shall manifestly be Traitors to our selves, if we use not our uttermost endeavours to divert it: so that it may truly be said, King Richard loft his Crown, more by his own Treason, then by the Treason of any other.

Of his Taxations.

In his second year, in a Parliament held at Gloucesfer, was granted to be paid by the Merchants, upon every fack of Woo a Mark, for this present year; and for every pounds-worth of Wares brought from beyond Sea, and sold here, five pence of the buyer. In his third year, in a Parliament at Westminster, a Subdidy was granted to be levied of the great men A subsidy granted where the Commons are spared.

The Reign of King Richard the Second.

In his second year, in a Parliament at Gloucester, it was enacted that Merchant-strangers might buy and sell in Groats, or by Retail, within this Realm. In his third year, in a Parliament at Westminster; it was ordained, that the Privileges and Immunities of the Abbey of Westminster should remain inviolate; but with this Proviso, against those that rook sanctuary with purpose to defraud their Creditors, That their Lands and Goods should be liable to their Debts. In his sixth year, a Parliament was holden, in which the Mayor of London, upon suggestion of the Fifthers and merchants, used great deceit, of turning of their Fish, obtained to have it Ensailed, That from thenceforth, none of that Company, nor of the Vintners, Grocers, Butchers, or other that held any pretense of Virtues should be admitted Mayor of the City; but in the Parliament next following were referred to their liberty again, saying that they might not keep Courts among themselves, but that all transgressions of their Customs should be tried at the Mayors Court. In his eleventh year, King Richard created John Beauchamp of Hals, Baron of Kedermisner, by his Letters Patents; the first that was so made: for before this time, Barons were always made by calling them to Parliaments by the King's Writ. Till this time women used to ride afile as men do.

In the second year of this King's Reign, there came messengers from the new elected Pope Urban, to require the Kings aid against such Cardinals as he named Schismaticus, that had elected another Pope, whom they named Clement; which Cardinals sent Messengers likewise to crave his aid for them, but through peroration of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Urban's request was granted, and Clement rejected. In his fourth year, John Wickliffe set forth his opinion touching the Sacrament of the Altar, denying the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, in such fort as the Church of Rome did then teach. In his sixth year, Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich received Bulls from Pope Urban, to grant all privileges of the Grisado to all such as would come over and assist him against the Anti-Pope Clement; which being debated in Parliament, it was after much opposition agreed, that it should be done; and thereupon the Bishop not only gathered much money from such as would contribute to the expedition, but drew many great Captains to go themselves in person; as namely, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Farington, the Lord Henry Beaumont, Sir William Elmslow, Sir Thomas Tryer, and divers others. The money raised by contribution, came to 30000, Franks, and the Army to 3000. Horse, and 15000. Foot; with which Forces, the Bishop passing over into Flanders, won the Towns of Gruzelfing, Dunkirk, and Ramor: but at last encountered by a mighty Army of the French, he was put to the worst, and returned into England. In the twelfth year of this King's Reign, an Act was made that none should pass the Seas to purchase promotions or provisions (as they termed them) in any Church or Churches. Also, in this year Thomas the late Earl of Lancaster, by reason of miracles reported to be done by him, was canonized for a Saint. At this time also the Wickliffes marvellously increased, Preaching against Pilgrimages and Images, whose greatest opposer was the Bishop of Norwich. In his thirteenth year Proclamation was made by Letters Patents.
was made, that all beneficed men abiding in the Court of Rome, should return into England by a certain day, under pain of forfeiting their Benefices: and all other not Beneficed, under a certain pain likewise. Also about this time a Statute was made, that no Ecclesiastical person should possess Manours, Housers, Lands, Revenue, or Rents whatsoever at the hands of the Feoffee, without the Kings Licence and the chief Lords. In his eighteenth year, the Wickslefs were pernicious, and Excomunication pronounced against them by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In this Schism of the two Popes, the French Clergy wrote in behalf of Clement their Pope, and sent it into England: The Clergy of England on the contrary wrote in behalf of Pope Urban, and so nothing was agreed.

Works of Pity in his time.

In the twentieth year of this Kings Reign, William Barcram B shop of Norwich builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. In the third year of his Reign, John Whipps, Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements, for the which the Chamberlain payeth yearly to thirteen poor people, to every of them seven pence the week for ever; and as any of these thirteen persons dieth, the Mayor appointeth one to succeed, and the Recorder another. In the one and twentieth year of his Reign, King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the Walls, Windows, and Roof. In his time, Simon Archbishop of Canterbury, slain by the Rebels upon Tower Hill, built the West-gate of Canterbury, and from thence to the North-gate, commonly called the long Wall. Thomas Fitz-Allen, or Arundel, being B shop of Ely, built the great Gate-house of Ely House in Holborn; and being after Bishop of Canterbury, he built a fair Spire Steeple at the West end of his Church there, called to this day, Arundel Steeple, and belfowed a tunable ring of five Bells upon the same.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

In his third year, so great a mortality afflicted the North parts of England, that the Country became almost desolate. In his fifth year, on the 24th day of May, there happened to a great as Earthquake, and as (some write) a Water-flake, that it made Shipton in Haven, to beat one against the other. In July, in the year 1389, whilst the King was at Sheen, there swarmed in his Court such multitudes of Flies and Gnats, skirmishing with one another, that in the end they were swept away with Brooms by heaps, and Buffels were filled with them. In his twelfth year, in March, first there were terrible Winds: afterwards followed a great mortality, and after that a great dearth, that a Buffel of Wheat was sold for thirteen pence, which was then thought a great price; for the years before it was sold for six pence, and Wool was sold for two Shillings a stone. In his fourteenth year, on Christmas day, a Dolphin was taken at London Bridge, being ten foot long, and a monstrous grown Fish. In his eighteenth years an Exhalation, in likenes of fire appeared in the night in many places of England; which when a man went alone, went as he went, and stayed as he stayed; sometimes like a Wheel, sometimes like a Barrel, sometimes like a Timber-log: but when many went together, it appeared to be afar off. Also in a Parliament time, there was a certain Image of Wax made by Uncertainty (as was said) which at an hour appointed, uttered these words.

The Head shall be cut off; the Head shall be lifted up above the Head, and then spake no more. This happened in the Parliament called the Marmellus Parliament, not long before the Parliament that wrought Wonders. In his one and thirtieth year, a River not far from Bedford, suddenly ceased his course, so as the channel remained dry by the space of three miles; which was adjudged to signify the revolting of the Subjects from their natural Prince. In his two and twentieth year, almost through all England, all Bay-trees withered, and afterwards grew green again; which was supposed to import some strange event. About the year 1380, the making of Guns was found by a German, which may well be reckoned among casualties, seeing it was found by casualty; for this German having beaten Brimstone in a Mortar to powder, and covered it with a flone, it happened that as he struck fire, a spark chance to fall into the powder; which caused such a flame out of the Mortar, that it raised a flame a great height; which after he perceived, he made a Pipe of Iron, and tempered the powder with some other ingredients, and so finisht that deadly Engine. The first that used it were the Venetians against the Inhabitants of Genoa.

Of his Vicissitudes.

King Richard in his time had two Wives, the first was Anne Daughter to the Emporeur Charles the Fourth, and Sitter to the Emporeur Venetians; who lived his Wife ten years, and died without issue at Sheen in Surrey, in the year 1392. Whole death King Richard took so heavily, that he caus'd the buildings of that Palace to be thrown down and defac'd; as though to revenge himself upon the place, could gait his minde, and mitigate his sorrow. His second Wife was Isabel, Daughter to Charles the sixth King of France; She was married to him at eight years of age, and therefrom never cohabited. After King Richard's death she was sent home, and married afterwards to Charles Son and Heir to the Duke of Orleans.

He was the goodliest personage of all the Kings that had been since the Conquest; tall of stature, of streight and strong limbs, fair and amiable of countenance; and such a one as might well be the Son of a most beautiful Mother. Concerning his conditions, there was more to be blamed in his Education, then in his Nature; for there appeared in him many good inclinations, which would have grown to be abilities, if they had not been perverted by corrupt flitterers in his youth. He was of a credulous disposition, disposition, apt to believe, and therefore easily to be abused. His greatest transgression was, that he went with his friends into a church, where he should have gone but for force of arms. His greatest impiety, that he could not discern faith from a flattering of a friend. He seemed to have in him both a French Nature and an English; violent at the first apprehension, calm upon deliberation. He never showed himself more worthy of the Government, then when he was depos'd as unworthy to Govern; for it appeared, that his Regality was not so dear unto him, as a private quiet life: which if he might have enjoyed, he would never have complained that Fortune had done him wrong.

King Richard after his Resignation, was conveyed to the Castle of Leeds in Kent, and from thence to Pomfret; where the common fame is, that he was kept with coldly mean, like a King, but not suffer'd once to touch it, and so died of forced Famine: But Thomas Walsingham referreth it altogether to a voluntary purgation of himself, through grief of his misfortunes. But one Writer, well acquainted with King Richard's doings, faith, that King Henry, listing one day at his Tables said fighting, Have I no faithful friend that will deliver me of him who will be my death? This speech was specially noted by one Sir Piers of Exton, who presently with eight persons in his company went to Pomfret, commanding the Esquire that took the Affay before King Richard, to do so no more, saying, Let him eat now, for he shall not eat long. King Richard listing down to dinner, was served without Affay; whereas marvellous, he demanded of his Esquire, why he did not his duty? Sir (said he) I am otherwise commanded by Sir Piers of Exton, who is newly come from King Henry. When King Richard heard that word, he took the Carving Knife in his hand, and stroke the Squire on the head, saying, Wherefore dost thou demand of me, and thee together: And with that word Sir Piers entered the Chamber, with eight armed men, every of them having a Bill in his hand. King Richard perceiving this, put the Table from him; and stepping to the foremost man, wrung the Bill out of his hands, and flung four or five of those that thus came to affai'm him: but in conclusion was fell with a stroke of a Poll-axe, which Sir Piers gave him upon the head, with which blow he fell down dead: Though it be scarce credible, that a man upon his bare word, and without shewing any warrant, should be admitted to do such a fact. Sir Piers having thus slain him, wept bitterly: a poor amends for so basing a treafure. King Richard thus dead, his body was embalmed, and covered with lead, all save the face, and then brought to London; where it lay at Paule three days together, that all men might behold it, to see he was dead. The Corps was after had to Langley in Buckinghams, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers: but afterward by King Henry the fifth, it was removed to Westminster, and there honourably entombed, with Queen Anne his Wife; and that beautiful Picture of a King, sitting Crown'd in a Chair of State, at the upper end of the Quire in S. Peters at Westminster, is said to be of him: although the Scotts untruly write, that he escaped out of Prifon, and led a fo- litary and vextation life in Scotland; and there died, and is buried (as they hold) in the Black-Friers at Sterling. He lived three and thirty years, reigned two and twenty and three months.

Men of Note in this King's time.

Men of Valour in his time were so many, that to reckon them all would be a hard task; and to leave out any would be an injury: yet to give an instance in one, we may take John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, whose valour was no less seen abroad than at home: In France, in Germany, in Spain; in all which places, he left Trophies of his Victories. But of learned men, we may name thefe: William Thorne an Augu- stine Frier of Canterbury, an Hiftoriographer: Adam Merimouth, a Canon of Pauls Church in London, who wrote two Hiftorical Treatises; one intituled Chronicle 40. anno. another Chronicle 60. anno. William Packington sometimes Secretary to the Black Prince, an excellent Hiftoriographer. William Bosby a Carmelitie Frier, Bishop of Worcester, and Con- cellour to the Duke of Lancaster: John Bourg. Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, William Sleade, a Monk of Buckstaff Abbey in Devonshire: John Thriving Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellour of England, and a Cardinal: William Berton Chancellour of Oxford, an ad- versary to Wickliffe: Philip Stapington Abbot of Lefcester, a Defender of Wickliffe: Walter Fria, a Scholar of Wickliffe's, a Writer both in Divinity and other Arguments: John Sharp, a great adversary to Wickliffe, who wrote many Treatises: Peter Feltsh, a great favourer of Wickliffe. Marcel Ingleins, an excellent Divine, one of the firft Teachers in the University of Hadleigh: Richard Whith a learned Priest, and an earnest Tower of Wickliffe: John Swinham Bhop of Berwick, a great Adversary to the Wickliffe: Adam Esken, a great Linguit, and a Frie- deric Cardinal: John Trevisa, a Cornish man, and a fe- cular Priest, who translated the Bible: Bealtho- lemus, De Proprictatius Roman, Polychronion of Ranulph Higden, and divers other Treatises: John Moon, an English man, but a Student in Pe- ris, who compiled in the French Tongue, The Remains of the Rafe; translated into English by Geoffrey Chaucer, and divers others.

THE FOURTH.

Of his coming to the Crown.

Anne Dom. 1399.

Free the Renunciation of King Richard, and the sentence of his Deposing openly read in Parliament, Henry Duke of Lancaster riefeth up from his fear; and first, making the Sign of the Cross upon his forehead and brest, he said, In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost: I Henry of Lancaster claim the Crown of England, as defended by right line from King Henry the third: And having thus spoked, he fate down again. Upon this, the Arch Bishop conferred with the Lords, and having heard their opinions, he returned to the Commons, asking them, if they would join with the Lords, in choosing Henry of Lancaster for their King; who all with one voice cried, Yes, Yes; whereupon going to the Duke, he bowed his knee, and taking him by the hand led him to the Royal Seat; and then began a Sermon, taking for his Text, out of the first Book of the Kings, cap. 9. Ver dominabitur in populo: wherein he declared what a happiness it is to a Nation to have a King of Wisdom and Valour, and shewed the Duke of Lancaster to be such a one; and as much the defects in both, of the late King Richard. The Sermon ended, the King thanked them all for his Election; and testified to them, that he meant not to take advantage against any man else, as coming in by Conquest; but that every one should freely enjoy his own, as in times of lawful succession. And now a time was appointed for his Coronation; and accordingly, upon the 13 day of October following, the very day whereon in the year before he had been banished, he was Crowned at Westminster, by the Arch Bishop of Canterbury, with all Rights and Ceremonies accustomed: At his Coronation he was anointed with an Oyl which a religious man had given to Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, together with this Prophezie, That the Kingsanointed with this Oyl, should be the Champions of the Church. This Oyl coming to the hands of King Richard, as he was looking amongst his jewels, going then into Ireland, he was desirous to be anointed with it, but that the Arch Bishop of Canterbury told him, it was not lawful to be anointed twice: whereupon putting it up again, at his coming afterwards to Flint, the Arch Bishop got it of him, and kept it till the Coronation of King Henry, who was the first King of the Realm that was anointed with it. The day before the Coronation, the King in the Tower made one and forty, some say but twelve Knights of the Bath, whereof four were his own Sons, Henry, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, all then alive; and with them, three Earls, and five Barons. Upon the Feast-day, many claimed Offices, as belonging to their Tenures, to which, upon shewing their right, they were admitted. And now the King made divers new Officers: The Earl of Northumberland he made Constable of England; the Earl of Westmoreland was made Lord Marshal; Sir John Serle, Chancellour; John Newbery Esquire, Treasurer: and Sir Richard Clifford was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal. The Lord Henry his eldest Son, being then about thirteen years of age, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl Cheffer, and soon after also Duke of Aquitaine: and the Crown was by Parliament Erentailed to King Henry, and the Heirs of his body lawfully begotten.

After this Parliament is holden, in which the Acts made in the eleventh year of King Richard were revived, and the Acts made in his one and twentieth year were wholly repealed; and they who by that Parliament were attained, were restored to their Lands and Honours: whereupon Richard Earl of Warwick was delivered out of Prison, and the Earl of Arundel's son recovered his Inheritance; and many other also that were banished, or imprisoned by King Richard, were then fully restored to their Liberty and estates. Also the King gave to the Earl of Westmoreland the County of Richmond and to the Earl of Northumberland the Isle of Man, to be holden of him by bearing the sword wherewith he entred into England. And now was the time for flying of spleens. Sir John Bagot then Prisoner in the Tower, accused the Earl of Aumerle for speaking words against the Duke of Lancaster, now King: also the Lord Flaxwater accused him for the death of the Duke of Gloucester. The Lord Morley appealed the Earl of Salisbury, Secretary for treason: and one Hall accused the Duke of Exeter, for conspiring the death of John of Gaunt the King's Father: but King Henry having entred a Throne in a storm, was willing now to have a calm; and therefore laying aside the one Accusations, he accepted of the other Excuses, and received received the Duke of Anmore, and the Duke of Exeter into as much favour, as if they had never been accursed.

And to qualify the hard opinion which so many Princes might conceive of King Richard; Depolit, he sent Ambassadors into divers Countreys, to make it known, by what title, and by what favour of the people, he came to the Kingdom. To the Court of Rome he sent John Trevenant Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheyn Knight, and John Cheyns Eltigate: into France he sent Walter Sherlaw Bishop of Durham, and Thomas Piery Earl of Worcester: into Spain he sent John Treven Bishop of Aghaff, and Sir William Parre: and into Germany he sent the Bishop of Bungo, and certain others. Most of these Princes seemed either not to regard what was done, or were easily persuaded that all was done well: only Charles King of France was so displeas'd with this indignity offered to his son in Law King Richard, that by violence of his passion he fell into his old pangs of Frenzie; but somewhat recovered, he resolved to revenge it; wherein many Lords of France shew'd themselves forward, but specially the Earl of St. Paul, who had married King Richard's half sister: yet having prepared an Army in readiness when afterward the heard of King Richard's death, they disfolved it again, as considering the time was then past. The Aquitains also, and specially the Citizens of Bordeaux, as being the place where King Richard was born, were mightily incensed: but Sir Robert Knoll Lieutenant of Gien, and afterward Thomas Piery Earl of Worcester, being sent to them by the King, so persuaded them, that with much ado they continued in obedience.

It was about this time moved in Parliament, what should be done with King Richard, (for he was not as yet murdered:) whereupon Thomas Mireck Bishop of Carlile, a learned man and wise; and who had never given allowance to the depoothing of King Richard, now that he was in a place of freedom of speech, rove up and said,

"My Lords, the matter now proposed

"is of marvellous weight and consequence; wherein there are two points chiefly to be considered: the first, Whether King Richard

"be sufficiently put out of his Prince: the second, Whether the Duke of Lancaster be "lawfully taken in. For the first, how can that "be sufficiently done, when there is no power "sufficient to do it? The Parliament cannot,

"for of the Parliament the King is the head; and "can the body put down the Head? You "will say, the head may bow it self down;

"and may the King reign? It is true; but "what force is in that which is done by force?

"and who knows not that King Richard's Re"signation was no other? But suppose he be "sufficiently our, yet how comes the Duke of "Lancaster to be lawfully in? If you say by "Conquest, you speak Treafor; for what Con"quest without Arms? and can a Subject take "Arms against his lawful Sovereign, and not "be Treafor? If you say, by Election of the "State, you speak not reason; for what power

"hath the State to elect, while any is living

"that hath right to Succeed? But such a Suc-

"ceflour is not the Earl of Lancaster, as defen"ded from Edmund Crouchback, the elder son "of King Henry the Third, though put by the "Crown for deformity of his body; for who "knows not the falsness of this allegation?

"seeing it is a thing Notorious, that this Edmund

"was neither the elder brother, but yet crook-

"backs, (though called so for some other rea"son) but a goodly personage, and without a"ny deformity. And your selves cannot for"get a thing so lately done, who it was that in "the fourth year of King Richard was decla"red by Parliament to be Heir to the Crown,

"in cafe King Richard should die without issue.

"But why then is not that claim made? because "Silent leges inter arma. What disputing of Ti-

"cles against the stream of Power? But how-

"foever it is extreme injustice, that King Ri"chard should be condemned, without being "heard, or once allowed to make his de"fence. And now, my Lords, I have spoken

"thus at this time, that you may confider of it "before it be too late; for as yet it is in your "power to undo that jutly, which you have " unjustly done.

"Much of this purpoze was the Bishop's speech; but much more would he have said if he had gone about to call back Yesterday. The matter was too far gone; and scarce a person there present, that had not a hope of either a private or a publick benefit by that which was done. Yet against this speech of the Bishop there was neither Protesting nor Excepting; it pass'd in the Houfe as but one mans opinion: And as for the King, it was neither fit he should use much severity against any Member of that Parliament which had so lately shew'd so much indulgence towards him; nor indeed safe, to be too hot in his Punishment, when he was yet scarce warm in his Government. Yet for a warning to use their liberty of speech with more moderation hereafter, the Bishop was arrested by the Marsh- al, and committed to prison in the Abbey of St. Alban, but afterward without further centure set at liberty, till upon a conspiracy of Lords, wherein he was a party; he was condemned to dye, though through extremity of grief he prevented execution. But as for King Richard, and Edouard Mortimer Earl of March, enough was spoken by the Bishop in both their behalfs to undo them both; and indeed King Richard was soon after made away: the Earl secured himself by retiring far off, to his Lordship of Wrogyn; avoiding the danger of Contention, by not entering the Lits of Apyiring. But although the Divine Providence, for caufes hidden from humane knowledge, gave way at this time to the advancement of the younger, the Houfe of Lancaster; yet in the third Ge-

"eration after, the elder, the Houfe of Clarence recovered its right in King Edward the Fourth: that we may know it is but laving the leisure of Heaven, for every one to have his Right, either in Perfon, or by Proxie.

But whether incited by this speech of the Bishop, or otherwife out of the rancor of envy in some, and malice in others, it was not long after, before there grew in the minds of many both Lords and other, a malignant inclination towards towards King Henry; and came first to be a Conspiracy in the House of the Abbot of Whil-sington. This Abbot was a kind of a Bookfiatarian, but better read in the Politicks of Ajax than of Solomon; who remembering some words of King Henry, which he had spoke some time before, when he was but Earl of Darby, That Princes had too little, and Religious-men too much; and fearing, left being now King, he should reduce his words into act, he thought it better to use preventing Physick beforehand, than to stand to the hazard of a curing afterward: and thereupon invited to his houfe the discontented Lords; as namely, John Holland Duke of Exeter, Thomas Holland his brothers fon, Duke of Surrey, Edward Duke of Aumerle, John Montague Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Spencer Earl of Gloucester, John Bishop of Carlile, Sir Thomas Blunt, and Mandin one of King Richard's Chappel; who afterward conferring together, and communicating their spleens against King Henry one with another, they resolved at last, both to take away the Kings life, and of the way how to do it.
The device was this: They would publish a solemn Jubilee to be holden at Oxford, at a day appointed, and invite the King to honour it with his presence, and there, in the midst of the Jubilus, when all mens intentions should be otherwise busied, they would have him murdered. This device was resolved on; Oaths of sefecrecy were taken; and Indentures fessipartite for performing conditions agreed upon between them, sealed and delivered: The Juifs are proclaimed; the King is invited, and proimph to come; secrecy of all hands kept moit firmly to the very day. But though all other kept counsel; yet Fortune would not, but the discovered all; For it fortuned, that as the Duke of Aumerle was riding to the Lords at Oxford, against the day appointed, he took it in the way to go visit his Father the Duke of York; and having in his bofome the Indenture of Confederacy, his Father as they fete at dinner chanced to fpy it, and asked what it was? to whom his fon answering, It was nothing that may way concerned him; By S. George faith his father, but I will confeft he was before tranf-ing it from him, read it; and finding the Contents, and reviling his fon for being now the second time a Traitor, before to King Richard, and now to King Henry, he commanded his Horfes instantly to be made ready, and with all the speed he could make, rode to Windsor, where the King then lay: but the younger years of his fon out-rid him, and came to the Court before him; where locking the Gates, and taking the Keys from the Porter, pretending some fpecial reafon, he went up to the King and falling on his knees, asked his Pardon, The King demanding, for what offence? he then discovered the whole Plot: which he had feecce done, when his Father came rapping at the Court-gates, and coming to the King, showed him the Indenture of Confederacy which he had taken from his fon. This, though it amezed the King, yet it informed him of the trutl of the matter: for it was very fatisfac-tiful; and thereupon lays aside his journey to fee the Juttlings of others in jail, and takes care that he be not jutfled in earneft out of his Throne himfelf. In the mean time the confederate Lords were reading at Oxford, and hearing nothing of the Duke of Aumerle, nor feeing any preparation for the Kings coming, were certainly persuaded that their Treafon was discovered. Whereuponfalling into confe-ration of the cafe they were in, they found there was no place left for them of Mercy; and therefore were to fland upon their Guard, and provide the belt they could for their fatey. To which purpoze, the first thing they did was to ap-pare Mandin in Princely Robes, a man as like to King Richard in countenance and perfonage, as one man lightly can be to another; and to give forth that he was King Richard ecapeed out of Prifon, thereby to countenance their proceedings: The next thing was to di-patch meffengers to the Kings of France, and require his affittance. This done they set forward in Battel-array towards Windsor, again-t to King Henry; but finding him gone to London before they came, they then deliberated what course to take: Some advifed to fet King Ri-Chard at liberty before their concurrence; Ri-Chard should be discovered: Others thought belt to follow the King of France, and fet open him unprovided, and before he could gather Forces. In this division of Advices, when they could not do both, they did neither: but as men amazed, marched on, though they knew not well whither, till they came to Col-brock; by which time the King had gathered an Army of twenty thoufand, and was marching towards them: but they not thinking so well of their caufe, that they durft put it to the trial of a battel; or perhaps faying for aid out of France, withdrew themfelves back to Sunnings near to Reading, where the young Queen lay: to whom their coming gave fome fhes of comfort, but quereled before they were throughly kindled: and from thence they march to Gloucefer, where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury took up their lodging in one Inn; the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Gloucefer in another. And now a strange Accident, beyond the reach of all confulation, gives a fudden Difpofiion, that some of the Lords think that a private company durft oppofe those Lords having their Army to near them? Yet the Bayliff of the Town upon Intelligence (no doubt that these Lords were up in Arms againft the King,) taking with him a company of Townsmen, in the night assaulted the Inn where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Sa-linbury lay; who thus oppofed made fhit to defend themfelves till three a clock in the af-noon: but then, being in danger to be taken, a Prietl one of their company, fet divers hous in the Town on fire, thinking thereby to divert the Affailants from prosecuting the Lords, to fave their houfes: but this inflamed them the more; and fo hotly they purfued their af-fault, that they wounded the Duke and the Earl to death; who dying that night their heads were thirck off and fent up to London. With them also were taken, Sir Bonze Slvey, Sir Bovard Brocks, Sir Thomas Blunt, and eight and twenty other Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who were fent to Oxford, where the King then lay, lay, and there were put to execution. The Duke of Exeter in the other Inne, hearing of this affault, fled out of the backside towards the Camp, intending to bring the whole Army to the rescue; but the soldiers having heard a clamour, and seeing smoke, supposing the King had been come with all his Forces, out of a sudden fear dispersed themselves and fled: which the Duke seeing, he also with Sir John Shelly, fled into Essex, where wandering and lurking in secret places, he was at last apprehended as he was at supper in a friends house, and led to Pladbury, and there shortly after beheaded, the place, where by his counsel and commenence, the Duke of Gloucester formerly had been apprehended: That we may observe how the Divine Providence in revenging of injuries, takes notice, and makes use of the very circumstance of place where the injuries are done. The Earl of Gloucester fled towards Walfes, but was taken and beheaded at Brifham. Mandin the counterfeit King Richard, was apprehended and brought to the Tower, and afterward hanged and quartered; with Mr. Perci, another of King Richard's Commanders. divers other Lords, and Knights, and Gentlemen, that as the number of mean persons were in other places put to death; that so much Noble blood, at one time, and for one cause, hath scarce been heard or read of. The Abbot of Westminster, in whose house the plot was contrived, hearing of these misfortunes, as he was going between the Monastery and his Mansion, fell suddenly into a Palfie; and shortly after, without speech, ended his life. About this time also, a strange piece of Trefon is reported to have been practiced against the Kings life; that there was found in his bed-cloaths an Iron with three sharp pikes standing upright; that when the King should have laid him down, he might have thrust himself upon them. But seeing there is no farther mention of inquiring after it; it seems to have been but an idle rumour not worth believing.

But now that the hot English blood was well assuayed, the Welsh blood springs up as hot: For now Owen Glendower, and Esquire of Wales, brought up at the Inns of Court in London: partly out of a desire to revenge a wrong done him (as he conceived) in a suit for lands in controversy between the Lord Grey of Ruthin and him; but chiefly out of an humour of aspiring, endeavoured to draw the Welshmen to a general defection, telling them, that the English being in a very great variety of themselves, now was the time to shake off their yoke, and to reform their own ancient Laws and Customs. To whose perfwasions the Welsh men heartily made, him their King and Captain; and he having gotten a competent Army, set forth upon his old Adverary, Reynold Lord Grey of Ruthin, and takes him prisoner; yet with promise of releafement, if he would marry his daughter, which offer though the Lord Grey at first not only refused, but scorned; yet out of necessity he left he was constrained to accept; when now notwithstanding, his deceitful Father in law trifled out the time of his enlargement till he was slain. But the Welshmen growing confident upon this success, break into the borders of Herefashire, making spoil and prey of the Country as freely as if they had leave to do it; for indeed none opposed them but only the Lord Edward Mortimer, who had formerly withdrawn himself to his Castle at Wigmore; and having assembled the forces of the Country, and joyned battle with them, was taken prisoner, and was first quartered, and then quartered again, into a deep and wide Danger. It was thought if Glendower had as well known how to urge his victory, as to get it, he might at this time have put the English yoke into a great hazard to be shaken off; but he having killed 1000 of the English, thought he had done enough for that time, and so giving over the pursuit, retired.

The inhumanity of the Welsh Women was here memorable, who fell upon the dead carcasses of the English, first stripping them, and then cutting off their privy parts and noses; whereof one the they thrust into their mouths, the other they prefied between their buttocks. Many noble men, specially his Kinmen the Piercies solicited King Henry to deliver Mortimer; but the King was deaf of that ear, he could rather have wished both him and his two Sifters in Heaven, for then he should be free from conceal'd Competitors.

These affronts were at this time suffered in the Velfh, because the King was now employed in a more dangerous service with the Scots; for they taking advantage of the distraction in the Kingdom (as it was always their custom to do) had made an In-ride into the County of Northumberland; and suddenly one night set upon the Castle of Wf-ork, took and spoiled it, and then returned. In revenge whereof, the English invaded and spoiled certain lands of the Orkneys. Then the Scots set forth a Fleet, under the conduct of Sir Robert Logan; but before he came to any action, he was encountered, and the greatest part of his Fleet taken. But these were but such affronts, as often happen between troublesome neighbours; for all this while the Peace was still in being between the Nations: but at last it brake out into open War.

The Peace between England and Scotland, how it brake out into open War. the end of September, he beleaguered the Castle of Mayden in Edinburgh; where Prince David, and the Earl of Douglas were: At which time, Robert D. of Albany, who in the King of Scots' letters managed the business, sent to the Herald to K. Henry, protesting upon his honour, that if he would stay, but four days he would give him battle. K. Henry rewarded the Herald, and stayed; but six times four days-patted, but neither Duke of Albany, or any other for him appeared. And now Winter came on, victuals grew scant, and which was worth, a mortality began in the English Camps which causes, King Henry removed his siege, and returned into England. As soon as he was gone, Sir Patrick Hepbome a Scotchman, having a good opinion of his valour, thought to do great mat ters; and with a competent Army of the men of Longh deke, he invaded Northumberland, making great spoil, and loading his foolders with prey, and prisoners: but in the Retreat marching loudly, and licentiously, was for upon the Earl of Northumberland, Vice-Warden, at a Town called Nelfis, where Hepbome himselfe: and all the forces of Longh-deke were slain, Sir John and the

Robert Earl of Angus, the Earls of Athol and King Henry marries the Lady Jane de Neville, the relict of John Mont ford, formed the Conqueror.

King Henry's Ambassadors lately went into Brit tain to fetch the Lady Jane de Neville, Dutches of Brittain, the relict of John de Montford formed the Conqueror, with whom the King by Procuctors had contested Matrimony; in the beginning of February returned with her in safe
likely to be more able, being now a King, to keep it from private men: and as for any objections that Conscience could make, he had enough to answer them all: For, if his Title were good against King Richard, by his Relegation, it was good against Mortimer by his swearing Allegiance: and upon these grounds, with a minde as confident as if all circumstancies were of his side, he raised an Army, and marched towards the Lords, taking care they might by no means join with the Welsh: and about Shrewsbury on Saturday S. Mary Magdalens Eve he encountered them: in which fight though the Scots and Henry Hotspur showed much valour, yet the victory rested on the Kings side; Hotspur himself was slain, the Earl of Worcester was taken prisoner, together with Sir Richard Vernon, Sir Theobold Trussel, the Baron of Kinderton; and the rest fled. On the Kings part (besides the Earl of Stafford, who had that morning revolted from the Conspirators) were slain, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir John Clifford, Sir Robert Roper, Sir Richard Wenles, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Countréy, Sir John Massey of Paddington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, and Sir Robert Gausell, all which had been but that morning dubbed Knights, with Sir Thomas Wendles, who dyed afterwards of his wounds; of common soldiers about sixteen hundred, but of the Conspirators above six thousand, whereof the 36 the King flew with his own hands; but was once unhorsed by Dunglisse, who in his presence flew Sir Walter Blunt, with divers others, that day in all things attired like to the King; for which exploit, Dunglisse (being after the fall of his horse taken prisoner) was by the Kings command carefully attended, and without ransom set free at liberty. In this battle, the young Prince Henry, though wounded in the face with an Arrown, yet was not wounded in his courage, but continued fighting still. After this victory the King caused publick thanks to be given to them, and the Earl of Warwick was to be beheaded, and many others of that Rebellion to be drawn, hanged and quartered, and their heads placed on London Bridge: And then the King sent his Son Henry Prince of Wales, with his whole Army into that Country; but before his coming Owen Glendour was abandooned by all his Company: and lurking in the Woods was there famished: many of his associates were taken and put to death. Whilest the Prince was in Wale, Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, of his own accord, came and submitted himself to the King, professing his innocency, as not being once acquainted with any intent of Treason and Rebellion; whose excuse the King received for the present with gentile language, the rather for that he had the polleffion of Berwick, Calle and other places of strength in his power: but yet he wiped not off the remembrance of his crime.

And now with the fourth year of his Reign ended all the great Troubles of this King Henry the fourth: those that follow are but such accidents as are frequent in all times both abroad and at home. The Britains under the leading of the Lord of Da Caffie, spoiled the Town of Plimouth, In revenge whereof, the Western men, under command of William Wyllford, set forth a Fleet, which arriving in Britain, took forty Ships laden with Oyl and Wines, and burnt forty more. Again the French landed a thousand men in the Isle of Wight, where they got together a great bootie of Cartel; but the Islanders coming upon them took away their bootie, and made many of them leave their Carli-faces for a bootie to the Island. Yet the French would not leave so, but a while after, as having gotten new spirits, they came Anchor before the Isle of Wight; and require no less then to have the Island into their poffessions but a resolute answer of the Islanders frighted them away, and made them glad they were gone. Soon after this the Duke of Orleans, brother to the French King, in a vaunting Ryle, sent a challenge to King Henry to meet him in the field, each of them to have a hundred in his Company: to which the King answer'd, that for his own value it had sufficiently been tried, and for this challenge of the Dukes, neither the person nor the cause were worthy of his undertaking. Upon this Refusal of the Kings, divers were forced to retire, were bandied between them, till at last the Duke in great pain left his upon Veggie a Town in Guet, but after three months alternating it, being valiantly defended by Sir Robert Amfield and three hundred English men, he was glad to give over with lost, and return into France. Presently upon this the Admiral of Britain accompanied with the Lord Da Caffie, and thirty sail of Ships attempted to land at Dersmouth in Devonshire, but were repelled, and the Lord Da Caffie, and two of his Brothers, and four hundred of his men were slain, besides two hundred taken prisoners; of whom the L. Beagville Marhal of Britain, was one. After this five hundred men of arms, five hundred Cross-Bows, and a thousand Flemings, under the conduct of the Earl of St. Paul, laid siege to the Castle of Marg three leagues from Calais: but first Sir Philip Hali Capitan of Calais, and after by Sir Richard Allen Lieutenant of the English pale, they were forced to retire, and Sir Robert St. Paul escaped to S. Omers, but left many of his men of quality behind him, and more taken Prisoners. After this, Thomas D. of Clarence, the Kings second Son, and the Earl of Kent, with competent Forces entered the Haven of Slieve, where they burnt four Ships riding at Anchor, and returned to the relief of Calais, besieged at that time by the French: and in the way took three Carriages of Gunpowder richly laden, and brought them into the Chamber of Yze. And these were the troubles of this King abroad. About this time a Parliament was assembled at Coventry; which by some was called, the Lay-men Parliament, because the Sheriffs were appointed, that none should be chosen Knights for the Countries, nor Burgesses for the Cities and Towns, that had any skill in the Laws of the Land.

And now was home the Reliques of the former Northern Rebellion began to revive; for now Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, Richard Scrop Archbishop of York, Thomas Maudray Earl Marshal, the Lords, Hoftings, Faulcon-bridge, and Bardolf, with divers others, confpi"red at a time appointed, to meet upon York. Would Downs, and there bid defiance to King Henry. Articles of Grievances were framed, and set up in all publick places, which drew multimultitudes to be partakers of the enterprise. But now Ralph Nevill, Earl of Westmorland, with the Lord John the King's third Son, the Lord Henry Fitz-Hughes, Ralph Ever, and Robert Ham erdale make head against them; and coming into a Plain in the Forefet of Gallytrees, they fare down right against the Archbishop and his Forces, which were twenty thousand; and Westmerland perceiving the Enemies Forces to be far more than theirs, he used this Policy: he sent to the Archbishop, demanding the reason why he would raise Forces against the King? who answering, that his Arms were not against the King, but for his own defence, whom the King upon the instigation of Sycophants, had threatened: withal he sent him a scroll of their grievance, which Westmorland read, and seemed to approve, and thereupon defired a conference with him. The Archbishop more credulous then wife, persuasion, the Earl Marshal to go with him to the place appointed to confer. The Articles are read and allowed of; and thereupon Westmorland seeming to commisserate the Souliers, having in armour all day, and famine, wished the Archbishop to acquaint his parents, he should have with the said unfa-tual agreement; and so shaking hands, in molt Courtly friendship drank unto him. Whereupon the Souliers were willing to disband, and repair home; which they had no sooner done, but a Troop of Horfe, which in a colourable manner had made a shew to depart, wheeled about, and afterward returned and being in fire of the Earl of Westmorland, arreted both the Archbishop and the Earl Marshal, and brought them both Prisoners to the King at Donflufr; who passing from thence to York, the Prisoners likewise were carried thither, and the next day both of them behes-ded. At Durham the Lords Haffings and Fun-cambridge, with two Knights, were executed. Northumberland, with the Lord Bardolf, fled first to Berwick, and after into Scotland, where they were entertained by David Lord Fleming; whereupon they had given them their Castle of Berwick, which at first they refused to obey, but upon the planting & discharging of a Piece, they presently yielded without composition; and here William Graystock, Henry Baynton, and John Blankenhop, Knights, and five other were pretently put to execution, and many others committed to several Prisons. About this time James Son and Heir of Robert King of Scotland, a child of nine years old, attended by the Earl of Orkney, as he was falling into France, was taken by certain Mainians of Norfolk, who brought him to the King at Windsor, the 30. of March, 1408, and the King sent them to the Tower of London. Northumberland and Bardolf, after they had been in Wales, France, and Flanders, to raise a power against King Henry, returned back into Scotland; and after a year with a great power of Scots entered England, and came into Yorkshire, making great spoile and waste as they passed: but Sir Thomas, a Serjeant of York, leuing the forces of the Country upon Bremanmore gave them Battell: in which Northumberland was slain, Bardolf taken, but wounded to death, and the rest put to flight. About this time also, Sir Roger Ham-phrevile Vice-Admiral of England, with ten men of War entred Scotland, burnt their Gally, and many other ships over against Leith, and brought away with him fourteen tall Ships laden with Corn and other staple commodities, which at his return he sent into the Markets round about, and thereby brought down the prices of all things, and purchased to himself the name of Mind-market.

The Prince had been a student in Queens Coldidge in Oxford, under the tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaumont, Chancellour of that University, a terwards Bishop of Lincoln and Winchester, and laftly made a Cardinal, by the title of Eufhbia. From Oxford the Prince was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy Earl of Woresfer was made his governour, but coming afterward to be at his own displeasing, whether by nature valorous, and yet not well layed by time and experience, or whether incited by ill companions, and emboldened by the opinion of his own greatness, he ran into many conffes for unworthy of a Prince, that it was much doubted what he would prove when he came to be King once. It is said he lay in wart for the Receivers of his Fathers Receipts made in the person of a Chief feft upon them and robb'd them. Another time, of his companions was arraigned for felony before the Lord Chief Justice, he went to the Kings Bench Bar and offered to take the Prison'er away by force; but being withstood by the L.
Chief Justice, he stepped to him, and thruck him over the face: whereas the Judge nothing abdis-rode up and told him, that he did not this af-fir to him, but to the King his Father, in whole place hearet; and therefore to make him know his fault, he commanded him to be committed to the Fleet. You would have wondered to see how calm the Prince was in his own caufe, who in the caufe of his companion had been so violent; for he quietly obeyed the Judges sentence, and suffered himself to be led to Prison. This paligate was not a little pleasing to the King, to think that he had a Judge of such courage, and a Son of such fnobination: but yer for these and such other branks he spared his Father, the President of the Council, and placed in it his third Son; a Prince. This made the Prince so sensible of his Fathers displeasure, that he thought it necessary to seek by all means to recover his good opinion; which he endeavoured to do by a way so strange as that by which he loof it; for attirring himself in a garment of blue Satin, wrought all with eyes-holes of black silk, at every hole the needle hanging, by which it was fowed, and about his arm a thing in fashion of a hounds collar, stuffed with S.S. of Gold, he came to the Court at Westminster; to whom the King (though not well in health) cau-led himself, in a Chair, to be brought into his Privy Chamber; where in presence of but three or four of his Privy Council, he demanded of the Prince the cause of his unwonted habit and coming who answered, That being not only his subject but his fon, and a fon so tenderly alway es regarded by him, he was worthy of a thousand debts, if he should intend or but imagine the least offence to his sacred Majestie, and therefore had faced himself to be made a sacrifice: and therewithal reached his dagger, holding it by the point to his Father, For (sayd he) I desire not to live longer, then I may be thought to be what I am.

am and shall ever be, your faithful and obedient Vassal. With this or the like answer, the King was so moved, that he fell upon his Son's neck, and with many tears embracing him, confessed that his ears had been too open to receive reports against him, and promising faithfully, that from thenceforward no reports should cause any difaffection towards him. The King about this time, made his Son John, Duke of Bedford, and his Son Humphrey, Duke of Glocester; he made also Sir Thomas Beaumont Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Arundel he created Duke of York.

The reign of King Henry's days, from this time forward, being scarce a year, was free from all trouble both abroad and at home, unless perhaps he might be troubled in mind for having fled to much Engliify and Noble blood; for exclusion whatsoever, or else to the end might joy Valour and Devotion in one action together, which hidther to he but used bingly, he took upon him the Crown; and at a Council in White-Fryers order was taken, and great preparation was made for his journey to Jerusalem: But it was otherwise decreed in Heaven, and yet not to otherwise, but that he ended his life in Jerusalem, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Of his Taxation.

In the very beginning of his Reign, it might pass instead of a Taxation, that he found in King Richard's Coiffers, in Money and Jewels, to the value of seven hundred thousand pounds. In his fourth year an extraordinary subsidy was granted him; twenty thirllings of every Knight's Fee, and of every one that had twenty thirllings a year in Land, twelve pence and upward, according to that rate; and of every one that had twenty pounds in goods, twelve pence, and upward according to that rate; but with this caution and protestation, that it should not hereafter be drawn for a Precedent; and that no Record thereof should be made. In his fifth year the Clergy granted to the King a Tenth. In his seventh, the Clergy granted a Tenth and a half, and the Commons two fifteens. In a Parliament holden the ninth year of his Reign, the King moved to have allowed him in every year, wherein there was no Parliament kept, a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity; to which demands the Bishops attented; but the Commons would not. In his seventh year, a Parliament began which lasted almost a whole year, in which a Subsidy was at first granted; so that, even Priests andFriars who lived of Alms, were forced every one to pay a Noble.

Of Laws and Ordinances made in his time.

In this King's days, burning and execution by fire for controversies in Religion was first put in practice. Also in the first year of his Reign, an Act was made, that no person of what degree soever, should after that day allege for his excuse, any constraint or coercing of his Prince, for doing of any unlawful act; and that such excuse, after that day, should stand him in no stead.

Also an Act was made, that no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their household and menial Servants. In his twelfth year, the King caused a new Coin of Nobles to be made, which was of less value than the old Noble by four pence.

Also that all Rippers, and other Fishers from any of the Sea-coasts should sell their Fish in Cornwall and Chesapeake themselves, and not to Fishmongers that would buy to sell again.

Also this King instituted the Dutche Court, which he did in honour of the Houfe of Lancaster, to the end the Lands belonging to the Dutches, might in all following times be distinguished and known from the Lands of the Crown. In his fifth year, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Procefs to the Sheriffs, that they should choose no Knights nor Burghes that had any knowledge in the Laws of the Realm; by reason whereof, it was called, the Lay-men's Parliament. In his twelfth year, the Mayor of London, for preferring of Fish, obtained, that all Wears which flowed between London and seven mile beyond London, as also such as flowed between London and Gravesend, should be pulled up and taken away.

By reason of discord between John of Gaunt, and Wickham Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop either in durance, could not, or in fear, durst not come to the Parliament House, at a time when the King required a supply of money; but the Clergy unanimously affirming, that without their Brother, the Bishop of Wincheste, preference, they neither can nor will consent of anything, he is presently sent for, and by the King secured. After this, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Procefs to the Sheriffs that they should choose no Knights or Burghes that were Lawyers, and was therefore called the Laymen's Parliament: And shortly after another Parliament was called, and named the unlearned Parliament; either for the unlearnedness of the persons; or for their malice to learned men. In which the Commons prefented a Petition to the King and the upper House, defiring that the King might have the Temporal possessions of the Bishops and Clergy; the value whereof they pretended would be sufficient maintenance for a hundred and fifty Earls, one thousand five hundred Knights, six thousand two hundred Esquires, and a hundred Hospitals for maimed Soldiers. They said likewise, that Clerks convicted should not be delivered to the Bishops Prifon; and that the Statute made in the second year of the King against Lollards might be repealed. But the King denied their Petition, and in person commanded them thenceforth, not to presume to trouble their Brains about any such busines; for he was resolved to leave the Church in as good fame as he found it. In the twelfth year of his Reign certain learned men in Oxford, in their Sermons maintained the Opinions of Wicklif; but the Bishops and Doctors of the University inhibited and condemned them. In his time was a great Schism in the Church, by reason of two Anti-Popes; but afterwards in an Assembly of Cardinals and Bishops, shops, a third man was elected, named Alexander the fifth, who had been trained up at Oxford.

Works of Piety done in his time.

King Henry founded a College at Battleford in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Percy. In his third year, the Conduit upon Colshill was begun to be built. Also in his time Sir Robert Knolles made the Stone Bridge of Rochester in Kent; and founded in the Town of Pomefert a College and an Hospital: He also re-edified the body of the White Friers Church in Fleet-street, where he was afterward buried: Which Church was first founded by the Ancestors of the Lord Grey of Codnor. In the eighth year of his Reign, Richard Whittington Mayor of London erected an house or Church in London, to be a house of Prayer, and named it after his own name, Whittington College; with lodgings and weekly allowance for divers poor people. He also built the Gate of London, called Regent's, in the year 1429, which was before a moat loathed. He built also more than half of St. Bartholomew Hospital in West Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Gray-Friers in London, now called Christ's Hospital: He also built a great part of the East-end of Guild Hall, and a Chappel rejoicing to it, with a Library of Stone, for the custody of the Records of the City. But he exceeded all this at this time in Works of Piety, was William Wickham Bishop of Winchester; his first work was the building of a Chappel at Titchfield, where his Father, Mother, and Sister Perrot were buried: Next he founded at Southwick in Hampshire, near the Town of Winchester, the place of his birth, as a suppliance to the Priory of Southwick, a Chantry, with allowance for five Pious for ever: He bestowed twenty thousand Marks in repairing the houses belonging to the Bishoprick: He discharged out of Prison in all places of his Diocess, all Such poor Priests as lay in Prison, and discharged out of the falling five Pounds: He amended all the High-ways from Winchester to London, on both sides the River. After all this, on the fifth of March, 1379, he began to lay the foundation of that magnificent Structure in Oxford, called New College, and in person laid the first stone there of; in which place before, there flourished many Colleges built by Alver, at Merton intently; and for the affinities of the name, came to be called New College. In the year 1387. on the 36. of March, he likewise in person laid the first Stone of the like Foundation in Winchester, and dedicated the same, as that other in Oxford, to the memory of the Virgin Mary. The Grocers in London parceled their Hall in Cuny-bre-Loan for 320. Marks; and then laid the foundation thereof on the tenth of May. King Henry founded the College of Fotherby in Northamptonshire; to which King Henry the fifth gave Land of the Priories of Monk Ailms, by him suppressed.

John Gower the famous Poet, next built a great part of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, where he lies buried. In the second year of this King, a new Market in the Poultry, called the Steeke, was built for the trade of Foreign Fishmongers and Butchers. In his twelfth year the Guildhall of London was begun to be new edificed; and of a little Cottage made a goodly house, as now it is. Also in this King's time John Colepepper, one of the Justices of the commons Pleas founded a Free-School with competent yearly maintenance in West Peckham in Kent.

Catastrophes happening in his time.

In his third year, in the month of May, he appeared a blazing Star; first between the East and the North, and then sending forth fiery beams towards the North: fore-Beholding the effuence of blood that followed after in Wales and Northumberland. In the same year at Donkury in Essex, the Devil appeared in likenes of a Gray Frier; who entering the Church, did the people in great fear, and the same hour with a Tempell of Whirlwind and Thunder, the top of the Steeple was broken down, and half the Chancel scattered abroad.

In his seventh year, such abundance of water brake suddenly over the banks in Kent, that it drowned Catel without numbers also this year the Town of Reyfen in Hertfordshire was burnt. In his ninth year was so sharp a Winter and such abundance of Snow, continued December, January, February, and March, that almost all small Birds died through hunger.

Of his Wives and Children.

He had two Wives, the first was Mary, one of the Daughters and Heirs of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton; she died before he came to the Crown, in the year 1394. His second Wife was Jane, Daughter to Charles the first King of Navarre, she being the Widow of John de Montfaucon borned Strangos, the Conqueror, Duke of Brittain; who died without issue. His third Son was John Duke of Bedford; he married first with Anne Daughter of John Duke of Burgundy, and secondly with Jacob Daughter of Peter of Luxemburg, Earl of St. Paul, but died also without issue. His fourth Son was Humphrey, by his Brother King Henry the fifth created Duke of Gloucester, and was generally called the good Duke: he had two Wives, but died without issue, in the year 1446; and was buried at St. Albans: though the vulgar opinion be, that he lies buried in St. Paul's Church. Of King Henry the fourth's Daughters, Blanch the elder was married to Lewis d'Artois, Prince of the Rhne, and Prince Elector; Philip his younger daughter, was married to John King of Denmark and Norway.
The Reign of King Henry the Fourth.

Of his Perjuries and Conditions.

Concerning his body, he was of middle stature, slender limbs, but well proportioned. Concerning his mind, of a furious and solid disposition, and one that stood more upon his own legs then any of his Predecessors had done: in cases of difficulty not refusing, but not needing the advice of others; which might confirm, but not better his own. He was never merry nor sad, but both: before pleased when he was opposed, because this was like to do him good, by sharpening his invention: most angry when he was flattered, because this was sure to do him hurt, by dulling his judgement. No man ever more loved, nor less dasted upon a Wife then he. A good Husband, but not uxorious: that if there be rens to that passion, we may know he had them. It may be thought he affected the Crown, not so much out of Ambition as out of Compassion, because the oppressions of his Country he could not so well help being a Subject, as a King; for otherwise we may truly say, he was a lover by the Crown, being not so great for a King, as he was before for a Subject. The Crown rather was a gainer by him, which hath ever since been the richer for his wearing it. We may think he was either weary of his life, or longing for death; for why else would he take upon him the Cross, having been told by a skilful Soothsayer, that he should dye at Jerusalem? but it seems he did not believe him.

In the forty sixth year of his Age, having Peace both at home and abroad, and being of too active a spirit to be idle, he took upon him the Cross, and great provision was made for his journey to Jerusalem: but alas, his journey to Jerusalem required no such provision; for being at his Prayers at St. Edward's Shrine, he was suddenly taken with an Apeplasty, and thereupon removed to the Abbot of Westminster's house; where recovering his fenes, and finding himself in a strange place, he asked what place it was? and being told that he was in the Abbot's house, in a Chamber called Jerusalem: Well then (said he) Lord have mercy upon me, for this is the Jerusalem where a Soothsayer told me I should dye. And here he died indeed, on the 20. day of March, in the year 1413, when he had lived twenty and forty years, reigned thirteen and a half. It is worth remembering, that all the time of his fickness, his will was to have his Crown set upon his boister by him: and one of his fets being so strong upon him, that all men thought him directly dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crown: when suddenly the King recovering his fenes, milled his Crown; and asking for it, was told, the Prince had taken it: whereupon the Prince being called, came back with the Crown, and kneeling down, said, Sir, to all our judgements, and to all our griefs, you seemed directly dead, and therefore I took the Crown as being my Right: but seeing to all our comforts, you live, I here deliver it much more joyfully then I took it, and pray

God you may long live to wear it your self. Well (faith the King) what right I had to it, God knows. But (faith the Prince) if you dye King, my Sword shall maintain it to be my Right against all opposers. Well (faith the King) I refer all to God: but I charge thee on my Blessing, that thou administer the Laws indifferently, avoid Flatterers, defer not to do Justice, or be sparing of Mercy: And then turning about, said, God blees thee, and have mercy on me: and with those words, gave up the Ghost. His body with all Funeral pomp was conveyed to Canterbury, and there solemnly buried.

Of Men of Note in his time.

Of men of Valour in his time, of whom there was store, I shall need to say no more then what hath already been said in the body of the story; only I cannot but remember Sir Robert Knollys, who was born of mean parentage, made himself famous over all Christendom; and dying at a Manour of his in Norfolk, was brought to London, and buried in the Church of the White-Friers in London, which himself had re-edified. But for men of learning, I must let in the first place, William Wickham, a man of no learning, yet well worthy to hold the place. In relating of whose life, I must have leave to expatiate a little. His Father's name was John Long, or as some say, Pervis; but as Campion proves, Wickhames, and not from the place of his dwelling, though he was Parish Clerk of Wickenham in Hampshire, where he taught Children to write: In which quality his Son William proved so excellent, that Nicholas Waddell, Constable of Wickenher Castle, took him from his Father, and kept him at School, first at Wickenher, afterward at Oxford; till himself being made Surveyor-General of the Kings Works, he sent for this William to serve him as his Clerk: who in short time grew so expert in that employment, that Adam Tarleton Bishop of Wickenher, commended him to the King, who employed him presently in surveying his Fortifications at Dover, and Queenborough Castles, and afterward made him Surveyor of his Buildings at Winder, and his houses of Henly and Earl-Hampton. And here first envy rose up against him, for having caused to be engraven on a stone of a Wall at Winder Castle, these words, This made William Wickenham. Some that envied his rising, complained to the King of his inoffency, as arrogating to himself, that excellent piece of Building to be done at his charge: but Wickenham called before the King about it made answer, that his meaning was not, neither by any indifferent construction could it import that Wickenham made that Building, but that the same Building made Wickenham, as being a means of the Kings great favour towards him: This answer pacified the King, who took him daily more and more into his favour; and being now entered into the Ministy, was first made Parson of St. Martin's in the Fields, then Mini of St. Martins le Grand, afterward Archdeacon of Lincolne, Provost of Wickenham, and Rector of Manyhams in Decanstry; so as at one time he had had in his hands so many Ecclesiastical Livings, that the value of them in the Kings Book amounted to eight hundred twenty, six pounds, thirteen shillings; besides which, he was honoured with many Temporal Livings, of great profit and respect, as to be his principal Secretary, Keeper of the Privy Seal, Master of the Wards and Liveries, Treasurer of the Kings Revenues in France, and some other Offices. After which, the Bishopric of Winchester falling void, means was made to the King to bestow that place upon him. And here, the second time, did envy rise up against him, informing the King that he was a man of little or no learning, and no way fit for such a dignity. Whereupon the King made stay of granting it; but when Wickham came before the King, and told him, that what he wanted in personal learning, he would supply with being a Founder of Learning, this so satisfied the King that he bestowed the place upon him. After this he was made Lord Treasurer of England; and here the third time did envy rise up against him; for the King requiring of his Subjects a supply of money, it was answered, that he needed no other supply then what was due to his Treasury; and he blow strook deep upon the Bishop; for he was presently charged to give account for eleven hundred ninety six thousand pounds; and whilst he was busily in preparing his accounts, all his Temporalities, upon impertinence of John of Gaunt, were seized into the Kings hands, and given to the Prince of Wales, and himself upon pain of the Kings displeasure, commanded not to come within twenty miles of the Court. In this case he diffimmed his train, and sendeth copies abroad of his accounts, if it might be received; but was hindred by the working of John of Gaunt against him upon this ground (as was thought). Queen Philippa Wife to King Edward the Third, upon her death-bed, by way of Confession, told Wickham, that John of Gaunt was not the lawful Ille of King Edward, but a supposititious Son; for when she was brought to bed at Gaunt, her mother, being at Westminster, sent for her to be born at London; and if the King was to have a Son, she exchanged that Daughter with a Dutch Woman for a Boy, whereof she had been delivered about the same time with the Queen. Thus much the confessed, and withal made the Bishop swear, that if the said John of Gaunt should at any time either directly or indirectly attempt the Crown; or rightfulliy, throughwant of ille, it should devolve unto him; then that he should discover this matter, and make it known unto the King, and Council. Afterward the Queen being dead, and the Bishop finding John of Gaunt, as he thought, too much aspiring, he secretly told him this relation, and this adjuration of his suppli'd Mother, advising him not to seek higher then a private stake; for else he was bound by Oath to make it known to all the World. Thus far the Bishop did well; but when he saw the Son of John of Gaunt not only aspiring, but paragraphs on the Crown, why did he not then discover it, and joyn at least with the Bishop of Carlisle, in opposing it? Certainly, we may know, that either the whole relation was but a Fable, or that Wickham was a Temporizer, or that John of Gaunt was a most patient man, to suffer the afront of such an indignity, with less then the death of him that did it. But howsoever it was, it is certain, the Duke bore a mortal grudge to the Bishop; who had no way to withstand such an enemy, but by making Alice Pierce his friend; by whose means, after two years, he was restored to all his living; and afterward, K. Edward being dead, and Alice Pierce banished; by the means of a greater friend then Alice Pierce; his full purfe he obtained in the second year of King Richard, a general pardon under the great Seal of England; and from that time forward enjoyed a quiet life, and died in the fourth year of this King Henry the fourth, being then of the age of above eighty years, and lieth buried in the Church of St. Swithin in Winchester, in a monument of his own making in his life time; leaving for his heir Thomas Perto, the son of his sister Agnes, married to William Perto.

Another great example of the volatility of Fortune, in Professors of Learning, was Roger Walden, who died in the ninth year of this Kings. He was at first a poor Scholar in Oxford; and the first Rep of his rising, was to be a Chaplain in the College there of St. Marys. From thence he rose to be Dean of York; and after this, a high Rep, to be Treasurer of England; and yet a higher after that upon the banishment of Thomas Arundel, to be Archbishop of Canterbury: But being now at the top, he came down again; for in this Kings time, Thomas Arundel being restored to the Archbishopsrick, Walden was not only put out of that place, but was called to accompe the Treasurship; and though he shewed his Quietness off, yet all his TEMPORALITIES were seized, and his person imprisoned, till by the mediation of the now Archbishop Arundel, he was made Treasurer of Colchester, and after promoted to be Bishop of London.

The next place after thefe, is justly due to Geoffrey Chaucer, and John Gower, two famous Poets in this time, and the Fathers of English Poes in all the times after. Chaucer died in the fourth year of this Kings reign, and being at Westminster, Gower, in this Kings ninth year, was buried at S. Mary Overy's Church in Southwark. And now come others to be remembered, who lived and died in this Kings time. Hugh Leqate, born in Hertfordshire, a Monk of St. Albans, who wrote Scholastic upon Bostius de Conclusione. Nicobur Garbom, born also in Hertfordshire, a Dominick Friar, and the French Kings Confessor, though an English man. Walter Dyer, so called of a Town in Norfolk, where he was born, Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster. Lawrence Holbeck, a Monk of Ramfey, who wrote an Hebrew Dictionarie. John Cotton Archibishop of Armagh. Richard Scrope, brother to William Scrope Lord Treasurer of England, made Archibishop of York; and writing an invective against King Henry, lost his head. William Thorpe, an earnell follower of John Wickliffe, for which he was committed to Salwood Castle, where he died. Stephen Pettington, born in Yorks. and Robert Mefed, a Carmelite Friar of Louth, both of them Controvers to King Henry the fifth. Bishop a Monk of the Abbey of Eber in Suffolke, who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church, and other Treatises. John Purvey

THE FIFTH.

HENRY of Monmouth (to call him before his reign he was born) eldest Son of King Henry the fourth, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England, to whom the Lords of the Realm swore Homage and Allegiance, before he was yet Crowned; an Honour never done before to any of his Predecessors: and afterwards on the ninth of April, in the year 1422. he was Crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Solemnities in such a state accostumed: And as the Scripture speaks of Saul, That as soon as Samuel had enuished him King, he had a new heart given him, and he became another man then he was before: so was it with this King Henry. For presently after his Coronation, he called before him all his old Companions, who had been frateres in melo with him, strictly charging them not to presume to come within ten miles of his Court, until such time as they had given good proof of their amendment in manners: and left any of them should pretend want of maintenance to be any cause of their taking ill courses, he gave to every one of them a competent maintenance where to subsist. And knowing (as he did) the fashion of the Scots and Welsh, that in times of change they would commonly take advantage, to make Inroads upon the Borders, he therefore caused Forts and Bulwarks in far places to be erected, and placed Garrisons in them, for preventing or repelling any such Incursions. Immediately after this, he called a Parliament, where a Subsidy was granted without asking; and in this Parliament the Commons began to harp upon their old string, of taking away the Temporalties of the Clergy: and the Bishopps fearing how it might take in the Kings ears, thought it best to divert him, by striking upon another string, which they knew would be more pleasing to him, which was to shew him the great right he had to the Crown of France, and therefore without exceeding the limits of the Towns of no great importance: To which K. Henry by the Archbishop of Canterbury made answer, That these were trifles, and that without yielding to his Demand, he would never desist from that he intended; and with this answer the French Ambassadors were dismissioned. It is said, that about this time, the Dauphin (who in the King of France his liege fees managed the State) sent to King Henry a Ton of Tennis Balls, in division of his youth, as fitter to play with them, then to manage Arms: which Predecessors by reason of other incumbrances forborne to prosecute their claim, yet he being free from all such incumbrances, had no less power then right to do it. This indeed struck upon the right string of the Kings inclination; for as he affected nothing more then true glory, so in nothing more than warlike actions. Hereupon nothing was now thought of, but the Conquest of France. First therefore he begins to alter in his Arms the bearing of Senese-de-Luces, and quartered the three Flower-de-Luces, as the Kings of France then bore them; and that he might not be thought to deal advantage, but to do it fairly, he sent Ambassadors to Charles the last King of France, requiring in peaceable manner the surrender of the Crown of France: which if he would yield unto, then King Henry would take to Wife his Daughter Katherine; but if he refused to do it, then King Henry would with Fire and Sword enforce it from him, or lose his life. The Ambassadors sent, were the Duke of Exeter, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord Grey, the Lord High Admiral, and the Bishop of Norwich, with five hundred Horse; who coming to the Court of Francis, were at first received and feated, with all the honour and show of kindnes that might be; but as soon as their Meffage was delivered, and that it was known what they came about, the Copy of their entertainement was altered, and they were sent away with as little Complement, as they were before received with honour; only told that the King would speedily make answer to the King their Master by his own Ambassadors: and speedily indeed he did it; for the Earl of Wenden, William Baratier Archbishop of Bouges, Peter Frese, Bishop of Lyseaux, with others, were arrived in England, as soon almost as the English were returned. But being come, the Archbishop of Bouges made a long Oration in the praise of Peace, concluding with the tender of the Lady Katherine, and 30,000 Crowns with her in Dover, besides some Towns of no great importance: To which K. Henry by the Archbishop of Canterbury made answer, That these offers were trifles, and that without yielding to his Demand, he would never desist from that he intended; and with this answer the French Ambassadors were dismissioned. It is said, that about this time, the Dauphin (who in the King of France his liege fees managed the State) sent to King Henry a Ton of Tennis Balls, in division of his youth, as fitter to play with them, then to manage Arms; which

Z. King
King Henry took in such scorn, that he promised with an oath, it should not be long ere he would cut such iron to pieces; and the bow arms in France should not be able to hold a shuttle to return them. And now all things are prepared and in the readiness for the King's journey into France, his men shipped, and himself ready to go on shipboard; when suddenly a Tresaf was discovered against his person, plotted by Richard Earl of Cambridge, Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Grey Earl of Northumberland, and plotted and procured by the French Agents. These being apprehended, and upon examination confessing the Tresaf, and the money (which was said to be a Million of Gold) by them for that end received, were all of them immediately put to death. From this Richard Earl of Cambridge, second Son of Edmund of Langley, did Richard afterward Duke of York claim and recover the Crown from the Lancastrian Family. This Execution done, and the winde blowing fair, King Henry weighs Anchor, and with a Fleet of 1200. Sail, (Grafton faith but 140, Ships) but Enguerrant faith, 1600. attend with fix thousand Spears, and 24000. Foot, besides Engineers and Labourers, he puts to Sea; and on our Lady Eve landed at Caen, where he made Proclamation, that no man upon pain of death should rob any church, or offer violence to any that were found unarmed: and from thence passing on, he besieged Harlton; which when no succour came within certain days agreed upon, the Town was surrendered and sacked. Of this Sir John he made the Duke of Exeter Captain, who left there for his Lieutenant, his John Faffif, with a Garrison of 1500. men. It is said that when King Henry entered Harlton, he passed along the streets bare-foot, until he came to the Church of St. Martin; where with great devotion he gave most humble thanks to God for this first achieved Enterprize. From hence he marched forward, and coming to the River of Suse, he found all the Bridges broken; whereupon he passed on to the Bridge of St. Maxence, where 8000 French appearing, he pitched his Camp, expecting to be fought with; and the more to encourage his men, he gave the Order of Knight hood to John Lord Ferrers of Groby, Reynold Grayflock, Perciv Temppe, Christopher Morely, Thomas Pickering, William Haldifton, Henry Martimer, John Halidau, Philip Hall; but not perceiving the French to have any mind to fight, he marched by the Town of Angers to Boves, and there stayed two days, expecting Battle; and from thence marched to Corly, there the Prelates of the Country, with certain men of Arms sent from the Dauphin, charged the right wing of the English, which was led by Hugh Stafford Lord Baerick, and won away his Standard, but was recovered again by John Browley of Browley, a Commander in the Lord Stafford's Regiment, who with his own hand slew him that had taken the Colours; and then taking them up, displayed the same, with fight whereof, the English were so encouraged, that they presently routed the French, and put them to flight; which valiant exploit, the Lord Staff- ford recompened, by giving to Browley an Annuity of fifty pounds a year out of his Lands in Staffordshire. After this the King marched towards Calais, and strictly observing his Proclamation against Church-robbing; that when one was complained of for having taken a silver Pice out of a Church, he not only caused the fame to be restored, but theouldier also to be hanged: which point of Discipline both kept the rest from offending in that kind, and drew the people of the Country, underhand to relieve his men with all things necessary. The French King hearing that King Henry had passed the River of Scène, by advice of his Council (who yet were divided in Opinion) sent Montjoy the French King at Arms to define King Henry, and to let him know he should be fought with; which King Henry, though his Army was much infected with Fevers, whereof the Earl of Stafford, the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Molins and Barrel, were lately dead; yet he willingly heard, and rewarded the Herald for his message; and first having cleared a passage over a bridge, where of necessity he was to pass, on the 29 of October, he passed over with his Army. At which time the Duke of York, that led the Rearward, had discovered the Enemy to come on space; whereof he sent word to the King, who thereupon made a stand: and appointing his Officers what course to hold, and encouraging his Souldiers, they all attended when the Batel should begin. The French Army was divided into three Battalions; in the first were placed eight thousand men at Arms, four thousand Archers, and fifteen hundred Cross-bows, the wings confiding to two thousand and two hundred men at Arms. This Battel was led by the Contable of France himself, the Duke of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Essex, Warwick, and Vendomme, the Duke of Anjou, the Lord Admiral of France, the Admiral Bourgeois, and others. The middle Battal in whose were more men at Arms, was commanded by the Dukes of Barre and Alsacen, and by the Earls of Vendomme, Saliss, Blamont, Grandpiles, and Rouex. In the Rearward were all the Remainder of the French Forces, guided by the Earls of Merle, Dampmaring, Faconbridge, and the Lord Lowrie, Captain of Ards; but the Frenchmen thus ordered, being six times as many as the English, (who were not above nine thousand) thought of nothing but of the booty they should get. In the mean time King Henry having made choice of a piece of ground half-fenced on his back with the Village, wherein they had reeled the night before, in both sides of the hedgerows and ditches, began there to order his Battel; but first he appointed an ambush of two hundred Archers, which upon a watch-word given, should discharge their whole flight on the whole flank of the Enemies Host. The Vaunt-guard confisting of Arbers only, was conducted by the Duke of York, who out of an heroic courage made suits for that place; with whom were joyed the Lords Beaumont, Willanghy, and Fansby. The main Battel was led by the King himself, which confised of Bill-men, and some Bow-men; with him were the Duke of Gloucester his Brother, brought into England, and the Dukes buried at Frodington in Northamp tonshire, the Earl at New-Elme in Oxfordshire.

About this time the Emperor Sigismund, Confingerman to King Henry, having been first in France, came accompanied with the Archbishop of Rheims, Ambassador from the French King, into England; for whom there were thirty great Ships sent from the King to wait him over : but approaching to land at Dover, the Duke of Gloucester, with a company of Gentlemen, having their Swords drawn, kept up to the knees in water, saying to him, That if he came as the Kings friend, he should be welcome; but if as claiming any jurisdiction, they would refile him: whereupon the Emperor renounced all Imperial Authority, and thereupon admitted to land, and received with as much honour as could be done him ; and afterward together with Albert Duke of Holland, who was lately likewise arrived at Veszprém, is elected commission of the Order of the Garter, and fate in their Cells at the follemony, whom King Henry accompanied to Calais, whether the Duke of Burgundy came to confirm the League concluded on beforehand by the Earl of Wark and him, concerning Flanders and Ariost only. In the meantime the French had hired divers Carricks and other great Ships of the Genoese and Italians, which joyning with the French Fleet, lay at the mouth of the River of Scyne, under the command of Jacques Ballard of Bourbon, to hinder all succours from coming to Harlow; but John Earl of Huntingdon (Sont to the Duke of Exeter beheaded at [nichelles] being bent to scourve the Coast, encountered with him, and after a long fight, took him Prifoner, and three of his great Carricks, with all the money for the half years pay of the Fleet, and finking three other of his Carricks, and dispersing the rest, cleared the mouth of the River, and then returned to the King at Southampton.
And now upon the twenty third of July, in the fourth year of his Reign, the King himself, with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Huntingdon, Wark, Devonshire, Salisbury, Suffolk, and Somerfell, the Lords Joffe, Willingham, Fice-Hugh, Clinton, Scoope, Mau-ters, Bonercler, Ferrier of Croby, Ferrers of Charley, Eunbone, Grey of Colvay, Sir Gilbert Uphor-vile, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and an Army confiding of twenty thousand five hundred and twenty-eight fighting men, besides a thousand Artifiers and Pyoneers, took shipping at Plymouth mouth, and upon the first of August landed in Normandy near to the Castle of Tongue, which he pretently besieged, and upon the ninth of August had it yielded to him, at which time the Earl of Salisbury took the Castle of Allerwills, which the King gave to him and to his heirs, being the first land given by the King in France.

At the winning of Tongue, the King made eight and twenty Knights; and from thence marched with his Army to Caen; where to prevent the Citizens from sallying out, he call'd up a Mount; and then making many assauts, but finding them to do little good, he cau'd his Pyoneers to undermine the Walls: which being done, upon the fourth of September, he oftered the Besieged their lives, if they would sumit; which they refusing, he thereupon made a fevw of a general assaut, whilst many of his men entred the City under the foundations of which the Duke of Clarence with his Company was the first: and they coming upon the back of those that defended the Walls, easily overcame them ; and then the whole Army entred without resistance. The next day the King cau'd all the principal men of the Town to come before him at their Senate house, where some of them for their stubborn refusing the grace he had offered them, were adjudged to death, and the rest fined: The spoil of the Town was distributed amongst the Soultiers.
The Captain of the Castle stood out a while: but being advertised that the King had sworn to shew no mercy, if he did not surrender, he gave twelve Hovileges, that if it were not relievved before the twentieth of September, he would then give it up, which not coming he performed; and so the King had possession both of Caen and the Castle.

And now Charles the new Dauphin, being but seventeenth years of age, and bare of money, had put into his possession all the Jewels, Plate, and Money of the Queen his Mother; which so incensed her against him, to do that he called a spight; she placed the Duke of Burgundy in chief authority about the King, who, by reason of his infirmity, was unable himself to manage the State; and the Duke having now the Sword in his hand, meant first to repel the growing boldness of the Dauphin, and afterward to repel the common Enemy: And the Dauphin likewise, envying the Dukes advancement above him, meant first to take down his swelling greatness, and afterward to fall upon the foreign Adversary. And thus while private respecting were preferred before publick, whilst the Duke and the Dauphin had their first intentions one against another, not looking King Henry, but in the second place, after their own turn served, an easy way was left for King Henry's proceedings, and he went on at his pleasure with small opposition. He sent the Duke of Clarence, who took in the City of Bayeux, as likewise the Duke of Gloucester the City of Lysieux; whilst himself remaining still at Caen, put out of the City the Natives that were importent or young Infans, to the number of 1500, and in their places put English people, and finding a great mass of Money and Plate, deposited by the Citizens in the Castle, he caufed the fame upon proof, to be respectively delivered to the right owners, upon condition they would acknowledge him for their Sovereign; which moderate and just dealing won him more hearts than the force of his Arms had won him knees; especially with the Normans, who are easier to be drawn with gentleness and love, than forced by violence and compulsion. From hence, the King conferred, the first of October to Carfye Castle, which within three days yeilded. The fourth of October he came to Argentan, which not relieved by a day agreed upon, was likewise surrendered. The Town of Alen fon endured eight days siege, but in the end did as other their neighbour Towns had done. From Alen fon the Earl of Salisbury was sent to Foyler, to view the strenght thereof, whom the King prefently followed, where the besieged concluded, if it were not relieved before the second of January, then to yield up the Town. No relief coming, the Town was yeilded up, and soon after upon the like terms, the Castle. From hence the King returned to Caen, to put in execution a Proclamation he had formyly made; That if the Inhabitants of Normandy that were fled, returned, not by a day affigned, he would then grant their Lands to hisouldiers: and thence upon he gave to the Duke of Clarence, during life, the Vicinities of Acre, Orrey, and Poitou, with all the Lands of those that were not returned according to the Proclamation. All the Lent the King lay at Bayeux, whilst his Navy still kept the Seas, and daily took many French Ships, but on the sixteenth of July such a Tempest took them, that they were driven to fall in with Southampton; and yet, with all their diligence, could not so save themselves, but that two Ballingers, and two great Carricks laden with Merchandize were in the very Haven drownd. In the mean time the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Talbot besieged the strong Castle of Dinan, the Duke of Clarence took Courten and Bures; and many other being taken, as Chambuis, Bichetson, Harcourt, Faneum, Crewe, Artillery, Bages, in all of them he placed Captains and Garrisons, and particularly in Frenay, Sir Robert Brent, late made Viscount. The Duke of Gloucester also, with the Earl of March, and the Lord of Colnau, took in all the Isle of Confontantin, except Cherburgh, and then returned to the King but was sent back to take in that City also; which after some time, when no relief came, was, together with the Castle, likewise surrendred; although by this time the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin, by mediation of the Pope, were reconciled and began to join their forces to make resistance. And now the Duke of Exeter the King's Uncle, with a supply of fifteen thousand men out of England, came to the King, who presently took in the City of Erneux; and the Earl of Ryne, the strong Castle of Millle le Feto.

The next thing attempted, was the siege of Rouen, a City strongly fortified, both with Walls and Ditches; and to which there was no convenient passage, but by the City of Looysies; to this City therefore he first layes siege, which when relief came not within a time agreed on, was surrendred; and yet there was another impediment to be removed, a stone bridge which hindered the approach to Rouen, being exceeding strongly guarded; For this, King Henry deviled floats of wicker covered with Beasts Hides, by which the Duke of Clarence with his quarter paffed the River, and then laid siege to the Town on that side, and for the other side, he had other devices made with Hogheads and Pipes, failed to Fir Poles and Barges, with which he passd his men over at pleasure; and in the mean time he caufed divers of his Souldiers that could swim, to make them of passing the River three miles off another way; with which the French men being deluded, drew all their Forces together, and by this means the Fort being left unfurnished of sufficient guard, was presently forced to surrender, and the Souldiers were taken to the Kings Grace. The Bridge being thus gained, the Duke of Exeter was feen, and with him Windfor the Herald, to summon the Citizens to surrender the Town; who not only gave proud answers, but also made a sally through, with the lots of thirty of their men. Upon this obstinacy of theirs, the King presently orders his siege; his own quarter was the Charterie, the Duke of Clarence at St. Geroff, the Duke of Exeter at Port St. Dennis, and every great Commander had his quarter affigned, as the City was begin round, and a great chain of iron fet upon piles, and a strong wooden Bridge for passage from one Camp to the other, was made over the River. At this time the Earl of Kilmarnock with sixteen hundred lads, came to the King, and had their quarter affigned them, who behaved themselves with great valour. The Kings Conin geman, the King of Portugal, sent likewise a Navy of Ships to the mouth of the River Sein, which stopped all passage of succour to Rouen. Many policies and practices were used But nothing prevailed till at last, Letter.

The Captain humour, but none prevailed, till famine forced it; for there being in 20,000, pertons at the beginning of the siege, and the siege continuing long, it grew to that extremity, that the Citizens drank nothing but vinegar and water, and had little to eat but Rats and Mice, Cats and Dogs, and such like: Great numbers of the poorer sort were thrust our of the City, who not suffered to pass the English Army, miserably perished; only upon Christmas day, in honour of Christ's Birth, the King relieved and suffered to pass as many as were at first put out, but nor others that were put out the second time; but suffered them to perish.

In this difhres, a Parley is required by the Citizens; who notwithstanding their misery, yet stood upon such high terms, that nothing was concluded, only a Truce for eight days was granted them; the eight days ended, and nothing yet agreed upon amongst themselves, they crave one day longer, and neither that day could anything be agreed on; then they crave four days more, in which the multitude and common people so pressed the Magistrates, and Governors of the City, that on the fourth day, being about the nineteenth of January, the City was surrendered, and the Inhabitants themselves, and all their Goods were yielded to the King's mercy; the Duke of Exeter was appointed to take possession, who accordingly entered with his Souldiers. The next day after being Friday, the twentieth of January, the King himself made his entry, with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Bishop, sixteen Barons, and others, and was by the Clergy conducted to our Lady Church; where after publick thanksgiving, he took Homage and Fealty of the Burgesses and Inhabitants; making Proclamation, that all that would come and acknowledge him to be their Sovereign, should enjoy the benefit of his Protection, and retain their possessions; whereupon many came in, and many Towns were surrendered. In this time of the Kings lying at Roan, the Earl of Salisbury took in Eonfle, Munfter de Villerius, Eves, and New Caíle; the Duke of Clarence took Vernon, and Nano; and the Earl of Warwick, la Riche Gyan.

And now the Duke of Burgundi seeing the great successes of King Henry, could think of no better way for his own safety, than to make a reconciliation between the two Kings; to which end, Ambassadors are sent to procure their meeting: at which time, King Henry for their service already performed, and in hope of more hereafter, made the valiant Gascoigne Captain le Beaup, Earl of Longueville, Sir John Gray Earl of Tankerville, and the Lord Beauchier Earl of Eove. Upon the last of May, King Henry accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence, Gloucester, and Exeter, his Uncle Beaup, the Bishop of Wincheffer, with the Earls of March, and Salisbury, and a thousand men at Arms; entered the place appointed for the meeting of the two Kings. The French Queen (her Husband being taken with the Frenzy) with the Duke of Burgundi, and the Earl of St. Paul, and a company of Ladies: amongst whom, as a bait to intangle the Kings affection, was the Kings Dauphiner, the beautiful Lady Katharine; with whose sight, though the King was marvellously taken, yet he made no show thereof, till other things should be agreed upon; but the Dauphin having made means to the Duke of Burgundie to hinder all agreement, nothing was effected: whereupon at their parting, the King told the Duke, that he would have both the Lady, and all his other demands; or else drive the King of France out of his Kingdom, and him out of his Dukedom. Upon this, the Duke thought it best to agree with the Dauphin; and upon this, the sixth of July Articles of their reconciliation are figed and sealed. In the mean time the Earl of Longueville surprized the Town of Ponthoys, but had scarce been able to make good the surprize, if the Duke of Clarence had not come to his succour. From then the Duke marched to Paris, and there stayed two days; but perceiving no show of sally to be made, he returned to Ponthoys, whither the King himself came; and from thence marching on, took in the Castle of Fuyson Villiers; and on the left of Angiis, the Castles of Gyfors, and Guyards, and Damal: so that now all Normandy (Mons St. Michael only excepted) was reduced to the possession of the King of England, which had been wrongfully detainted from him, ever since the year 1107.

The Dauphin all this while, though outwardly having made a reconciliation with the Duke of Burgundy, yet inwardly bearing a spleen against him, intended nothing so much as his destruction: which to effect, he procured a meeting between the Duke and him, and all the Peers of the Realm at Mannfrew; where the Duke though humbling himself in reverence to the Dauphin upon his knee, was most barously murdered; which act, was so much the left to be pitied in the Duke, by how much in the like kinde, upon the like interview, he had caused Lewis the Duke of Orleans to be murdered. But though this barbarous act might justly incence Philip Earl of Carobis the Duke of Burgundie's Heir to seek revenge; yet as a wife and politick Prince, he forbore for the present, to make any shew of choler or dissemblance; and considering with himself, that difference between the Dauphin and him, would but give King Henry the greater advantage, he endeavoured to propice an overture of Peace between the two Kings: And to that end Ambassadors are sent from the King of France, and the young Duke of Burgundie, whom the King kindly entertained, but seemed to intiate unto them, that he could give no great credit to their propositions, unless the Lady Katharine would join in them, whose innocence he knew would never abufe him. Whilst these things are in agitation, the Earl of Salisbury took in Trefney, and the Earls Marshal and Huntington, entered into Mann, who approaching thence, was encounetered by the Forces of the Dauphin, whereof they flew five thousand, and took two hundred prisoners; for which, news being brought to Roan, whither King Henry was come to solemnize the Feast of Cristh's Birth, thanksgiving to God was publicly made; and in the instant thereof, arrived other Ambassadors from the King and Queen of France, and a Letter from the the Lady Katherine to King Henry, was secretly by the Bishop of Arras delivered. The conclusion of all was, that the King of England should speed himself to Troyes, there to be espoused to the Lady Katherine; and to have assurance of the Crown of France, after the decease of the present King Charles. Whereupon with a Guard of fifteen thousand choice Souldiers, accompanied with the Duke of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Huntingdon, Longueville, Tankerville, and青山, the King of England came to Troyes in Campaige, where on the 18th day of July was married by the Duke of Burgagine, and divers of the French Nobility, who attended him to the Palace, where the Queen with her Daughters, the Dutchess of Burgagine, and the Lady Katherine, gave him Princeley entertainment; and after some intercourse of complement between the Princes and the Ladies, King Henry tendered to the Lady Katherine, a Ring of great value, which she (not without some blushing) received; and after which, upon the twentieth day of May, she was affianced to him in St. Peter's Church, and on the third of June following, the marriage was solemnized; and therewithal King Henry was published to be the only Regent of the Realm, and Heir apparent to the Crown of France: the Articles whereof, with all convenient expedition were Proclaimed both in England and in France, and the two Kings, and all their Nobles, and other Subjects of that Realm, were fummoned to observe them; and in particular the Duke of Burgagine.

And thus was the Salique Law violated, and the Heir Male put by his Succession in the Crown, which the Genius of France will not long endure, a while it must; and therefore the main endeavour of both Kings now is, to keep him down, whom they had put down. And thereupon on the fourth of June, King Henry with the French King, James King of Scots, who was newly arrived, the Duke of Burgagine, the Prince of Orange, one and twenty Earls, five and forty Barons, with many Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army consisting of French, English, Scots, Irish, and Dutch, to the number of six hundred thousand, marched towards the Dauphin; and upon the seventh day laid siege to the Town of Sens, which sided with the Dauphin, which after four days siege was yielded up. From thence they removed, having the Duke of Bedford in their company, who was newly come out of England with large supplies of men and money to Monsieur; which was taken by Escalado, only the Castle held out still; during the siege whereof, King Henry created an Officer of Arms, to be King of Heralds over the English men, and intituled him Carter; whom he sent with offers of mercy to the Castle, but was by the Captain thereof reproachfully upbrised; for punishment of which his preface was a Gibbet erected, and in view of Mountier GUISTREY, the said Captain, and twelve of his friends were executed. Whereupon those of the Castle treated for Peace; but the King in eight days together would not grant so much as a Parly so that after six weeks siege, they were enforced, (their lives saved) linearly to yield. From thence the King marched to Meaux upon Senne, and beleaguered it the thirtieth of July; the Captain whereof was Barbeau a Guise of, no lets politick than valiant, who countermined some, and drop other Mines made by the English, and fought hand to hand in the Barriers with King Henry; yet at last through famine and Petilence was forced to yield; but being suspected to have had a hand in the matter of the Duke of Burgagine, he was sent Prisoner to Paris; and presently the Son, both the Kings with their Queens, the Duke of Burgagine, and his Dutchess, with a Royal Train came thither. As for the French King, he was lodged in the house of St. Paul, and the King of England in the Castle of Louvres. And here the three States of France anew under their hands and seals in most authentick manner, ratified the former Articles of King Henry's Succession in the Crown of France; the Instruments whereof were delivered to the King of England, who sent them to be kept in his Treasury at Westminster.

And now King Henry began to exercise his Regency, and as a Badge of his Authority, he caused a new Coin which was called a Saliter, to be made, wherein the Arms of France and England were quartered hamp: He placed and displaced divers Officers, and appointed the Duke of Exeter with five hundred men, to the Guard of Paris: He awarded out Precedents against the Dauphin, to appear at the Marble Table at Paris, which he not obeying, Sentence was denounced against him, as guilty of the Murther of the Duke of Burgagine, and by the Sentence of the Parliament, he was banished the Realm.

After this, the King making Thomas Duke of Clarence his Lieutenant General of France and Normandy, on the 6th of January, with his beloved Queen Katherine left Paris, and went to Amiens, and from thence to Calais; and thence landing at Dover, came to Canterbury, and afterward through London to Westminster, where the Queen upon St. Matthew's day, the fourth of February was Crowned; the King of Scots sitting at dinner in his State, but on the left hand of the Queen, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Kings Unkle the Bishop of Winchester being on the right hand. All were served with covered mebbles of Silver, but all the Peale was Fish, in observation of the Lent leason.

After this the King took his Progrese through the Land, hearing the complaints of his poor Subjects, and taking order for administering of Justice to high and low; and then met the Queen at Leicester, where they kept their Easter.

In the meantime, the Duke of Clarence making a Road into Anjou, came to the City of Amours, where he Knighted Sir William Ray, Sir Henry Goddard, Sir Rowland Pys, Sir Thomas Beaumont his natural Son; and returning home laden with prey, was advertised that the Duke of Alain was intended to intercept his passage; whereupon he sent the Scout-Mater, Andrew Figy, a Lumbard, to discover the face of the Enemy, who being corrupted, brought report, that their number was but small, and those but ill ordered; that if he presently charged there

there could be no reftinance. The Dukes Credulity caused him to draw all his Horfes together; and leaving his Bows and Bills behind, which were his chiefeft strength, with his Horfe only he makes towards the Enemy: but the Traitor leading to a strait, where by his appointment an Ambuffad was laid, that the Duke could neither retreat, nor flee, he foone perceiued the Treachery, but finding no remedy, he manfully set Spurs to his Horfe, and charged upon the Enemy; but over-laid with multitude, and wearied with fight, was himself, with the Earl of Tenterden, the Lord Suffolk, the Earl of Argyll, Sir John Lumley, Sir John Frewen, and above two thousand Engife Arm. The Earls of Saffcroft, Suffolk, and Pech, Sir John Berkley, Sir Ralph Nichol, Sir William Base, and 60, Gentlemen were taken Prisoners. The body of the Duke of Clarence was by Sir John Beaufort his base Son, (the Duke dying without other issue) convey'd into England, and buried at Canterbury besides his Father: and this disaster happened upon Easter-Eve. The King was at Beverley when he heard of his Brothers death, and prently thereupon dispatched away Edward Earl of Mortaigne into Normandy, making him Lieutenant thereof; and then calls his High Court of Parliament at Welfmifor, requiring aid of money, to revenge his Brothers death, which was readily granted: and the King thus provided, sent his Brother the Duke of Bedford with an Army to Calleie, confenting of four thoufand men at Arms, and four and twenty thoufand Archers, whom about the middle of May he followeth himself, and safely arriving at Calleie, hasted to relieve Charters, which the Dauphin with feventhoufand men had besieged: but hearing of the Kings coming was retir'd to Tours. The King of Scots, with the Duke of Glouftr, about the eighth of July higefled Bruns; which agreed, if it were not relieved by the twentieth of that month, then to surrender it: no relief coming it was surrendred. The King pursu'd the Dauphin from place to place, but could not overtake him, but in the way surpriz'd the Town of Bangey, where all that craved it, he took to mercy, as likewife he did at Ringemans; from thence he went to Orleans; and from thence to Vignes St. Yon, and from thence to Paris; where having fitted himself with supplies, he went and fare down before Aix in Braye, which after some opposition, he also took; and thereby had poffeffion of all the Fortresses in the Ifle of France, in Lemanus, in Braye, and in Champagne.

Upon St. Nicholas day, in the year 1423, Queen Katherine was brought to bed of a Son at Windof; and King Henry proflated speech of him.

Of Laws and Ordinances made by him, or in his time.

He ordained the King of Jerusalem, which is called Gortis. In his ninth year in a Parliament holden at Westminster, it was ordained that no man should receive any Gold in payment, unless it were weight; and thereupon were appointed balances and weights.

An Act made in the thirteenth year of King Richard the second, which disabled the Alien-Religious to enjoy any Benefits within England, was in the beginning of this King's Reign put in execution; and further, this King excluded also the French from all preferment Ecclesiastical; and those Priores Ailens Conventual, who had instituted and induction, were bound to put in security, not to disclose, or to be disclosed, the Counsel and secrets of the Realm.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In the beginning of his Reign, the Wickliffite increased greatly, of whom Sir John Oldesfile was chief; who by marriage of a Kinswoman of the Lord Cobham's of Calking in Kent, obtained that Title: This Knight being very valorous, and in great favour with the King, was in a Synod at London accused for maintaining of Wickliffe's Doctrine; whereof the King being informed, sent for him, and instantly dealt with him to submit himself to the Censure of the Church: But Sir John Oldesfile told the King, that he owed his subjection only to his Majesty; and as for others, he would stand for the Truth against them, to the uttermost of his life. Upon this he was served by Proecels to appear in the Archbishop's Court, and not appearing, was condemned of Contumacy; and afterwards in a Synod at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced to be an Heretic; who then enacted that Decree, That the Holy Scriptures ought not to be Translated into the English tongue. But mark the Judgement that fell upon his own Tongue, whose Roots and Blade shortly after (as is recorded) grew to big in his mouth and threat, that he could neither speak, nor swallow down meat, but in horror lay languishing, till at last fared by famine, he so died. In the mean time Sir John Oldesfile wrote his Belief, and preferred it himself to the King; which the King would in no wise receive, but suffered him in his Prebend and Privy Chamber to be suppressed; who appearing before the Archibishop, after divers examinations, was condemned of Heresie, and committed to the Tower of London, from whence shortly after he escaped, and got into Wales. The King by his Proclamation, promised a thousand Marks to any that should bring him in; but so much was his Doctrine generally favoured, that the King's officer was not much regarded, but he continued four years after undiscovered: At last he was taken in the Borders of Wales, within a Lordship belonging to the Lord Pever, who brought him to London, before the Duke of Bedford, Regent of the Realm; where in the end he was condemned, and finally was drawn from the Tower to St. Giles Field, and there hanged in a Chain by the middle, and after confessed by fire, the Gallows and all. At the time of his first Conviction, four years before, it was rumored, that twenty thousand men in arms were assembled in St. Giles Field; whereupon the King, at midnight, himself in person went thither, where he found many indeed, who upon examination confessed, that they came to meet their Captain Sir John Oldesfile, but without any intent against the King: yet was Sir Roger Aiton, and eight and twenty others of them apprehended, and executed in Smithfield; and all the Prisons in and about London were filled with them.

In his third year, the Order of Church Service throughout England, was changed from the use of Paulus to the use of Salisbury, to the great dilkilling of many in those days.

In his fourth year, a Council was holden at Constance, whether he sent Ambassadors, the Earl of Warden, the Bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Westminster: In which Council it was decreed, that England should have the Title of the English Nation, and should be accounted of the five principal Nations in rank before Spain; which often before had been moved, but never granted till then. And herein were all Wickliffe's Positions condemned: Also John Hus, and Hierome of Prague (notwithstanding the Emperour's false Conduct) were both of them burned. In this Council, the Schism of Anti-Popes, which had continued the space of nine and twenty years, was reformed. Benedict the 13. had been elected by the Spanish; Gregory the 12. by the French: John the 24. by the Italians: And now in this Council begun in February, 1414, and continued above three years; wherein were assembled, beside the Emperour, the Pope, and the Pallgrave of Retha, four Patriarchs, seven and forty Archbishops, one hundred and three Bishops, Cardinals, and Barons with their attendances about thirty thousand: The foresaid elected Popes were all put down, or else resigned: and in the place, as legitimate Pope, was elected Osbo Colonna by the name of Martin the Fifth.

In this year also fell out an accident, which shews the strict observance of Ecclesiastical Censures in those days. The wives of the Lord Strange, and Sir John Truell of Warmington in Cheshire, striving for place at a Sermon in St. Dunstan's Church in the East, their Husbands being present, fell themselves to striving in their Wives behalf, and great part-taking there was on both sides, some slain, and many wounded. The Delinquents were committed to the Counter, the Church fuppended: and upon examination, the Lord Strange being found guilty, was by the Archiprnce of Canterbury adjourned to this Penance, which was accordingly performed: The Parfon of St. Dunstan went before, after whom followed all the Lords Servants in their Shirts; after them went the Lord himself bareheaded, with a Wax Taper in his hand; then followed the Lady barefooted: A and then left, came the Archdeacon Reynolds Renewd: in which order they went from Pauls, where the Sentence was given, to St. Dunstan's Church. Where at the re-ballowing thereof, the Lady filled all the Vessels with water; and according to the Sentence, offered to the Altar an Ornament of the value of ten pounds; and the Lord a Pice of silver of five pounds. A Penance no doubt which the Lord and the Lady would have redeemed with a great deal of money, if the Discipline of the Church had in those days allowed it: but it seems the com-putation of Penance was not as yet come in use.

In his ninth year, in a Parliament at Leicester, a hundred and ten Priories alient were suppressed, because they spoke ill of his Conquests in France; and their possessions were given to the King: but by him, and King Henry the sixth were afterward given to other Monasteries, and Colleges of learned men.

Works of Piety by him, or others in his time.

This King re-edified his Royal Manor, which was then called Shenew, now Richmond, and founded two Monasteries not far from it; the one of Carthusians, which he named Bathleum: the other of Religious men and women of the Order of St. Bridget, which he named Bosom: He also founded the Brotherhood of St. Giles without Cripplegate in London. In the second year of his Reign, Moor-gate near to Coleman-street was first made, by Thomas Fawkener Mayor of London, who caused also the Ditches of the City to be cleaned, and a common Privy that was on the Moore without the Wall, to be taken down, and another to be made within the City upon Wallbrook, into which he caused the water of the City to be turned by Grates of Iron, in divers places. In his fifth year, William of Sevenoke Mayor of London, founded in the Town of Sevenoke a Free School, and thirteen Alm-houses. This man was found at Sevenoke in Kent, a new born Infant of unknown Parents, but by charitable people was Chriftened and brought up, bound Prentice in London, and came at last to be Mayor of the City. Alfo Robert Chichely Mayor of London gave liberally to the Alms-houses founded by his brother Henry Chichely, Arch Bishop of Canterbury, for Higham Ferres in Northamptonshire, where they were born. But Henry Chichely the Arch Bishop founded two Colleges in Oxford; one called Bernard College, renewed by Sir Thomas White, and named St. John's College; the other called All-Souls, which continueth at this day as he left it. Alfo John Kempe, Arch Bishop of Canterbury, converted the Parish Church of Wye in Kent, where he was born, into a College of Secular Priests.

Casualties happening in his time.

In the fifth year of his Reign, a great part of the City of Norwich was burnt, with all the house of the Friars Preachers, and two Friers of that Order. In his third year, on the Feast of the Purification, seven Dolphins came up the River of Thames, whereof four were taken.

Of his Wife and Issue.

He married Katherine the Daughter of King Charles, the sixth of France, who was his Queen two years and about three months, married at Troy in Champagne the third day of June, 1420. and afterward February the fourteenth Crowned at Westminster. She surviving King Henry, was re-married to Owen Tudor an Esquire of Wales, who pretended to be descended from Cadwallader the ancient King of Wales, though some write him to be the Son of a Brewer, whose meaner of Eilata was re-compened by the delicacy of his perfomage; so absolute in all the lineaments of his body, that the only contemplation of it might well make her forget all other circumstances. By him she had three Sons, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen, and a Daughter that lived but a while. Her Son Owen took the Habit of Religion at Westminster, the other two were by King Henry the sixth (their half-Brother) advanced in honour. Edmund was created Earl of Rich mond, and marrying the sole Heir of John Bradport Earl of Somer-fet, was Father by her of the five Sons, and of the Queen, called the seventh, King of England, the only Heir of the House of Lancaster. Jasper his second Son was first created Earl of Pembroke, and after Duke of Bedford, but died without lawful Issue. This Queen, either for Devotion, or her own safety, took into the Monastery of Ber mondsey in Southwark; who dying the second of January, 1436. she was buried in our Ladies Chappel within S. Peter's Church at Westminster: whose Corps taken up in the Reign of King Henry the seventh, her Grand-child, (when he laid the Foundation of that admirable Structure) and her Coffin placed by King Henry her Husband's Tomb, hath ever since remained, and never since re-buried, where it standeth (the cover being loose) to be seen and handled of any that will. By her King Henry had only one Son, named Henry, who succeeded him in the Kingdom.

He was tall of stature, lean of body, and his bones but small, but strongly made, somewhat long necked, black hair'd, and very beautiful of face, swift in running so as he with two of his Lords, without Bow or other Engine, would take a wide Buck or Doe in a large Park. He delighted in Songs and Musical Instruments, infomuch that in his Chappel amongst his private Prayers, he used certain Psalms of David, translated into English Metre by John Lydgate Monk of Bury. And indeed it may be truly said of him as was said of Aenas: Qui justius alter, Nee pictate swn, nee bello major arma; for he seldom fought battle where he got not the Victory; and never got Victory whereof he gave not the Glory to God, with publick Thanksgiving. He was a better man, a King then a Subject; for till then he was not in his right Orly, and therefore no mar- vail if he were something exorbitant. He was of a merciful disposition, but not to the prejudice of Wildom: as thinking wife cruelty to be be better than foolish pity. He was no less politick then valiant, for he never fought Barset, nor won Town, wherein he prevailed not as much by Stratagem as by Force. He was so temperate in his diet, and so free from Vain-Glory, that we may truly say, he had something in him of Cæsar which Alexander the Great had not, that he would not be drunk; and something of Alexander the Great, which Cæsar had not, that he would not be flatter'd. He was indeed a great affecter of Glory, but not of the Glory, the blazon of mens mouths, but of the Glory that fills the fame of Time. He died of full years, though not full of years: if he had lived longer, he might have gone over the fage again, but could not have gone further. If his love were great to Military men, it was not small to Clergy-men; incommas much as many he was called the Prince of Priests.

Of his Death and Burial.

Some fay he was poynoned, which Polydore Virgil affirms, was much suspect'd. The Scots write that he died of the Difeafe called Saint Piace, which is a Paffie and a Cramp: Enquiries faith he died of St. Anthony's fire: But Peter Baffet Efaqiire, who at the time of his death was his Chamberlain, affirmeth that he died of a Pleurifie, which at that time was a ficknefs strange and but little known. Being dead, his body was embalmed and clo'd in lead; and laid in a Charter Royal richly apparell'd in cloth of Gold, was conveyed from Bze de Vincennes to Paris, and so to Rouen, to Alberville, to Calais, to Dover, and from thence through London to Westminster, where it was interred next beneath King Edward the Confeflor; upon which, Tomb Queen Katherine cauf'd a Royal Picture to be laid, covered all over with Silver Plate gilt, but the head thereof altogether of Maffie Silver: All which at that Abbeys Suppofition were faecularily broken off and transferred to prophaner ufe. He died the last day of August, in the year one thousand four hundred twenty two, when he had reigned nine years and five months, lived eight and thirty years: though fome fay, two years fewer.

Of Men of Note in his time.

Men of Valour in his time were fo frequent, that we may know it to be a true faying, Regni Exemplum; and men of learning, likewife in fuch numbers, that we may know the Prince to have been their Patron: Firit Aude Lin, a Carmelit Fryer in that Town, who wrote many Treatifes; Then Thomas Otterton a Francifcan Fryer, who wrote an History of England; Then John Segard, who kept a School in Norwich, and wrote Landy Treatifes, reproofing as well the Monks and Priests, as Poets for writing of filly Virfes. Robert Roff a Carmelit Fryer in Norwich, who writing many Treatifes, yet faid nothing against the Wickliffites. Richard Gayfer born in Norfolk, a man of great Nobleness of Life, favouring (though fecretly) the Doctrine of Wickliff: William Wallis a Black Fryer in Lyn, who made a Book of Moralizations upon Ovid's Metamorphofes; William Taylor a Priet and Master of Art in Oxfard, a stedfast follower of Wickliff's Doctrine, and burn't for the fame at Smithfield, in London, the falt year of this King's Reign, Bartholomew Flourian, called fo of a Treatife which he wrote called Florvium; who wrote also another Treatife of Abifnence, wherein he reproveth the corrupt manners of the Clergy, and the prefiling of the Fryers Mendicants. Also Titus Livius de Foro Liviii, an Italian born, but faying he was resident here, and wrote the life of this King, it is not unfit to make mention of him in this place: also many others.

KING HENRY

THE SIXTH.

Here hath been a Race of Princes, of which for three Generations together, it might be said rightly, Pulcheriam Proelis, Magnanimus Heres not maliciosus Anon; For King Edward the third had many Sons, not inferior in Valour to the many Sons of King Priamus, nor excelling his valiant Son Hector, having so equal a match for him as Edward the Black Prince, who wanted but an Homer to have been an Achilles. Then John of Gaunt likewise had divers Sons, men as valorous as any that age afforded. Then Henry the Fourth had four Sons, of so Heroical Disposition all, that you might know them all to be his Sons, only King Henry the Fifth to be his eldest. And now that in him the Heroical nature was come to the height, it degenerated again in King Henry the Sixth, which must needs be attributed to the Mothers side; who though in her felt she was a Princess of a noble Spirit, yet being the Issue of a crazy Father, what marvel if she proved the Mother of a crazy Issue? And yet even this Issue of hers, a Prince no doubt, of excellent parts, in their kind, though not of parts kindly for a Prince; in a private man prative-worthy enough, but the Sword of a King required a harder metal than the soft temper of King Henry the Sixth was made of; and in him we may see the fulfilling of the Text: Vae Cen/ium Rex est puér, We to that Nation whose King is a child; for he was not above eight months old, when he succeeded his Father in the Kingdom. Although that Text perhaps is not meant so much of a Child in years, for which there may be helps by good Protectors; as of a Child in abilities of ruling, whereas though possibly there may, yet probably there can be no sufficient supply: of which in this King we have a pregnant example; for as long as he continued a child in years, so long his Kingdoms were kept flourishing by the providence of his careful Unkles; but as soon as he left being a Child in years, and yet continued a Child in ability of Ruling, then presently began all things In pejas ruers, or uro infidiosu referre, all things went to wrack both in France and England. And thus much was necessary to be said by way of a Preface to that great fall as it were of Nisus, in King Henry the Fifth.

Henry called of Windsor, because born there, the only Child of King Henry the Fifth, as yet scarce nine months old, succeeded his Father, and was proclaimed King of England on the last of August, in the year 1422, by reason of whose Infancy King Henry his Father had before, by his Will appointed; and now the Lords by their consent confirmed the Regency of France to John Duke of Bedford, the Government of England to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, the Guard of his Person to Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chancellor; wherein it was wisely provided that one man should not rule all, left it should prove a spur to aspiring, and withal stay them from envying another one, when many were alike placed in the highest form of Authority: And indeed they all carried themselves so uprightly and carefully in their places, that it well appeared the trust reposed in them by the dying King, had made a strong impression of love and loyalty towards his Son.

The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to keep that by the Sword, which King Henry the Fifth by his Sword had gotten; wherein he had many and great Affiliates, specially the two terrors of France, Thomas Montague Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot: and amongst the French themselves the Duke of Burgoyne, a friend no less powerful, then firm unto him. The Dauphin also (now crowned King at Poitiers) and called Charles the seventh of France, his Father being newly dead; within a little more then a month after King Henry had likewise great affiliates, the Duke of Alanson, and many other Peers of France, and of the Scots many, and some perhaps of the English that took part with him; by means whereof the game of Fortune was a long time played between them with great variety. The first act of the Duke of Bedford's Regency, was an Orac, which he made to the French in Paris, which wrought this good effect; that King Henry is proclaimed King of England, and of France, and that French Lords as were present did their Homages, and took their Oaths to be true unto him. The first act of hospitality was performed by the new King of England, who sends the Lord Granville to Pont Meulan, who surprized it, putting all the English Souldiers to the Sword; but the Regent sending thither Thomas Montague Earl of Salisbury, so strongly beleaguered it, that the Lord Granville not only subordinated it, but swore Allegiance (though he kept it not) to the King of England. From thence the Earl marched to Seine, which he took by assault; and The Reign of King Henry the Sixth.

At this time the Regent, the Duke of Burgoyne, John Duke of Bedford, and his Brother-in-law the Earl of Richmond, (who revolted afterward to the new King of France, and was by him made Conable of France) met at Luxembourg, and there restored the old Laws, but further enlarged it, to the offensive and defensive respectively: and to make the friendship the more firm, the Regent married Anne the Sibyl of the Duke of Burgoyne at Troyes. In this mean time the Parliamen taking advantage of the Regent's absence, conspired to have let in the new King to Paris: but the day before the night appointed for his admission, the Regent with his power entered, apprehended the Conspirators, and put them to public execution. This done, he furnished all the Ports, and places of strength with English men, and sent Sir John Fastolf, who took in Place, and Conwy, two strong Castles; whilst himself with his Forces took in Trunxlen, and Bray upon Seine.

The Contable of France the mean while with the new King's Forces, laid siege to Cravant in Burgoyne; but the Regent sent thither the Earl of Salisbury, who set upon the French, and after a long fight, putting them to flight, flew about 15,000 Knights and Gentlemen of note, and three thousand common Souldiers. Scots and French, took prisoners the Contable himself, the Earl of Vendome, Sir Alexander Alerdy, Sir Lewis Ferigay, and two and twenty hundred Gentlemen. Of the English part, were slain Sir John Grey, Sir William Hall, Sir Gilbert Halsal, Richard of Maddock, and one and twenty hundred Souldiers. From thence the Earl led his Forces to Montaguglion, and sate down before it, which after five months siege he took, whilst the Duke of Suffolk took in the two strong Castles of Conwy, and de Rocha. Whilst these things are done in France, in England the Protector ransomed and enlarged the young King of Scots, James the first (who by the face of eighteen years had been kept a Prisoner) which he did out of opinion, that he might withdraw the Scots out of France, taking Home and Fealty of English, they fought by Scotland; in these words, 1 James Stuart, King of Scots, shall be true and faithful to your Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Sovereign Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my fidelity for the said Kingdom, which I hold and claim of you, and shall do you service for the same, so God me help, and these holy Evangelists and therewithall, with content of all the Nobility, the Protector gave him to Witle, Jane Daughter to the deceased Duke of Somerset, and Conin-german to the King, with a large Dowry, and married them at St. Mary Overies in Southwark; yet all this course could not keep him afterward from being unfaithful, and unthankful.

And now the Protector sent over to the Regent ten thousand well furnished Souldiers, with which fresh succours he won many Towns and places of strength; which the French feeling, and finding themselves too weak by plain force to withstand the English, made peace, and recovered it; and that done, the Regent beheaded Ternay, and by secret mining, and violent Batteries, he broke the Walls, that they agreed to yield it up, if not relieved by a certain time. Whereupon the Duke of Alenfon with sixteen thousand French came to the rescue; but perceiving the English prepared to receive them, he wheeled about to Vernon, and srove to the Townmen that he had put the Regent to flight, and rescued Ternay, which they believing, rendered up Vernon to him; but the Regent followed him thither, when by the encouragement of some fresh Companies of Scots come to his succour, he came to a Battle in the Field, where the English, with the Loss of two thousand one hundred common Souldiers, and two of the Nobility, the Lord Dudley, and the Lord Charleton, got the honour of the day; and slew of their Enemies, five Earls, two Viscounts, twenty Barons, and above seven thousand other of the French, besides two thousand seven hundred Souldiers, and two thousand Feet Prisoners the Duke of Alenfon himself, the Lord of Hereby, and divers other French, and Sir John Towmbili, and two hundred Gentle- men, besides common Souldiers. This Battle was fought the eight and twentieth day of August, in the year 1424, and thereupon Vernon was presently re-delivered. After this, the Earl of Salisbury with ten thousand men, took in the strong Town of Mount, the Town of St. Eufian, the Fort of St. Bernard, and others; from thence he went to Anjou, where he performed such Heroick acts, that his very name grew terrible in all France; as for instance, the new High Contable peridious Richmond, with forty thousand men, laid siege to the good Town of St. James in Bemua, the Garrison whereof consisted but of six hundred English, who being driven to some extremity, fellith forth, crying, Saint George, a Salisbury; which word of Salisbury they made very famous, and so irritated the French, thinking he had been come to rescue them, that carrying away their weapons, they ran all away, saving some few that yielded themselves Prisoners, leaving all their Tents, fourteen Pieces of Ordnance, forty Barrels of Powder, three hundred Pipes of Wine, much Armour, and some Treasure behind him. After which, other Castles, as that of Beaumont, of Victoria, Tonnis, Gilly, Ose, Ruys, Vaseck, and many more were taken in by Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Fastolf, as once again the French are glad to be take themselves to their old course of fraud; they compounded with a Guiseigne Captain for delivery of Alenfon to them; whereof the Re- gent having notice, he sent the Lord Willoughby and Sir John Fastolf to prevent it, who encounter- ing with Charles de Filieres, that with two hundred Horse, and three hundred Foot, was come to the place appointed for entry, took and flew them all, except some few Horse which fled themselves by flying. After which, the Earl of Salisbury took in and demolished above In the fourth year of this Kings Reign, a Parliament was holden at Leicester, called of the common people, the Parliament of Bass: because, being commanded to lay by their Swords, Servants took great Bass to follow their Lords and Masters to the Parliament.

About this time the Duke of Gloucester, Protector, took some filemblie in his Honour, by marrying another mans Wife, Jagneline Counsellor of Hennant, Holland, and Zealand, who was married before to John Duke of Brabant, yest living, and had lived with him ten months as his lawful Wife; but at that time upon some different, gone from him, intending to be divorced. At which injury offered to the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Brabant, being his Cousin, took so great offence, that first by friendly Letters he admonished the Duke of Gloucester of it; and that not prevailing, they grew to terms of challenge, and a Combat between them was appointed: but in the mean time the Lady betrayed, was carried to the Duke of Burgoyne, who conveyed her to Gaunt; from whence, by pleadings of a Burgoyne Knight, in mans apparel, she escaped into Holland, and there made a defensive War against her Husband the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Burgoyne. To her aid, the Duke of Gloucester sent the Lord Fitzwater, with a power of a thousand men: but the being disconfined by the Duke of Brabant, and the Pope also pronouncing the first Marriage illegal, the Duke of Gloucester abandoned him, and took the Duke of Leon, and the Duke of Burgoyne, a Knight of the Order of the Garter of St. Werburgh, his old Milifris; and the Lady Jagneline, after the death of John Duke of Brabant, married a mean Gentleman; whom the Duke of Burgoyne imprisoned, and brought her self to live in much trouble.

And now in France, the Constable with forty thousand men, besieged the Town of St. James de Bourbon; and having made a breach for assault, whilst his Captains fired the walls of the citie, which of them should first enter. Nicholas Bardet with all his Forces fell forth, crying a loud, A Salisbury, a Suffolk: whose names struck such a terror into the Befigers, that they fled like men amazed, of whom six hundred were slain, two hundred drowned in the Ditches, fifty taken Prisoners, with eighteen Standards, and the Constable was glad to quit the place, and give over the siege.

At the same time also the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Scater, with seven thousand, besieged Ponthon many weeks together; but Provision waxing scant, the Lord Scater with three thousand men went a forraging into the Enemies Country: and in his return with plenty of Provision, was encountered with five thousand French, of whom he flew many hundreds, took above a thousand Prisoners, and they returned safe into the Camp.

About this time also Sir John Elyiffe besieged the Town of Antwerp with nine thousand, and about them forty thousand, Princes, after five days, offered to render it self by a despatch, if it were not relieved. The offer was taken, and Pledges delivered; but before the day came, they within the Town had victualled and manned the place, and thereupon neglecting their Pledges, refused to render the Castle according to agreement: whereupon the Pledges were brought before the fight of them within the Castle, and there openly put to death.

And now a Conspiration of the Clergy and Magistrates in Maastrich to preval, that the Marshals of France with five hundred men, about midnight came to the Town-Walls, where the Guard of English, by those that seemed their friends, were suddenly massacred; and setting open the Gates, made way for the Enemy to enter: whereupon the Alarum given, the Earl of Suffolk with the surviving English, withdrew to the Castle, wherein they were sharply affailed by the French, who yet had more mind to ravish houses, and to make good cheer; whereas the Lord Talbot having Intelligence by Captain Offe, whom he had sent to discover the state of the French, he secretly gave notice to the Earl of Suffolk, who thereupon fell back within the Castle at a time when the Lord Talbot was ready with his Troops, and on both sides crying St. George, a Talbot, they fell upon the carles French, who lost four hundred of their bell men, the rest were all taken, the Town regained, and the Conspirators, thirty Citizens, twenty Priests, and fifteen Fryers, condemned and put to Execution.

Whilst these things went on prosperously in France, a great disaster fell out in England; for the right Noble Thomas Beaumont (Son of John of Gaunt, and Katharine Windsor) Duke of Exeter, and Guardian of the King, makes King Henry his Heir; and at Ely-Greenwich in Kent, ended his life. Whose place was presently supplied by the Earl of Warwick, and the Earls place in France by the Earl of Salisbury; whom thereofon with five thousand men came to

The Duke of Suffolk taken prisoner.

Orcines, and belied the City, and won from the French the great Fort. But here happened another great disaster, for from a high Tower in this Fort, the Believers observed the paffages of the Townsmen; when the Noble Earl of Salisbury, intending to inform himself of the State of the Town, unfortunately looking out at a Window of the Fort, with Sir Thomas Gagegrave, a great shot from the Town striking the Bars of the Window, the splinters thereof were driven into his head and face : of which wounds within eight days he died. This was now a second weakening to the English party, but in his place the Earl of Suffolk succeeded, to whom the Regent fendeth Sir John Falstaff with fresh supples; whom the Lords De la Bree, nine thousand strong, endeavours to intercept: but Sir John resolving to abide the charge, placeth his Carriages behind, the Horse next, and the Foot before, lining his Bows with Bill-men, and pitching flakes behind the Archers, who having discharged their first Volleys, retired behind the flakes: on which the French, forgetting their former defeats by that course, ran and goaded their Horses, by which their Vaward being disordered, the Battel, made a stand. Which Sir John perceiving, cryeth out, St. George! they fly! at which words they fled indeed, and lost two thousand five hundred of their men, with the Lords De la Bree, and William Stewart; eleven hundred were taken prisoners: with whom, and a rich Booty, they came to the Camp before Orcines. And this Battel, because molt part of the carriage was Herring and Lenten stuff, was by the French men called the Battel of Herring. But the beleagured having notice of this, they offered to submit themselves to the Duke of Burgoyne; who was contented to receive them, so as the Regent would content: But the Regent conferred not, and therefore in the mean time, the beleagured made means to the Duke of Alainfon, who furnisht the Town with fresh Forces and Provisions; which put such spirits into the Citizens, that they made a sally out, slew six hundred English, and adventured upon the Basfire, where the Lord Talbot commanded, who repelled them with great slaughter of their men; but yet the next day the Earl of Suffolk gave over his siege, and dispered his Army into their Garrisons.

And now the wheel of Fortune began to turn to the French against the English, which once for a going was not ease to be stayed. And first the Duke of Alainfon took by assault the Town of Jarnes, and in it the Earl of Suffolk, and one of his Brothers, and leen Mr. Alexandre Patr, another of his Brothers, and many other Prisoners in cold blood, by reason of a convention amongst the French, to whom the Prisoners should belong. Presently upon this, another great blow was given the English; for the Lord Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, going to fortifie the Town of St. Mein, were encounsrted by the said Duke of Alainfon, and Arthur of Britain, with three and twenty thousand men, with whom the English Lords interchanged some Blows: but oppressed with multitude, were all three taken prisoners, all lost wounded, twelve hundred of their company slain, and the rest hardly escaping to Menus, where they fortified themselves the better they could against future affords.

There were great blows given to the English in France; Salisburby taken, and now Talbot taken Prisoner: which though they made her a little to rotter, yet there must be great blows given before the will fall. And indeed, these disasters were feconded by the persidious runner of many Towns and strong holds to the French King; who now encouraged by thee successes, marcheth into Champagne, where by composition he took Troyes the chief City of that Province: Chalons rebellith, and enforces his Captain to yield it up; by whose examples the Citizens of Rheims do the like, where the French King is anew Proclaimed, and with acquiesced; Cherones a monteed and Crowned: whereupon many Towns submit themselves to him, and revolt from the English: Upon this the Duke of Bedford (to make the French know, that all the English strength confided not only in Salisburby and Talbot) with ten thousand English, besides Normans, marched out of Paris, and sent Letters of defiance to the French King, affirming, that deceitfully and by unjust means he had taken many Cities and places "of importance belonging to the Crown of England: which he was come to justify by Battel, if he would appoint a time and place. To which the King of France making a flight anwser, the Regent marched space toward him; and as fait the King of France marcheth away. The Regent followed him, but could not over take him, till he came near Steny: there both the Armies encamped and embattell, yet only some light skirmishes palled between them. And a night or two after, the French King fled with his Army to Bray, which the Duke thinking to be but a plot to draw him farther off from Paris, of whose fidelity he had no great assurance, followed him no further, but returned thither. At which time the Regent's Brother the Cardinal, having prepared Forces to assist Pope Martin in Bekemia, the Regent borrowed them of him for a pretense expedition; and with them marched into Champagne, where he found the French King encamped upon the Mount Pithal: whose number being twice as many as the Regents, yet by no provocations could be down to Battel, but secretly fled to Grissip; whereupon the Regent also returned to Paris.

Whilist these things are done in France, in England, upon St. Leonard's day the 6. of November, 1439. King Henry not yet eight years old, was with great solemnity Crowned at Westminster; at whole Coronation were made six and thirty Knights of the Bath, and at the Solemnity, a Feast; and if any man desire to know much Cookery, he may read in Edward, all the ditches of meat that were served at that Feast.

About this time, in France, a strange Impo-Longeaul took by surprize the Castle of Au-merie, and flew all the English that were in it.
But all these were but petty acquist to the King of France: there is a knot of friendship between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgogaine, which must be broken, or he will never be able to compass his designs. He therefore labours by all means possible to disunite them; wherein he so little prevailed, that the Duke of Burgogaine acquaints the Regent with all the practices, who thereupon, with many thanks, exhorts him to continue firm, of which he should never have cawe to repent him: and because Norman dey was a principal part of the English strength in France, he goeth chitter, and by many reasons persuades them, as their Ancelors had always been, to be faithful to the Crown of England.

In this time of the Regent’s absence from Paris, the King of France drew all his forces thiter, using all means possible, by Excalado, Battery, and burning the gates, to enter the City: but was withstood by the vigilance of the Citizens, who was glad to found a retreat, leaving his plain and maimed Souldiers behind him, all but the Pacelle, who being hurt in the Leg, and almost stild with myre in the ditch, was by a lervant of the Duke of Alanfon drawn up, and conveyed after the King to Berry, who by the way received the submission of the Inhabitants of Laigne. Some other services were performed on both fides, by the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Thomas Kyrriel, for the Englishe; by the baffard of Orleans and Sir Stephen le Hys, for the French; but of no great importance: till at laft, the Pacelle, (who a little before had caufed an English Captains head to be cut off, because he would not humbile himself to her upon his knee) was by Sir John of Lutzenburgh taken, and pretended to the Duke of Burgogaine, who sent her to the Regent, and he to the Bishop of the Dioces, who judicially proce-ding against her as a Sorcellery, and decaning her of the King and his subjcts name was (after many delays of promise to discover se-cert practices, and lastly of her reign ing to be with childe) publicly burnt at Rouen.

And now the Regent finding how much the Crowning of the French King had furthered his defigns, he made account the like effect would follow the Crown ing of King Henry in France; whereupon he is sent for to come over; and coming to Paris, was by his Unkle the Bishop of Winchesfer and Cardinal of Englius, not yet above nine years old, with all usual ceremonies Crowned King of France, receiving the oaths of Homage and Fealty of all the French Nobility that were present, and of all the In-habitats of Paris, and of the places adjacent.
Upon this, Pope Eugenius laboured a reconcile-ment between the two Kings, but could effect nothing, but only a Truce for fix years: which agreed upon, King Henry returns into England, and landeth at Dover, the eleventh of February.
But the fix years Truce was scarce openly proclaimed, when the French had cunningly pol-fed themselves of divers Castles and places of strength, justifying their actions, affirming, That what was politically obtained without blows, was no infringement of the Truce: and afterwards they perfidiously conveyed two hundred men into the Castle of Rouen, with intent to have surprized it; but being discovered, they were all taken, and either ransomed or put to execution. Upon this, the Regent (whose Wife, the Sitter of the Duke of Burgogaine, being lately dead, and he married again to Jauc-lene the Earl of S. Paul’s daughter, with whom he went over into England) returned again to Paris; to whom the Lord Talbot, having now paid his rancombe, came hither, bringing with him seven hundred tried Souldiers; and with them the Regent takes the field, where the French Army lay, but the French flunk away in the dark, as not daring to abide the hazard of a battel.

About this time, the Duke of Brunswick, taken at the battle of Agincourt, after eighteen years imprisonment, paying eighteen thousand pounds for his Rancombe, the fame day he was enlarged died at London.

And not very great effect was produced out of a very small cause: There had been sparks of unkindness between the two great Dukes of Bedford and Burgogaine, which broke out into a flame upon this occasion: A time and place was appointed, where they should meet to compound some differences that were between them; The place agreed upon, was St. Omnis, a Town in Burgogaine: When the time came, they stood upon this nice point, Which of them should first come to the place; and as thinking that he which did so, should thereby acknowledge himself to be the meaner person. The Duke of Richemont thought he had no reason to do it, seeing he was Regent of France, and therefore superior to any subiect in the Kingdom: And the Duke of Burgogaine thought he had no reason to do it, seeing it was to be done in his own Dominions, where he was himself the Sovereign Lord. Upon this nice point they parted without meeting; and the unkindness grew afterward to so great hatred, that the Duke of Burgogaine chose rather to be friends with him that had murdhered his father, then ever to have any more commerce with the Duke of Bedford. This was one great branch of affiance lop off from the Englishe which had been a great means before to make it flourish: and it was not so much, that the affiance was taken from the Englishe, as that it was added to the French: for after this, the Duke Burgogaine brought more affiance to the new King of France, then ever he had done before to the King of England. By which we may see, when the Divine providence hath a work to effect, what flight occasions it oftentimes takes to effect the work.

Great blowes had been given before in France, to the English fortune by the enemy, but now a blow was given to it by Destiny, which made the Enemies blowes the more incurable; for now the wise, valiant, faithful Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Abjou, and Alanfon, Earl of Hemy, Harcourt, Driex, Richmond, and Carisle, and Vifcount Bnccourt, upon the fourteenth of September 1435, ended his life at Paris, which was in a manner the ending the life of the English fortune in France: al former blowes had been upon inferior mem}
The noble disposition of Levis for France.

The Duke of York, is made Regent of France, which the Duke of Somerset envies, and being thus envied, his proceedings all be vain.

1472 - Lord Tankervile and the Duke of Burgoyne were defeated at the Battle of Poictiers.

The Duke of Gloucester lands at Calais with five thousand good fighting men, who finding the Enemy recoiled, forraged all the Country thereabout, and for the space of six weeks harrowed all the parts of Flanders, Artois, and Hainaut: and then returning by St. Omeres, Arde, and Guisness, arrived at Calais.

And now we must look a little home, for the Duke of York returning into England, finds the Castle of Rochester besieged by the King of Scots, with thirty thousand men; but he hearing of the Earl of Northumberland's approach, and the Duke's return, inconveniently fled. And now again to France, where the Town of Harflew was taken by the French, and the Scots were forced to cover their town of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot besetting it both by Sea and Land, though the Earl of Ever and the Bailiff of Orleane and Bourne, with four thousand men came to relieve it, yet upon composition it was surrendered.

And here we may have leave to speak of a private matter, for about this time the Duchess of Bedford married Sir Richard Wodevil, a gallant young Gentleman, but of small means; which though it offened her friends, yet it seems offended not God, who made her Mother of many Children by him; and amongst the rest, of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards married to King Edward the fourth. Also about this time James King of Scots, who before had been eighteen years Prisoner in England, and afterward released, with a Wife of a Noble House, a great Dower, and many honourable Presents, yet got loved ungrateful, was murdered in his Bed Chamber by night, and the murderers being found out, were cruelly tortured. And now again to France, when the Duke of Burgoyne could neither by force nor policy take Calais, he attempted a ridiculous practice, to cut a Ditch that should drown both the Town and Courray; but after much labour and expense, his design like a vapour vanished into air. The Lord Talbot besieged Tankervile, and after four months siege had it rendered to him. In revenge whereof, the French King in his own person layes siege to Monfreau; which whilst the Duke of York was providing to rescue, he was discharged of his Office, done of purpose by his Enemies, to lay a blot upon him: A lamentable thing in a State, when private envy shall be suffered to undermine the publick safety; and by this means Sir Thomas Gerard had the more opportunity to fell the Town, for which, if he were a gainer in money, he was yet a looser in reputation, and bared both of French and English, in much discontented. Arthur, Constable of France, and John Duke of Alencon, besieged the Town of Arranches.
but were with dishonour repelled by the Lord Talbot. After this, Le Hyde sent Letters to them, that he had a promise from divers Burgers of Rouan to let them in at any time appointed; against which time they came to Rysz, within four Leagues of Rouan, but the Lord Talbot, having notice hereof, marched covertly to Rouan, and from thence before day to Rysz, where he surprised the French, takes the Lord Fountaines, Sir Allen Corson, and many others, and with a rich booty returned to Rouan. The sixth day of November, in the sixteenth year of the King’s Reign, the Earl of Warwick having oftentimes been abroad, and still beaten back by Tempels, landed at Harlew with a thousand fresh Souldiers, and from thence came to Rouan; but in the mean time the Duke of Burg-geigne seeing no new Regent yet come, betie-gathed the Town of Creto: to the relief whereof, the new Regent now comes, sent the Lord Talbot with five thousand men, whose approach the Duke nor enduring, retired to Abtestice, leaving only four hundred, with whom he had manned the Saffile by him there erected, which was soon gained, and all the Souldiers either taken or slain. And there the valiant Talbot sent word to the Duke, that if he would have his Country from vallation, he should come to a Battle; but the Duke not liking the march, continued his Retreat to Abtestice, and there, together did the Lord Talbot with fire and sword, pass through Picardy and Artois, without opposition, and then returned. Sir Thomas Kyriel seizes upon the Dukes Carriages and Ordnance; and having left in Creto, virtual enough for fix hundred men for a whole year, he brought the reft to the Earl of Warwick. And now Henry Earl of Mortainge, Son to Edmund Duke of Suffolk, arrived with two hundred Archers, and three hundred Spears, took the Castle of St. Aymon, wherein were three hundred Scots and French; the Scots he flew all, and hanged the French because they had sworn fealty to England, and broke it: he took likewise the Castle of Algarbeth, and by means of an Ambush, took the Lord Camarons, coming to the rescue thereof. On the other side, the Towns of Nimes, Bry, and Sijfon, were sold and delivered to the French by the treachereous Burgers. In June the Earl of Huntingdon, with two thousand Archers, and four thousand Spears was sent into Geoféigne, whither the Earl of Dunois was lately come to buy Towns and Castles; but the Earl of Huntingdon upon his coming thither, changed all the Captains and Officers, whereby he prevented all such Burgers: and so far had bribery spread it self at this time, that even in Normandy the English Captains had but small confidence in the Nationals, and not much in fome of their own Nation; whereupon Sir Richard Woodville, Sir William Chamberlain, and William Peto were fent thither to stop the current of that corruption.

At this time the Council of France procured a reconciliation between the King and the Dauphin, who had been in long jealousies and diffention; which if it had not been done, the Kingdom had been torn with Factions, and never been able to subsist.

And now in a great Frost and Snow, the English life under the conduct of Sir John Clifford, having covered their Armour with white shirts, and their heads with white Amane skullis, came to Poethuis by night, and undiscover’d past the Dutchers, sealed the Walls, flew the Guards, and took the Town; but this good luck was accompanied with a bad of more importance: for presently upon it the Earl of Warwick died in the Castle of Rouan, and conveyed into England was buried in the Castle of Warwick. To reduce Poethuis, the French King in person layeth siege unto it, when Richard Duke of York being the second time made Regent, having with him the Earl of Oxford, and the Earl of Ewe, levis a power to raise the siege; and arriving there, sends word to the King, that the next morning he would give him Battle: but the King liked not his bidding, but leaving his Ordnance, at midnight fled away to Poysy: thither also the Regent follows him; but with no provocations could draw him to fight.

About this time, a Treaty for Peace between the two Kings is appointed to be held at Calais, by the mediation of the Dutchers of Burgoyne, a Portugal Lady; Commissioners meet of both sides, but nothing concluded, only the Duke of Orleans who had been prisoner to the English five and twenty years, is by the Dutchers redeem’d, and likewise three hundred thousand Crowns of the Duke of Burgoyne’s money. The Lord Wiltoughby betiedge Deer, which the Dauphin with fourteen thousand men cometh to raise; and there young Talbot is taken prisoner, with Sir John Peto, and Sir John Repley, but are shortly after redeemed by exchange. And now another weakening happened to the English party, the Earl of St. Pol forfakes them, and is reconciled to King of France. The English lay siege toTimer, for the raising whereof, the French King marcheth thither with 60000 men, releiveth the Town, and then marcheth to Scouerhe, which he taketh in, and in it, Sir John Ramsden; after which he took in Arques, but then the English cut off all conveys of Vistuals from coming to him, he is forced to return; after whose departure, the English recover all that he had taken; and to boot, take his Lieutenant prisoner, flying or hanging all his Souldiers. In this mean while the Lord Talbot taketh in Canon, and driveth the Ballard of Orleans from the siege of Goghardt; but the French in the Castle of Cordun detain many English prisoners; for redeeming of whom, Sir Francis the Aragonist used this tiragisme, he apparelled half a dozen lusty young fellows like Peasants, carrying Baskets with Corn and Vistuals, and tendeth them to the Castle, while he with his Company lies in Ambush, in a Valley near the Castle; the fix unsuspectt are admittet, and coming to the Captains Chamber, feizes upon him, and withall gives the sign to the Ambush, who coming readily on, entred the Castle, put the Souldiers to the sword, feteth prisoners at liberty, burneth down the Castle, and with the booty and Captain of the Castle, returned to Rouan.

Whilest these alterations past in France, a more unnatural paffed in England, theUncle rifteth against the Nephew, the Nephew against the the Uncle; The Duke of Gloucester Articles against the Cardinal, charging him with affecting preeminence, to the derogation of the Kings Prerogative, and contempt of his Laws; which Articles are delivered to the King, and by him to his Council, who being most of the Clergy, durst not meddle in them, for offending the Cardinal. On the other hand, the Cardinal finding nothing whereby directly to accuse the Duke of Gloucester himself, accuses his other self, the Lady Eleanor Catham the Dukes Wife, of treason, for attempting by Sorcery and Witchcraft the Death of the King, and advancement of her Husband to the Crown: for which, though acquitted of the treason, she is adjudged to open Penance, namely, to go with a Wax Taper in her hand, hooded (lave a kerschief) through London, divers days together, and after to remain in perpetual imprisonment in the Isle of Man. The crime objected against her, was procuring Thomas Southwell, John Hanne, Priests, Roger Bullingbrook, a suppos'd Necromancer, and Margery Jordan, called the Witch of Eye in Suffolk, to devise a Picture of Wax in proportion of the King, in such fort by sorcery, that as the Picture confum'd, so the Kings Body should confum'd; for which they were all condamnd. And then was burnt in Smithfield, Bullingbrook was hanged, constantly affirming upon his death, that neither the Duke's, nor any other from her, did ever require more of him, then only to know by his Arts, how long the King should live. John Hanne had his pardon; and Southwell died the night before he should have been executed.

About this time the Countess of Conings being dead, the King of France and the Earl of Arminrick are Competitors for the Inheritance. The Earl takes possession, but fearing the King of France his greatest, makes offer of his Daughter in Marriage to the King of England, with a large portion in money; and besides, to deliver full possession of all such Towns and Castles as were by him or his Ancestors contained in Aquitaine, and had been formerly by the Provinces of the King of France conquered. The Queen and Countess of Suffolk for this purpose were by King Henry graciously heard, and honourably returned: after whom were sent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Esf's, and others, to conclude all things; and the young Lady is by Proxy affin'd to King Henry: But the King of France not liking the proceeding of the Match, sendeth the Dauphin with a pious Army, who took the Earl, with his youngest Son, and both his Daughters, and gained the Counties of Arminick, Louronne, Revergne, Montesonne, with the Cities of Sarens and Cadarce, chaising the Brand of Arminick out of the Countrey; by means whereof, the marriage was then deferred, and left in suspense.

In this dissension of Christendom, many Princes, the Kings of Spain, Denmark, and Hungary became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Ambassadors of both sides were sent, many meetings were had, many motions made; but in conclusion only a Truce for eighteen months is agreed upon. In the mean time the Earl of Suffolk, one of the Commissioners for the peace, takes upon him beyond his Commission; and without acquainting his fellows, to treat of a Marriage between the King of England, and a Kinwoman of the King of France, Necces to the French Queen, Daughter to Roger Duke of Anjou, styling himself King of Steine and Naples: In which business he was so intent, that he brought an asperson upon him of being bribed: but however, an interview between the two Kings is appointed, without any grumble of King Henry's part, to be between Charters and Room. The Commissioners return, the Earl of Suffolk furnishes the beauty of the proposed Bride, and the great benefits that would redound to the Kingdom by this match. The King was easily induced to consider the Relation; but divers of the Kings Council, especially the Duke of Gloucester, opposed it; partly for the meanness of the match, her Father being only a Titular Prince, and withal but poor, unable to give any portion at all; and partly for the wrong which should hereby be offered to the Duke of Arminick's Daughter, to whom the King had been in solemn manner publicly affirmed. But reasons could not prevail against her, the Earl of Suffolk's affirnms must not be undervalued. And as a new creation of Lords first made, John Beaufort Earl of Somerfell, made Duke of Somerfell; John Lord Talbot, made Earl of Shrewsbury; John Holland Earl of Huntington, made Duke of Exeter; Humphrey Earl of Suffolk, made Duke of Buckingham; Henry Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, made Duke Warwick; Edmund Beaumont Earl of Dorset, made Marquefs Dorset; and William de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, made Marquefs of Suffolk; this new Marquefs honourably accompanied, is sent into France to fetch the Lady Margaret the proposed Bride: who shortly after is married at Southwick in Hampshire, and Crowned Queen of England at Westminster on the 30. day of May, 1444. in the three and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign. And now instead of benefits by which the Earl of Suffolk profited, must pass by him, and the extent of his power over reached all the Council: He gets of the King the Wardship of the Body and Lands of the Court of Wardour in Warwick, and of the Lady Margaret, sole Daughter and Heir of John Duke of Somerset, afterward Mother to King Henry the Seventh. And now the Kings weaknesses in judgement grows every day more apparent than other, whilst governed by no Counsel but his of Queen, and the by no counsel but her own will, and the new Marquess of Suffolk: King Henry is himself the last part of the King, and serves but to comfluence the devices of others, whereof he little understands the drift; and which proving ill, the blame much needs be his; it well, the benefit and honour others. For by insufficiency of the Queen, he flatters the Duke of Gloucester, for his care of the Commonwealth called the good Duke, to be excluded not only from Command, both from the Council-Table, and permits informers, set on by the Marquess of Suffolk, the Duke of Buckingham, the Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and the Archbishop of York, to come against him, who lay to his charge, that he had caused divers persons to be executed contrary to Law; wherein thought he justified himself, yet no justification would be heard. But to avoid tumultuary parti-taking, it was concluded he should be privately convicted and condemned; and to this end a Parliament by the procurement of his Enemies, unwitting to the King, is called at Evesham, to which the Duke of Gloucester resorted, is on the second day of the Seison, by the Lord Beaumont Lord High Constable (abetted by the Duke of Buckingham) arrestit and put in Ward, all his followers fentiter from him, whereof two and thirty are committed to several Prisons, and the next day after his imprisonment, he is found in his bed murdered; yet shewed the same day as though he had died of an Impholitume, though all that saw his body few plainly he died of a violent and unnatural cause: some fay, strangled; some, that a hot fport was put at his head, and burned betwixt two feathers. His Corps the same day was conveyed to Saint Albans, and there buried. Five of his menial Servants, Sir Roger Chamberlen Knight, Midddeton, Herlitt, Artais, Eguiter, and John Nedge, Gentleman, were condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and hanged they were at Tyburn, let down quick, fript naked, marked with a Knife to be quartered; but then the Marquess of Soffolk, to make a shew as though he had no hand in the busines, brought their Pardon, and delivered it at the place of Execution, and further lives were faved. It is no unmemorable thing which Sir Thomas More writes of the pregnancy of this Duke of Gloucester. It happened the King coming one time in Progress to St. Albans, a Beggar born blinde, as he fay, at the throne of St. Albans obtained in his height: which case being noticed in the Town, the Duke of Gloucester being there with the King, dared to fee him, who being brought unto him, he asked if he were born blinde; who told him, Yes trul; And can you now fee? (faith the Earl) Yes I thank God and St. Alban, faith the Beggar; then tell me faith the Earl what colour is my Gown? the Beggar readily told him the colour; and what colour faith the Earl is? faith a mans Gown? the Beggar likewise told him presently, and fo of divers others. Then faith the Earl, Go you counterfeit Knight; if you had been born blinde, and could never fee till now, how come you fo suddenly to know this difference of colours? and thereupon instead of an Alms, caused him to be fet in the Stocks. But in the death of this Duke, the Queen, who had a special hand in it, was either not fo inteligent or not fo provident as the might have been; for as long as he had lived, his Primo-geniture would have kept back the Duke of Yorks claim to the Crown, being but descended from the fifth Son of Edward the Third, where this Duke Humphrey was descended from the Fourth. And here were the first feeds found between the two Houses of Lancaster, whose badge was the Red Rose, and York, whose badge was the White Rose. And now upon the death of this Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York began immediately to privyly draw his right and title to the Crown, but so politicly carried his intents, that all things were provided to further his projects, before his purpose was any what discovered.

And in this time the rich Cardinal and Bishop of Winchester dies, who lying on his death-bed, as Doctor John Bucy, his Privy Counselor and his Chaplain writeth, used such like words: Why should I dye, faith he, having to much riches? If the whole Realme would have my life, I am able either by Policy to get it, or by money to buy it: Fie, will not death be hid? will money do nothing? and other words to such purpose. But he being dead, there succeed in his Bishoprick a more deferving Prelate, William Wanflete, called to the place in Lincolnshire where he was born, though his name was Patterne, of the Worlhipful Family whereof he was descended. And now to the end the Marquess of Suffolk might not come behind them in Dignity, whom he went before in Power, he is about this time made Duke of Suffolk.

In France about this time, a Victory was gotten, which proved no better then an overthrow. Before the Truce was expired, Sir Francis Saurin an Aragoniis, a man thought worthy to be admitted into the honou’able Order of the Garter, taking advantage of the security of the French Garrison, suddenly surprizeth a Frontier Town called Fougiers belonging to the Duke of Britain; the Duke adverfeth the French King thereof; who by his Ambassadors complains both to the King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset then Regent in France: answer was made it was the fault of the Aragoniis, who did it without warrant from either the King or the Council; neithertheless Commissioners are appointed to meet at London, to treat of some course for satisfaction; but the time of the Treaty news is brought to the Regent, that the French by a stratagem of a Carter, that with a load on Hey coming over the Drawbridge, caused the Axletree to break, and whilst the Porter was ready to help the Carter, the Porters brains were beaten out; the Town
Town of Arques surprized, and the Lord Fauconbridge Captain thereof was taken Prisoner. Reformation being required by the English, answer is made them in their own language, it was done without warrant from either the French King, or any of his Council; so it was but one for another; and from thence forward the Truce is broken of both sides, and all things grow worse and worse. The French King by composition taketh Loweriers, Guernsey, and Vénezile, whilest the Regents stands desiring what was built to be done; if he command, not obeyed; if he counsel, not followed, as it happens to men when blinded in Reputation, to have an ill construction made of all their actions: by which means the French go on without restraint, get Conflance, Guifard, Gatierd, St. Lee, Pavis and many other pieces in Normandy. Upon notice whereof, Mansfield in Guen rennters to the Earl of Fife, and by their example the City of Roes itself takes composition to surrender; where the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, heir to the Earl of Ormond, were kept pledges till it was performed. It is true, succours were provided to be sent out of England, under the Command of the Duke of York; but a Rebellion happening in Ireland, which was thought of more importance to be speedily suppressed, diverted him and his Forces thither: where not only he suppresse the Rebels, but so won the hearts of that people, that it was no small furtherance to his proceedings afterward. A fresh supply instead of fifteen hundred men, under Sir Thomas Kyriel is sent over; but what could a handful of men do against such multitudes as opposed them? For he marching with the rest of the Army towards Reculver, was encountered by the Earl of Clarmont, with seven thousand French and Scots, whom yet at first he made to retreat, till the Concourse of France with four hundred men at Arms, and eight hundred Archers came to the rescue; and then fresh men coming upon them that were already tired, the English lost three thousand and above seven hundred, besides divers that were taken Prisoners. After this loss of men, follows presently a loss of Towns; Harlow is assaulted, and though valiantly for a while defended by Sir Robert Cursos, yet surrendered at last upon composition: Then the French King with an Army Royal, beleeged Caen in Normandy, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, defended in his absence by his Lieutenant in Dover Hall; but the Duke of Suffolk being Remiss, in consideration of his Duties being in the Town, notwithstanding the stout opposition of Sir David Hallet, surrenders it upon composition to the French; whereof Sir David giving notice to the Duke of York, it bred such a deadly quarrel between the two Dukes, that they were never after throughly reconciled. And thus is all Normandy recovered from the English, after it had been in their possession a hundred years; and finally, all France is reduced to the obedience of Charles the French King.

And now hereafter there will be little to do abroad; but there will be the more to do at home; and more blood will be shed in England by civil diffensions, then was shed before in all the Wars of France. This loss of Normandy and other parts in Normandy, is imputed much to the Duke of Somerset, at that time Regent; but the Duke of Suffolk must bear a great part of the blame, partly for having been the cause of the surrender of Anjou and Mayenne, and the chief procurer of the Duke of Gloucester's death, and partly for having wilfully waited the Kings Treasures, and been a means to remove the ablest men from the Council Board; of all whichaspersions the Queen takes notice, and knowing how far they trench upon the Dukes destruction and her own, she wrought, that the Parliament assembled at the Blackfriars, is adjourned to Leicester, and from thence to Westminster: but though all means were used to stop these accusations against the Duke, yet the lower House would not be taken off, but exhibited their Bill of grievances against him: That he had traitorously invited the Battard of Orleans, the Lord Prygon, and others to levy War against the King, to the end that thereby the King might be destroyed; and his Son John, who had married Margaret Daughter and Heir of John Duke of Somerset, whose title to the Crown the said Duke had often declared, in case King Henry should die without issue, might come to be King: That through his Treachery the French King had gotten possession of the Dutchy of Normandy, and had taken prisoners the Valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Fauconbridge, and others; but to their accusations he peremptorily affirmed himself innocent, so much as in thought. They are few further allegations made against him, that being with others, sent Ambassador into France, he had transgressed his Commission; and without provy of his fellow Commissioners, had presumed to promise the surrender of Anjou, and the delivery of the County of Maine to Duke Rayner, which accordingly was performed, to the great dishonour of the King, and detriment of the Crown: That he had traitorously acquainted the French King with all the affairs of State, and passages of secrecy, by which the Enemy was throughly instructed in all the designs of the King and Council: That he had received rewards from the French King, to divert and disappoyt all succours sent to the Kings friends in France. Upon these and divers other accusations brought against him, to blare the peoples eyes, he is committed to the Tower, but the Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but he was set at liberty. Which so incensed the common people, that they made an insurrection and under the leading of a desperate Fellow, flying himself Blue beards, they committed many out-rages: but by the diligence of the Gentlemen of the Country, the Captain was apprehended, and the Rebellion ceased. And now another Parliament is called, where great care is taken in chusing of Burgesses, precluding thereby to stop any further proceeding against the Duke of Suffolk; but his personal appearance at the Parliament gave such a general dislike to the House, though he came in the company of the King and Queen, that they forborne not to begin the Assembly, with petitioning the King for punishment to be inflicted upon such
The Duke of Suffolk is questioned again in Parliament; he is banished for five years, but taken at sea, hath his head cut off.

The Duke of York begins to make his way to the Queen.

As had pleased or consented to the Reformation of Anjou and Maine, whereof by name they inflicted in the Duke of Suffolk, John Bishop of Salisbury, and others. This petition was seconded by the Lords of the upper House: whereupon to give some satisfaction to the House, the Lord Say, Lord Tresurer, is sequestred from his place, the Duke's Officers are all discharged, and himself formally banished for five years, but with an intent after the multitude had put out of mind their hatred against him, to have revoked him: But God did otherwise dispose of him, for when he was shipped in Suffolk, with intent to have passed over into France, he was met by an English man of War, taken and carried to Dover Sands, and there had his head cut off, on the side of the Long-boat, which together with the body was left there on the Sands, as a pledge of some satisfaction for the death of Duke Humphry.

Whilst these things are done in England, the Duke of York in Ireland began to make his way to the Crown, as descended from Philippa, Daughter and Heir to Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder Brother to John of Gaunt, great Grandfather to the present King Henry the fifth. And for a beginning it is privately whispered, that King Henry was of a weak capacity, and easily abased; the Queen of a malignant spirit, and bloodily ambitious: the Privy Council, if wise enough, yet not honest enough, regarding more their private profit, than the public good; that through their delinquencies, all France was lost, and that God would not bless the usurped position of King Henry. With these suggestions the Kentish men seemed to be taken; which being observed by an instrument of the Duke of York, called Mortimer, he takes his time, and tells the multitude, that if they will be ruled by him, he will put them in a course to work a general Reformation, and free them for ever, from those insupportable burthens of Taxations, so often, upon every flight occasion obtruded upon them. These promises of Reformation and Freedom from Imposts, so wrought with the people, that they drew to a head, and made Mortimer, the Duke of York, their Leader; who styling himself Captain Mendl-all, marched with no great numbers, but those well ordered to Black-beach, where between Eltham and Greenwich, he lay by the space of a month exercising his men, and fending for whom he pleased, and for what he pleased. Then he presents to the Parliament the complaints of the Commons, that the Queens Favourites share amongst them the Revenues of the Crown, whereby the King is enforced for the supportation of his present estate, to tax and burthen the Commons, to their utmost undoing, and to the general impoverishment of the Kingdom: That the Commons have their commodities daily taken from them for the purveyance of the Kings Household, for which they are not paid, nor any allowance for payment thereof given, but only Court-promises: That upon the apprehension of any manner of treason or Felony the Kings men, Servants, before conviction, beg the Goods and Lands of the impeached; whereupon indirect and unlawful proceedings are used by subornation of wretches, emissaries of Jurors, and great men Letters to the Judges; whereby Justice is perverted, and the innocent after attained, if not executed, yet at least imprisoned to their undoing: That the Commons have no legal proceedings in their Law-suits, so as the rightful owners of Inheritance dare not, (if opposed by any Courtier) maintain their Titles, or attempt the recovery of their interest, how just soever: That the Kings Collectors and other Accomptants are much troubled in paying their Accompts by new exacted Fees; and by being infcrred to procure a late invented Writ of Quorum Nonin, for allowance of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and their suing out their Quietus at their own charge, without allowance from the King: That the Bayliffs of Sheriffs, under colour of the Green Wax out of the Exchequer, do levy greater sums than are by the Register justifiable, yet maintained: That they cannot have the freedom of electing Knights and Burgesses for the Parliament; but by Letters from the Favourites of the Court, to their Friends and Retainers, the Knights and Burgesses are commonly chosen: That they are too much troubled with too often coming to attend the general Sessions, being enforced in many places to make five days journey to the place where they are kept. These and some other were the complaints of the Commons; but the Captain for his own particular (after protestation made to live and dye in the quarrel of the King) required that his Majesty would be pleased to receive again into favour, the truly noble Prince the Duke of York, and with him the Right Honourable the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, and the ancient Noblemen of the Realm, by the undue practices of Suffolk and his complices, commanded from his presence; and that all their opposites might be banished the Court, and put from their Offices: That there might be a general amotion of corrupt Officers, an abolition of the Green Wax, and other Infrumments of Extortion out of the Exchequer; a qualification of proceedings in the King's Bench; an abolition of unequal purveyance of provocation for the Kings Household, and a present execution of the Promoters, Slags, Farmers, Tellers, and Esks, whom he pretended by wrongful information to have abused the King, and wronged his Subjects. These Petitions are sent from the Lower-House to the Upper, and from thence committed to the Lords of the King's Privy Council; who having examined the particulars, explode them as frivolous, and the Authors thereof to be presumptuous Rebels. Whereupon the King is solicited by his Privy Council, to prosecute them by force rather than interest; which advice is seconded by the Queen, as conceiving they secretly aimed at her: and hereupon the King draws his Forces to Greenwich, and appointeth divers Lords to affall the Rebels; but the Lords could get no followers to fight against them who fought only for reformation of abuses, and for punishment of such Traytors as the Lord Say himselfe. Whereupon the Lord Say is presently committed to the Tower, the King and Queen...
Queen retire to London, from whence within two days, the King being now eighteen thousand strong, marcheth in person towards Captain Mendall, who politickly withdraweth his Forces into Strevenock-wood; upon notice whereof the King retireth again to London, but the Queen longing for dispatch, sends the two Stafford, Sir Hungerfrey and William, with many hostages in the Court; to follow the Rebels, who were soon cooled; for they found Captain Mendall, a thousand strong, whom they gave them, and in the first encounter, slew Sir Hungerfrey and afterwards his Brother, and pull all the rest to flight. The Kings Forces being at Blackheath, could neither by threats or iniquities be gotten to go to the Rescue; but rather wished the Queen and her Favourites in the Stafford house: or that the Duke of York were in England, to aid his Cousin Mortimer (now first acknowledged to be of his kindred) and many of them fled away to the Rebels, whose number from Suffolk and Surrey daily increased, whereas yet their Captain restrained from forraging or taking away any thing by force; and so returned again to Blackheath, where the Kings Army lay the night before, but was now fallen down to Greenwich. And now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham are sent to expound with the Rebels about their demands; to whom Jack Cade gave very good language, but defendants affirming no condition from Arms, unless the King in person would bear the grievances of the Subject, and pass his Princely word for the reformation of their wrongs. This resolution of his made known to the King, who was not sure of his own Souldiers Faith, made him march presently away to Killingworth Castle in Warwickshire, where he fortified himself as expecting a siege, having left the Lord Scales only to guard the Tower. Jack Cade taking advantage of the Kings departure, cometh to Southwark, where he quarters his men, straitly charging them to commit no out-rage, nor do wrong to any; which was duly observed. The next morning he marcheth to London-Bridge, where he caused his men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-Bridge, no reliance being made against him; and so in good order matched up by London-flow, upon which he struck his Sword, saying; Now is Mortimer Lord of London. The Mayor of London, Sir Thomas Cholton, standing upon the threefold of his barge, bade him take heed he attempted nothing against the quiet of the City; To whom he made answer. Let the world take notice of our honest intention by our actions. And indeed this orderly carriage of himself and his company won him a good opinion amongst the common sort of people: And now assuming to himself the place of Chief, he sends out his Letters of safe conduct, to such whom he pleased to make use of; amongst other, he wrote this Letter to Thomas Cock, Draper of London.

Upon Cock's admission, he had private conference with three other that came with him; to whom, at their departure he gave these instructions in writing: Ten shall charge all Lombards and Merchant-strangers, Genoese, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this day to draw themselves together, and to ordain for us the Capital, twelve Howard's compleat of the left foot, four and twenty Briganti, twelve Bottle-axes, thirteen Glaces, fix Horsemen with Saddle and Bridle complete, and armed with Money in ready Money: and if they shall fail them, we shall strike off the heads of as many as we can get. But they failed not, but sent him what he had demanded: who thereupon the next morning, being the third of July, returns to London; and presently sends to the Lord Scales, to bring his Prisoner the Lord Say to the Guild-hall, whither he had called the Lord Mayor with his brethren; before whom he caused the Lord Say to be arraigned, who craving to be tried by his Peers, was forthwith taken from his Keeper, carries to the Standard in Cheapside, and there had his head chopped off; which being pitched upon a Pike, was borne before him to Mile-end, whither he went to have conference with the Rebels of Essex; and by the way meeting with Sir James Cremer, High Sheriff of Kent, who had lately married the Lord Say's Daughter, he caused his head also to be cut off; and carried likewise before him in derision. The next morning we came again to London; where after publick execution done upon some of his fellows, and particularly upon a petty Captain of his, named Parle, that had done things contrary to his Proclamation; upon a displeasure taken against Alderman Mapes, he sent and seized upon all his Wares and Goods, and fined Alderman Hove five hundred Marks. Whereupon, the Citizens finding him to grow every day more inoffensive, sent to the Lord Scales for aifurance, who senteth Matthew Guns an old Souldier to them, with some Forces and Furniture out of the Tower; who presently make a stand at the Bridge, where Cade notwithstanding forbeareth his passage, and then began to let fire upon horsemen, where many aged and impotent people miserably perished. Captain Bingham, Alderman, Station and Robert Herfon, valiantly fighting, were slain; yet upon a fresh supply, the Londoners recovered the Bridge again, and drove the Rebels beyond the Stomp in Southwark; at which time, both sides being weary, agreed of a Truce, till the next day. After the Retreat, Cade finding he had lost many of his bel men, was driven, for supply, to set at liberty all the Prisoners in Southwark, as well Felons as Debtors; when now his company entering into consideration of their danger, and of the desperate Services their Captain had brought them to, began to discover by their countenances, their willingness to leave this course: whereof the Archbishop of Canterbury having notice, he with the Bishop of Winchester came from the Tower by water to Southwark, and there allowed the King General Pardon under the Great Seal of England; which was so welcome to the Rebels, that without taking leave of their Captain, they withdrew.

and with the Duke of Somerset (now enlarged) marched toward Wales: while the Duke of York, having notice which way the King came, by another way marched toward London: who, being told, the Duke of York, would not admit him entrance, he passed the River Thames by Blackheath, marched into Kent, and encamped at Bexleyheath. The King in his pursuit came to Blackheath, and there pitch'd his Tents; from whence he sent the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, the Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of the Privy Seal, to know the cause of this commotion: and to make offer of reconciliation, if the Duke's demands were not unreasonable. The Duke made answer, that nothing was intended against the King's Person, his Crown or Dignity: All that was fought, was to remove ill Counsellours from about the King, but especially Edward Duke of Somerset; whom if the King would be pleas'd to commit to ward, till his Legal Trial might be had in Parliament, he would then not only dismiss his Army, but come unto his presence as a loyal Subject. Hereupon the Duke of Somerset is committed to prison: The Duke of York dismiss'd his Army, and came into the King; in whose presence, (contrary to his expectation) he found the Duke of Somerset, which so mov'd him, that he could not hold, but presently charg'd him with Treason: which the Duke of Somerset not only denieth, but re- criminates the Duke of York to have confir'd the King's death, and the usurpation of the Crown. Whereupon, the King remov'd to London, the Duke of York, as a Prisoner riding before him, and the Duke of Somerset at liberty; which was not a little marvell'd at by many. And now the King calleth a Council at Wolfs- minster, where the two Dukes are earnest in excuting each other; but while the Council are debating of the matter, there comes a flush of lightening out of France, which diverted them. For the Earl of Kendal, and the Lord L'Ester, came Ambassadors from Burgandy, offering the command of the Crown of England; if they might but be assur'd to be defend'd by land and sea, but withal, at the same time there came a report, that Edward Earl of March, Son and Heir to the Duke of York, with a great power as marching towards London. Here was matter for a double confutation, and for this latter, it was resolv'd on, that the Duke of York, should in the presence of the King and Nobility, at the High Altar in Paul's, take his Oath of Submission and Allegiance to King Henry; which he accordingly did, and then had liberty to depart to his Castle at Wigmore. And for the former, the Earl of Shrewsbury with about three thousand men was sent into Gascoigne, who arriving in the Isle of Man, pass'd with his power, and took Frenc'cake and other pieces; but having received in the night instructions from Burgundy, a certain Conspirators, he makes all the speed he can to thither, and enters the Town before the French had notice of his coming: so that many of them were slain by the Lord L'Ester in their beds. Shortly after there arrived the Earl of Shrewsbury's Son, Sir John Talbot, with the battard of Somerset, and two and twenty hundred men, by whole means Burg- deaux.

down is well manned with English, in which time the Earl was not idle, but went from place to place to receive the offered submission of all places where he came: and having taken Chatis-lon, he strongly fortified it whereupon the French King raiseth an Army, and besiegeth Chatis-lon, to the relief whereof, the Earl made all that possible, and with eight hundred Horse, appointing the Earl of Kendal, and the Lord L'Ejfor to follow with the Foot. In his way he surprisfeth a Tower the French had taken, and put all within in to the Sword; and meeting five hundred French men, that had been foraging, many of them he slew, and the rest he chafed to their Camp. Upon whose approach the French left the siege, and retired to a place which they had formerly fortieth; whither the Earl followeth them, and resolutely chargeth them so home, that he got the entry of the Camp: where being one through the Thigh with an Harquebus, and his Horse foil under him, his Son defirous to receive his Father, loft his own life, and therein was accompanied with his Bafflard Brother Henry Talbot, Sir Edward Hall, and thirty other Gentlemen of name.
The Lord Malins with three score other were then Prisoners, the rest fled to Bardeaux, but in the way a thousand of them were killed, and thus on the last day of July, in the year 1453, at Chatislon, the most valorous Earl of Shrewsbury, the first of that name, after four and twenty years service beyond the Sea, ended his life and was buried at Ramin Normandy with this Inscription upon his Tomb, Here lieth the Right Noble Knight John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Wexford, Waterford, Valence, Lord Talbot of Goodrich, and Orchenfield, Lord Strange of Blackmares, Lord Verdon of Alton, Lord Cromenel of Winksfield, Lord Lewes of Warfoppe, Lord Furnival of Sheffield, Knight of the No-able Orders of St. George, St. Michael, and the Golden Fleece, great Marshal to King Henry the Sixth, of his Realm of France. The Earl of Kendal, the Lords Monforrest, Roheine, and Dangledas entred the Castle of Chatislon, and made it good against the French the space of twenty years: but having in the end, they perished it, upon composition to have liberty to depart to Bardeaux: and now the Gascaigne were as ready to open their Gates to the French, as they were before to the English; by means whereof, in short time, the French recovered again all Gascaigne except Bardeaux, and that also at length, upon condition that both Garrisons and Inhabitants with all their substance might safely depart for England and Calicie, and that the Lords L'Ejfor and Durant, with thirty others, upon pain of death should never after be found in the Territories of France.

At this time upon St. Bartholomew's day, an custom in that nation, being, that the Mayor of London, and the Sheriffs should be present in giving prizes to the best Wretters, it happened that at the Wrestling-place near Moor-field, the Prior of St. John's was there to see the fops, when a servant of his most humbling the disgrace to be boiled before his Master, against the custom of the place, would have wrestled again, which the Mayor denied; whereupon the Prior fetched Bow-men from Clerkenwell, to resit the Mayor, and some sloughter was committeth; the Mayors Cap was shot through with an Arrow, he nevertheless would have had the spot go on, but no Wretters came; yet the Mayor Sir John Norman told his Brethren, he would stay a while to make trial of the Citizens resistent against him; which he had no sooner said, but the Citizens with Banners displayed came in great numbers to him, and fetcht him home in great triumph. Upon the neck of this began the quarrel in Holborn, between the Gentleman of the Inns of Chancery, and some Citizens; in appeasing whereof, the Queens Attorney and three more were slain.

And now the Duke of York by all means la-boureth to stir up the hatred of the Commons against the Duke of Somerset, repeating often what did hitherto England intimated by Somerset's giving up the strong Towns of Normandy; and how he abused the Kings and Queens favour to his own gain, and the Commons grievance: then he addreath himself to those of the Nobility that could not well brook his too much commanding over the Kings and Queens affection. Amongst others he lifeth upon the two Newls, both Richards, the Father of the other, the one Earl of Salisbury, the other of Warwick; with whom he deals so effectually, that an indiffusible knot of friendship is knit betwixt them; by whose assistance (the King lying dangerously sick at Claringdon) the Duke of Somset is arbitrated in the Queens great Chamber, and sent to the Tower; and in a Parliament now convoaked, appeareth of Treafor, and many damns-sons objecteth against him. Whereupon the King, though weak, is brought to London, of purpose to dissolve the Parliament; and that dis-folved, the Duke of Somerset is presently fet at liberty again, and not only so, but is made Capain of Calicie and Guinifer, the only remaining the English had in France. Upon this the Duke of York and his party, with a great power, marshc towards London; against whom, the King attended with the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Buckingham, and his Son, both named Hanover, Henry Earl of Northumberland, James Earl of Wiltshire, John Earl of Pembroke, many thousand men, marched forwards; at St. Albans both Armies meet: The Duke in the morning sends a Letter to the King, protesting his fidelity and sincerity, only he delivers the Duke of Somerset may be delivered, to stand or fall by the Judgement of his Peers; and this he would have, or dye in the pursit. The King for answer, commandeth him to desband, and sub-misst to his mercy, and not expect, that he will deliver any in his Army, who have shewed their loves in standing to him. Herewith the Duke acquaints his friends, who hereupon fall every one to his quarter: The Earl of Warwick fell upon the Lord Clifford's quarter, where the Duke of Somerset hating to the refuge, was slain, and with him the Earl of Northumberland, Hamfrey Earl of Stafford, the Lord Cliff-ford, and about five thousand others, besides not by that house; but the King himself fet in the neck with an Arrow; the Duke of Buckingham was by the side; and the Lord Duke, in the faces; the Earl of Dorset so hurt, that he was fain to be con-

ried home in a Cart: The King's Army had been increased after his coming forth to eight thousand; but now they are all dispersed or slain; and the King, unguarded, is left in a poor, naked house, whither, to be freed from the danger of Arrows, he had withdrawn himself. The Duke of York, having notice where the King was gone with Warwick and Salisbury; who all three upon their knees, present themselves before him, making humble Petition to him for pardon of what was past; and now seeing the common enemy was slain, they had what they aimed at. To whom the King thus affectionately, said, Let there be no more killing then, and I will do what you will have me. This first Battle of St. Albans was fought upon the three and twentieth day of May, in the three and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign. The bodies of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford were buried in the Chappel there. And now the Duke of York in the Kings name, commands a Surcease from further hostility: and in all reverent manner conveyeth the King to London, where they keep the Feast of Pentecost together. At which time a Parliament is summoned to begin at Wolminster, the ninth day of July; and therein it is enacted, that the Duke of Gloucester should be declared publicly a Royal Subject, and that none should misreport or dispute the actions of the Duke of York; or of any in his company: and moreover the Duke of York is made Protecor of the Kings Person, and of the Realm, the Earl of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellor, and the Earl of Warwick Captain of Califfes, wherein they all carried themselves with unblamable demeanour.

In this mean time, the Queen not well pleased with these proceedings, seeks all means to incite the Lords of her party, and they as much seek to incite her to make opposition; the puts the Duke of Buckingham in minde that these Traitors had slain his hopeful Son at St. Albans; the eldest the now Duke of Somerset, that by them his dear Father lost his life: And they again put the Queen in minde of the unfaferable indigity done to her, in making her Husband only a King in name, setting a Tutor over him, as though he were a child, whilest the Duke of York and his Complices manage all. Upon which incitation, all the Enemies of the Yorkshire Faction are assembled by the Queen at Greenwich, where it is debated of some course to be taken for restoring the King to his former liberty and Government. At length it is concluded, that the Duke of York should be commanded to give over his place of Protecorship, for that the King was of years and discretion sufficient to rule of himself without a Guardian; and the Earl of Salisbury to surrender his place of being Lord Chancellor, for that the great Seal was never delivered him, being that which was now used, was made since the Kings restraint, and therefore not sufficient: to which conclusion of theirs, the King, easie to be wrought upon, yields his consent, and thereupon they are both discharged from their Offices, and summoned to appear at the Council Table at Greenwich. But the Lords were wiser then to put themselves in their hands, and therefore make answer, that none had power to dispose them, nor to command their appearance in any place, but in Parliament; and so they continued about London, placing and displacing whom they pleased, and by their triumvirate authority, took John Holland Earl of Exeter out of Sanctuary, and sent him prisoner to Pomfret Castle. These proceedings gave occasion to the licentious multitude to raise commotions, and the Pretenses of London upon a very flight occasion, fall upon out-landish Merchants, rifle and rob their houses; and the Mayor assembling a company of Substantial Citizens to support them, the King of the disorderly of the disorderly flies to Sanctuary, Commissioners are sent to enquire and punish the offence; but when the Mayor and Commissioners were set, tidings came that the Commons were up in Arms; whereupon the Commissioners left the business to be proceeded in by the Mayor, who so discreetly ordered the matter, that many of the offenders were punished, some by death, others by fine, and all things were quieted and appeased.

At this time the French having nothing to do against the English in France, would needs be doing something against them in England. They set out two Fleets, one under the conduct of William Lord Powys, the other of Sir Peter Bressy; the Lord fell upon Fulney in the West Country, the Knight upon Sandwich in Kent, where some hurt they did, but not of importance to counter vary their Voyage.

And now the Queen finding the little respect the Londoners bore to her party or the King, perfuaded the King, as for his health and recreation, to make a Progress into Warwickshire, which he did, by the way, hunting and hawking; and the Queen making few of nothing but pastimes; and this she did, with a purpose the easieter to entrap the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick. To whom the writ most loving Letters, earnestly inviting them to be at Coventry by an hour appointed; which they not doubting any fraud, intended to have done; but hearing by the way of the mischief plotted against them, they caused their Retinue to go on-ward the way to the Court, as though themselves were coming after; but they provided otherwise for their safety, the Duke of York with a Groom and a Page getting him to Wigmore Castle, the Earl of Salisbury to his Castle of Middleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to the Sea-side, and so to Calife. But before they parted, they agreed upon an Alphabet, by which they might have intercourses of Letters, yet their intentions kept undiscovered.

The King unwitting of this mischief intended against the Duke of York and his friends, returneth to London, where he calleth a Council; and therein of his own accord, determ ined that some course might be invented for a perfect reconciliation of all parties: promising upon his Salvation, (an extenuation not usual with him) to entertain the Duke of York and his friends, that all discontentes should be removed, and a perfect amity on all parts be established: to which end messengers are dispatched to the Duke of York, and all other his party, commanding them upon urgent affairs of the Realm, and upon Royal Promise of safe conduct, to repair to his Court at London, at a day appointed. The Duke of York accordingly came, and with 400. men well apparelled, lodged at his house called Baynards Castle; the Earl of Salisbury with 500. men, lodged likewise at his house called the Harbour: The Duke of Exeter ( lately released) and the Duke of Somerset with 800. men, were lodged within Temple Bar: The Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford with 1500. men were lodged in Holborn: The Earl of Warwick with 600. in red Jackets with juggled Staves, embroidered behind and before, were lodged at the Grey-Friers in London. Upon the following day the King and the Queen came to London, and were lodged at the Bishop's Palace; the Mayor having five hundred well appointed men in readines, rode with a competent number all day long round the City, for preservation of the Kings Peace, The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friers; the other, at the Chapter-house at Westminster: Between both, the Reverend Archibishop of Canterbury, the Son of Henry Bembocher Earl of Effy, with some other of the most able Prelates interceded so, that by their mediation it was at last concluded, that all wrongs and misdemeanours on every side should be forgotten and forgiven, that each side should be friends to the other, and both be obedient to the commands of the King. Besides this in general, there were some particular Articles to be performed by the Duke of York, the Earl of Salisbury and Warwick, which afterward was ratified of the great Seal of England, the 24. day of March, in the 36. year of the Reign of King Henry the sixth. Upon the publication whereof, a solemn Proclamation was made in Paul's Church, at which the King was present with his Crown on his head; before him hand in hand went the Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Salisbury, the Duke of Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, and so one of the one, another of the other part, till they were all marshalled: behind the King came the Queen, the Duke of York leading her by the hand, who in going made shew of favourable countenance towards him. Divine Service ended, they return to the Court in all outward appearance truly reconciled; but all was diffembled, as will presently appear: for presently upon this, an affray fell out between a servant of the Earl of Warwick's, and a Courtier, who in the encounter is dangerously wounded; the Earls men fleeth; the Kings Servants seeing their fellow hurt, and the offender escaped, watch the Earls coming from the Council Table, and affait him; many are hurt, but the Earl geth to Wherry, and so escapes to London; the Queen incontinently commands the Earl to be committed to the Tower, but he foreseeing the danger, pohts to Yorkshire, where he acquaints the Duke of York, and his Father the Earl of Salisbury of all the occurrences, with the palpable discovery of the Queens cannon'd disposition, advising them to stand upon their Guard, and to provide against the approaching storm. Hirfield speeded to Calices, The Reign of King Henry the Sixth.

The Duke of Buckingham is received at the Exchequer, and comes out of Ireland, where he has laid open his title to the Crown.

The Duke of York, having first attacked the Earl of Warwick, and then the Earl of Surrey, made himself master of London, and the whole kingdom.

The Earl of Warwick is received at the Exchequer, and comes out of Ireland, where he has laid open his title to the Crown.

The Earl of Warwick having notice, that his Father the Earl of Salisbury was upon march to meet him, passed over the river, and without impeachment, joined with him and his friends near Exeter.

The King with the Dukes of Somerset, and Buckingham, with a great Army marched towards them, and near to the Town of Northampton both Armies met. The Earl of March with the advice of the Earl of Warwick prepares for the fight: The Queen (the King more intense to devotion then fighting) did the like. The fight continued about two hours, where the Queen in battle and the King above seven thousand men; but upon the fall of Henry Duke of Buckingham, the King fled, and John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, and Thomas Lord Egremont, John Lord AMCarelin, and some other of account were slain. The Queen with the Duke of Somerset, taking with them the young Prince, fled to the Bishoprick of Durham. The King himself was taken, and as a Prisoner conveyed to London: where the Tower is yielded to the Earl of Warwick; the Lord Seales in disguised apparel endeavouring to escape, is taken by the watermen, and being beheaded, and his Corps carelessly left upon the Sands. Thomas Thrope one of the Bishops of the Exchequer, in the Habit of a Monk, his Crown torn, purposing to fly to the Queen, is taken and committed Prisoner to the Tower; and after by the Commons Beheaded at High gate. The Duke of York being advertised of this good success, leaveth Ireland and pois to London, where in the Kings name, he summons a Parliament; which being assembled, he in the presence of the Lords in the Upper House, placeth himself in the Imperial Seat, and with great boldness lays open his rightful claim to the Crown of England, as being the Son and Heir of Anne, Daughter and Heir of Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Son and Heir of Philip, the Fole Daughter and Heir of Lisel, Duke of Clarence, the third Son of Edward the Third, and elder Brother of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, Father of the Uffrances Henry the Fourth, Grandfather to King Henry the Sixth. And after relating the many miseries that had beenfallen the Realm since the time of this usurpation, he concluded, that he would not expect nor desire possession of the Crown, except his doughter be indisputable, and his title without exception. This being a business of importance, required deliberation; but in conclusion, the Duke having beforehand prepared the Lords Spiritual, and few of the Nobility being present, that were not of his part, the Burgelies were easily persuaded; and it was generally resolved, and enacted accordingly, that King Henry during his life, should retain the title and honour of a King; that the Duke of York should be declared Heir apparent to the Crown, and Protector of the Duke of Perse, his Lands and Dominions, and that at any time, any of King Henry's Friends, Allies, or Favourites in his behalf should attempt the dissanuing this Act, that then the Duke should have present possession of the Crown. It is not unworthy the note, that while the Earl of March was declaring his title in the Upper House, it happened in the Nether House, that a Crown which hung in the middle of the House, to garnish a Branch to let light upon, without touch or winde, fell suddenly down as likewhile at the same time fell down the Crown which flood on the top of Dover-Castle. A sign as some thought, that the Crown of the Realm should be changed. As soon as the Parliament was dissolved, the Duke dispatched Letters into Scotland, requiring in the Kings name, the Queen, the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and all other of the Nobility that remained in the Kingdom, with all speed, to repair to the strong place of defense in London; but they laid other work in hand, for having gotten together of English and and Scots, to the number of eighteen thousand, they came marching into England. Against whom went the Duke of York with his younger Son the Earl of Rutland, and the Earl of Salisbury, (leaving the King in the custody of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Warwick) and approaching near the Queens Army, he was certified by the Scots, that the enemy far exceeded his power, both in number, and in all warlike preparations (he not having in his Army above five thousand men) and therefore the Earl of Salisbury advised him to retire, and to attend the coming of the Earl of March, who was gone into Wales to raise the March men. But the pride of his former Victory made him deaf to all counsel of declining the Batter, and so hastened on by his destiny, from Sandal Castle he marched on to Wakefield Green; where the Lord Clifford on the one side, and the Earl of Wiltshire, on the other, were placed in Ambuscade. The Duke of York supposing that the Duke of Somerset who led the Batter had no more Forces then what were with him, undauntedly marched towards him; but being entered within their danger, Ambushed on both sides, brake out upon him, and flew with him through three thousand of his men, the retied. The Earl of Salisbury was taken Prisoner, and hammers Rutland nor above twelve years old, who came thither but to see fashions, is made a Sacrifice for his Fathers transgressions, who kneeling upon his knees, with tears begging life, is unmercifully stabbed to the heart by the Lord Clifford, in part of revenge (as he swore) of his Fathers death. And the Queen most unwomanly in cold blood caused the Earl of Salisbury, and as many as were taken Prisoners, to be beheaded at Pembrey Castle, and to have their heads placed on poles, about the Walls of York. Thus died Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who had taken to Wife Cieely Daughter of Ralph Nevil, the first Earl of Welford, by whom he had the eight sons and four Daughters his eldest Son Edward was young, his second Son Edward was afterward King of England; his third Son Edmund Earl of Rutland was slain with his Father; John, Thomas, and William died young; his seventh Son George was after Duke of Clarence; his youngest Son Richard surnamed Croceback, was after King of England. Anne his eldest Daughter was married to Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, his second Daughter Elizabeth was married to John de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, his third Margaret to Charles Duke of Burgogne, his fourth Ursula died young. This Duke being dead, had his head crowned with a paper Crown, together with many circumstances of degrading him; but this act of fright was fully afterwards recompounded upon their heads that did it.

The Earl of March hearing of this Fathers death, laboured now to much the more earnestly, in that he laboured for himself; and parted from Sherwood whose Inhabitants were molt firm unto him, he increased his Armies to the number of three and twenty thousand, and presently took the field: and having advertisement that Jasper Earl of Pembroke, with the Earl of Ormonde and Wiltshire followed after him with a great power of Welf and Irish, he suddenly marched back again, and in a Plain near Mortimer's Cross, on Candlemas day in the morning gave them Batter, where with the slaughter of three thousand and eight hundred, he pits the Earls to flight. George Tremor who had married Queen Katherine, Mother to King Henry the sixth, and divers Welsh Gentlemen were taken, and at Hertford beheaded. Before the Batter, it is said, the Sun appeared to the Earl of March like three Suns, and suddenly it joyned altogether in one; for which cause some imagine, that he gave the Sun in its full brightness, for his Badge of Cognizance. The Queen in the mean time encouraged by the death of the Duke of York, with a power of Northern men marched towards London: but when her Souldiers were once South of Trent, as if the River were the utmost limit of their good behaviour, they fell to forrage the Country in most barbarous manner. Approaching St. Albans, they were advertised that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick were ready to give them Batter; whereupon the Queens Vaward hasteth to pass through Saint Albans; but being not suffered to pass, they encountered with their Enemies in the Field called Berwick Heath. Who perceiving the main Batter to stand still, and not to move; which was done by the treachery of Lovelier, who with the Kentish men had the leading of it, they soon made the Southern men to turn their backs and flye: upon which flight the ret in doubt of each others well-meaning shuddled away, the Lords about the King perceiving the danger withdrew themselves. Only the Lord Bonville coming in a complemenat manner to the King, and saying it grieved him to leave his Majestie, but that necessity for the safeguard of his life enforced it, was importuned, and Sir Thomas Kyriel a Knight of Kent likewise, by the King to stay; he passing his Royal Word that their stay should be no danger to them: upon which promise they stayed, but to their cost. For the Queen hearing that the Commons had beheaded Baron Tharp at High gate, the in revenge thereof, caused both their heads to be stricken off at St. Albans: so that the Batter was sparred at this Batter the full number of three and twenty hundred, but no man of name, but only Sir John Gray, who the same day was made Knight, with twelve others at the Village of Ceneby. And now the King was advised to send one Thomas Hor, (that had been a Barrister) to the Victor, to tell them, that he would gladly come to them, if with convenience it might be done: whereupon the Earl of Northumberland, appointed divers Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met to their great joy: but it was now observed, as it were in the design of King Henry; that although he were a most pious man, yet no enterprize of War did ever prosper where King Henry was present. No enterprize of War ever prospered where King Henry was present. they went to the Abbey, where they were received with Anthems, and withal an humble Petition to be protected from the outrage of the loose Souldiers; which was promised, and Proclamation made to that purpose, but to small purpose, for the Northern men said, it was their bargain to have all the spoil in every place, after they had passed

so they robbed and spoiled whatsoever they could come at. The Londoners hearing of this disorder, seeing there was no more assurance in the Kings promise, to keep the Northern men out of their Gates; intomuch that when they were fentro, to lend over to the Camp certain Cart-loads of Lenten Provision, which the Mayor accordingly provided, the Commons rose about Cripplegate, and by strong hand kept the Mayor from the Camp. He then on the Mayor sends the Recorder to the King's Council, and withal intreats the Dutches of Bedford, and the Lady Scales, to interced for him to the Queen; and to excuse his not using force, considering how dangerous it might be in these doubtful times, to stir their fury that would not easily be allayed. It was well advised to send women to intreat a woman, for by this means they prevailed, that some of the Lords of the Council, with a guard of four hundred good Souldiers were appointed to go for London to enquire and certify of these things: when suddenly news was brought, that the Earl of March with a great Army was marching towards them. For the Earl of Warwick having gathered together his scattered Troops, and joined with the Earl of March, they hasted towards London, and were joyfully received upon the eight and twentieth day of February; and upon Saturday the second of March, the Earl of Warwick, with all his Army in St. John's field: and having cast them into a ring, read unto them the agreement of the last Parliament, and then demanded, whether they would have King Henry to reign still? who all cried, No, no: Then he asked them, whether they would have the Earl of March eldest Son of the Duke of York (by that Parliament proclaimed King) to reign over them? who with a great clamour cried, Yea, yea: Then went there certain Captains, and others of the City, to the Earl of March at Baynard's Castle, to acquaint him with what was pass'd; who at first seem'd to exauce himself, asunable to execute so great a charge: but animated by the Archbishops of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at last contented to take it upon him. And thereupon the next morning he went in Proclamation to Paris, and offered there; and after Te Deum sung, he was in great state convey'd to Westminster, and there in the great Hall, feated in the Kings seat, with the Sceptre of St. Edward in his hand. And then again the people, of whom there was a great concourse, were loud demanded, if they would acknowledge him to be their King? to which with great willingness they all cried, Yea, yea. Then taking homage of divers Noblemen there present, he was with Proclamation and great solemnity convey'd to the Abbey, and placed in the Quire as King, whilst Te Deum was singing. That done, he offered at Saint Edward's Shrine, and then returned by water to Paris, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace; and upon the fourth of March he was generally Proclaimed King, by the name of Edward the Fourth. And here in the course of all Writers, ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, that it may be truly said, Never came any to be King so soon after his Birth, nor left to be King so long before his Death; for he came to be King at eight months old, and he left to be King, living twelve years after. There was indeed in that pace of time, a certain viciuity, sometimes a King, and sometimes no King; the pages whereof must be related in the following Kings Reign.

Of his Taxation.

In the first year of his Reign, Parliament was holden at London, where the Queen Mother with the young King in her lap came and sat amongst the Lords; and there was then granted a Subsidy of five Nobles upon every sack of Wool that should pass out of the Land, for three years: but if carried out by Merchants strangers, then to pay three and forty shillings for every sack. In the third year of his Reign a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein was granted a Subsidy of twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandize coming in, or passing out of the Realm, and three shillings of a Ton of Wine, for the term of three years. In his sixth year, in a Parliament at Westminster was granted a Subsidy, of every Ton of Wine three shillings, and of other Merchandize, except Wool, Fell, and Cloth, twelve pence in the pound. Also of every Parish through the Realm (except Cities and Boroughs) the Benefice being in valuten Marks, Ten of that Parish should pay six shillings eight pence; and of every Benefice of the value of ten pounds, ten Parochioners should pay thirteen shillings four pence; and so ratably of every Benefice, from the lowest to the highest. And for the Inhabitants of Cities and Boroughs, every man being worth twenty shillings above his household-stuffe, and the apparel of him and his Wife, should pay four pence, and so after that rate to the richest.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

In the 32 year of this King, the Lord Mayor of London first began to go by water to Westminster to take his Oath, where before they used to go by Land. Also in this Kings Reign the Art of Printing was found out at Maguncia in Germany, by a Knight called John Gutenberg, and brought into England by William Caxton, of London Mercer, who first practiced the same in the Abbey at Westminster in the year 1471. In the 32 year of his Reign, in the Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that when wheat was sold for six shillings eight pence the quarter, Rye for four shillings, and Barley for three shillings, it should be lawful for any man to carry the said kindes of Corn into the parts beyond the Sea without licence; so it were not to the Kings Enemies or Rebels; which Act was afterward confirmed by King Edward the Fourth.
Affairs of the Church in his time.

A Great Schism was in the Church in this King's time by reason of Anti-Popes; for remedy whereof, a Council is called at Constance, to which the Emperor of Constantinople and Teyts and sent their Ambassadors. In this Council John the third and twentieth is convented, condemned, depofed, and imprifoned. Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth are deposed, and Osbo Colonna, by the name of Martinus the fifth, is chosen Pope. During these confitions in the Western Church, the Chriftians in the Eastern Church are utterly ruined. The Emperor med, but to death in a pres of people, and the great City of Constantinople won by the Turk, made ever since the fett of his Empire. In the fix and thirtieth year of this King, Reynold Peacock, Bishop of Chichefter, who had laboured many years in tranlating the Holy Scripture into English, was accufed and confuted, for holding and publihing certain opinions at that time held Herefical, which at latly openly at Pauls Crofs he revoked; that he had held, there was no neceffity to believe that Chrift defcended into Hell: also no neceffity to believe in the Communion of Saints, or that the Universal Church cannot erre in matters of Faith; or that it is necessary to believe and hold whatsoever a General Council shall determine: Also that he had held, that Spiritual perohns ought to have no Temporal Pofterions; and that perohnal Tythes were not due by Gods Law. These Points he openly renounced, but was notwithftanding deposed of his Bishopfip; only a certain Pension was affigned him to live on in an Abbey, where soon after he died.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his time.

The King himfelf founded two famous Colledges, the one in Cambridge, to our Lady and St. Nicholas, called the Colledge-Royal, or the King-Colledge; the other of Eaton besides Wintfors, called of our Blessed Lady: to the maine-tenance whereof, he gave 3400 pounds by year. In the 28th year of his Reign, his Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queens-Colledge in Cambridge. In the time of his Reign alfo, Henry Chichly Archibishop of Canterbury founded two Colledges in Oxford, one called All-Souls-Colledge, the other Bernard-Colledge. In his time alfo, Humphry Duke of Gloucefler (but others fay, Thomas Kemp, Archibishop of Canterbury) built the Divinity School in Oxford; alfo the faid Archibishop built Pauls Crofs in form as now it flanitheth; and William Winters, Bishop of Winchefter and Lord Chancellour of England founded Mary Magdalene Colledge in Oxford. In his feventeenth year, Ralph Lord Croman, built the Colledge of Tofthal in Lancifhire. Alfo this year William Eafffied Mayor of London, caufed to be built at his own charge the Water-Conduit in Fleetfreet. In his ninth year, John Welli Mayor of London, caufed the Conduit commonly called the Standard in Cheapside to be built. In his firft year the Well-Gate of London, sometime called Chambrelain-gate, and now Neogate, was begun to be new built by the Executors of Sir Richard Whittington, Lord Mayor of London. In his fifth year, John Reynold Mayor of London, gave certain Lands to the City of London, for which the City is bound to pay for ever, all Fifteens that shall be granted to the King, (so as it pays not three Fifteens in one year) for three Wards in London; namely, Doughtie-Ward, Billifgate-Ward, and Agate. Alfo this year the Tower at the Draw-Bridge of London was begun by the fame Mayor. In his four and twentieth year, Simon Eyre Lord Mayor of London built the London-Hall in London, to be a Free-House for Grain and Fuel for the poor of the City, and a fair Chappell at the Exit-end of the fame, leaving, in flock a thoufand pounds, which afterward King Edward the Fourth borrowed and never paid it again. Alfo in this King's time, William de la Pool Duke of Suffolk, and Alice his Wife, Daughter to Thomas Chanucer, Son to Geffy Chanucer the famous Poet, translatd and encrefed the Manour place of Ewelme in Oxfordfide, and built new the Parifh Church of Ewelme, and an Hospital or Alms-houfe for two Priests, and thirteenth poor men, to which he gave three Manours, Ramings in Hampfhire, Cowick in Wiltfhire, and Merib in Buckinghamfide: They alfo founded the Hospital of Donington Castle.

In his fifth year was so unfeafonable weather, that it rained almoft continually from Eafter to Midsummer. In his seventh year, the eighth of November, the Duke of Normandy was like to have been drowned paffing through London-Bridge, his Barge being fet upon the Piles, overwofted fo, that thirty perohns were drowned, and the Duke with others that escaped, were fain to be drawen up with Ropes. In his feventeenth year was fo great a dearth of Corn, that people were glad to make them bread of Fern-roots. In his eighteenth year all the Lions of the Tower died. Alfo in this year, the 18. day of July, the Poftern-Gates of London by Eaff Smithfield againft the Tower of London, fank by night more then feven foot in the earth. In his two and twentieth year, on New-year day, near unto Bedforde, a very deep water-r, which ran between the Towns of Swelfline and Harlifwood, broke suddenly fill, and divided it felf, fo that by the space of three miles, the bottom remained dry: which wonder, many thought to confine the division of the people, and falling away from the King, which happened shortly after. In the three and thirtieth year of his Reign, besides a great Blazing-Star, there happened a strange light, a Moniftrous Cock came out of the Sea; and in the prefence of a multitude of people at Portland, made a hideous crowing three times, each time turning about clapping his Wings, and beckening towards the North, the South, and the Weft, as alfo many prodigious Births. In his fix and thirtieth year, in a little Town in Bedforde, it rained blood, whereof some drops appeared in sheets hung out to dry.
Of his Wife and Issue.

He married Margaret Daughter of Roger Duke of Arundel, and Titular King of Jerusalem, Sicilie, and Arragon, by whom he had a small Portion, and little Strength of Alliance; yet might it have been a good match, if they could have changed conditions with one another, that he might have had her active and stirring Spirit, and she her soft and milde disposition. She was his Wife fix and twenty years, and after her Husband's depulsion from the Royal Throne, his Forces being vanquished at the Battel of Tewksbury, in a poor Religious House whither she had fled for safety of her life, was taken Prisoner and carried Captive to London, where she remained in durance, till Duke Roger her Father purchased her liberty, unto whom she returned, and lastly died in her native Country. By her King Edward had issue only one Son named Edward, who when the day was lost at Tewksbury, sought to escape by flight; but being taken, was brought into the presence of King Edward, whose reflute answers provoked King Edward so much, that he dashed him on the mouth with his Gauntlets, and then Richard the Crookedstake ran him into the heart with his Dagger. His Body was buried amongst the poor persons there lain, in the Monastic Church of the Black-Friers in Tewksbury.

Of his Death and Burial.

Upon King Edward's recovering the Crown, he was committed to the Tower, where the 21. of May, in the year 1472, he was murthered by the bloody hand of Richard Duke of Gloucester; the day after he was brought to Paul's Church in an open Coffin bare-faced, where he bled; thence carried to the Black-Friers where he also bled; from thence in a Boat to Bersy Abbey, without Priest or Clerk, Torch or Taper, saying or singing, and there buried; but afterward at the appointment of King Edward was removed to Westminster, and there interred, and a fair Monument made over him.

He was tall of stature, spare and slender of body, of a comely countenance, and all parts well proportioned. For endowments of his minde, he had vertues enough to make him a Saint, but not to make him a God; as Kings are said to be Gods; for of that commanding power there being two parts, Parere subiectis, & debellare superbus, he wanted the latter. He was not sensible of that which the world calls Honour, accounting the greatest Honour to consist in humility. His greatest imperfection was, that he had in him too much of the Log, and too little of the Stork; for he would not move, but as he was moved, and had rather be devoured, than he would devour. He was not so stupid, not to know prosperity from adversity; but he was so devout, to think nothing adversity, which was not a hindrance to Devotion.

The REIGN of

KING EDWARD

THE FOURTH.

Edward Earl of March, born at Roan in New dy, Son and Heir of Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, slain in the Bat-tel at Wakefield, succeeded his Father in the Right, but exceeded him in the Poffeffion of the Crown of England; and that by virtue of an Act of Parliament lately made, wherein theaid Duke of York not only was declared Heir apparent to the Crown, and appointed Protector of the King and Kingdom: but it was further Enacted, that if King Henry, or any in his behalf, should attempt the difannulling of this Act, then that the said Duke of York His Heir should have the present poffeffion; which because his Friends attempted to do, therefore justly doth Edward Earl of March his Son, by virtue of this Act, take poffeffion of the Crown, and is proclaimed King of England, by the name of Edward the fourth, through the City of London, on the fifth day of March in the year 1460. But before he could have leisure to be Crowned, he was forced once again to try his fortune in the field by Battle: For King Henry in the North was raising a new Army, gainst whom King Edward upon the twelfth of March, marched with his Forces from London: and by safe Journeys came to Pontefet Castle, from whence the Lord Fitzwater was sent to guard the Passage at Ferrivride, to stop the Enemies approach that way: King Henry likewise advanceth forward, lending his power under the Conduit of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whilest himself with his Queen and Son stay at York. The Lord Clifford very early on Pint-Sunday, with a Troop of Northern men, falls upon those that guarded Ferrivride, and defeated them with the slaughter of the Lord Fitzwater, and the Bastard of Salisbury. The Earl of Wick hearing of this defeat, comes posing to King Edward's Camp; and in his presence killing his Horfe, protested his Resolution to fand with him to the death. Upon this Reso-fution of the Earls, the King made pretenely Proclamation, that all who were afraid to fight, should at their pleasure depart; but to those that would slay he promised good reward: ading withal, that if any that stayed, should after turn his back or flee, then he that should kill him, should have double pay. After this he gave order to the Lord Fauconbridge, and Sir Walter Blunt, to lead on the Yarrow; who in their march about Damfingdale, came encountered with the Lord Clifford (who formerly in cold blood had slaughter the young Earl of Rutland) and he being tirickren in the Throat with an Arrow, (some say) without a head, and preently dying; The Lord Nevil Son and Heir of the Earl of Wiltshire was also slain, with most of their Companies, and the rest put to flight. The next day likewise (the Duke of Norfolk being dangerously fick, to whom that place was alligned) Fauconbridge and Blunt continue the leading of the Vanguard; and on Palm-Sunday, by break of day, they came to a plain field between Tuxton and Sexton, from where they made a full survey of King Henry's Armies; and certificd King Edward, that the Enemy was three score thousand strong; where his Army was but forty thousand and six hundred.
Whereupon a second Proclamation was made through the Camp, that no quarter should be kept, nor prisoner taken. The Armies being both in light, the Lord Fauconbridge gave direction to the Archers (upon a signal by him given) to shoot every man a flight-Arrow (for that purpose provided) and then to fall back three stripes, and stand. The Northern men in the mean time played their Bows till all their Arrows were empty; but their Arrows fell short of the Enemy by three score yards: and not only did no hurt to the Enemy, but did hurt hurt to themselves; for their Arrows being spent, and coming to hand-blows, their own Arrows flicking in the ground, galled their fins and pierced their feet. Ten hours the Bat-tel continued doubefull, till the Earl of Northumberland being slain, with the Lord Bea-mont, Gray, Duces, and spells, Sir John Nevil, Andrew Trelap, and many other Knights and Eliques, the Earls of Exeter and Somerset fled, leaving the Conquest to King Edward: but the blood was that ever England felt, for there fell that day fix and thirty thousand seven hundred three score and fifteen persons, no prisoners being taken but the Earl of Devonshire.
The Battle ended, King Edward hastes to York, where he caufed the heads of his Father and other Friends to be taken down and buried with their bodies, lattjng in their places the Heads of the Earl of Devonshire, and three other, there at that time executed. The Earl of Somerset acquainting King Henry with this overthrow, persuades him with his Queen and Dd 2 Son
Son, to flee to Berwick, where leaving the Duke of Somerset, they lie further for succour to the King of Scots, who comforted them with promise of relief, but maketh a sure bargain; for in lieu of a pension to be allowed to King Henry, leaving the Town and Castle of Berwick were delivered to him. Queen Margaret and her Son are sent into France, who obtained of Lennox the eleventh her Cousin, that all of King Edward's friends were prohibited day or traffic in the French King's Dominions: but all King Henry's friends might live there freely. After this King Edward comes to London, and upon his entrance to the Tower, makes four and twenty Knights, and the next day four more; and upon the 28. day of June, in the year 1461, he rode from the Tower to Westminster, and was there Crowned in the Abbey-Church.

Shortly after a Parliament is summoned, which began at Westminster the fourth of November; in which all Acts of King Henry the Sixth prejudicial to King Edward's Title, are repealed; and therein John Earl of Oxford, a valiant and wise man, (he who in a former Parliament had disputed the question concerning the precedence of Temporal and Spiritual Barons, a bold attempt in those days; and by force of whole Argument, Judgement was given for the Lords Temporal) with his Son Aubrey de Vere, Sir Henry Percy, William Tyrrel, and Walter Montgomery, Equitares, were, without answer convicted of treason, and beheaded. And to encourage others to well deserving, King Edward at this time advanced many in honour; his Brother George he created Duke of Clarence; his brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, John Lord Neville Brother to the Earl of Warwick, he made first Viscount, then Marques of Montacute; Henry Bowcher Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, is made Earl of Essex; and William Lord Fauconbridge, Earl of Kent. And now their new honours are presently put into employment; the Earls of Essex and Kent, accompanied with the Lords Andrea and Clinton, Sir John Howard, Sir Richard Wolfegrave, and others, to the number of thousand, are appointed to scour the Seas: who landed in Britain, took the Town of Cinquest, and the Isle of Ely, and then returned. At this time Henry Duke of Clarence, Ralph Percy, and divers others came in, and humbly submitted themselves to King Edward's mercy; who professed his proposition of freely pardoning them, and as many other that would submit themselves as they did.

All this time King Henry was in Scotland, and Queen Margaret in France; where she obtained of the French King, a company of five hundred men, with whom she failed towards Newcastle, and landed at Timmouth, but suddenly again returned, and was her self by remitté beaten to Berwick; but her company was driven on the shore before Barnburgh Castle, where they let their Ships on fire, and fled to an Island called Holy Island: but were so faile, that by the Battard Ogil and John Manners, Esquire, that many of them were slain, and almost four hundred taken prisoners, only their Colonel Peter Bristie happened upon a Fisherman, who brought him to Berwick to Queen Margaret; and by her was made Captain of the Castle of Alnwick, which he with his French men kept, till they were rescued. Shortly after, Queen Margaret having got together a great company of Scots, and other of her Friends, bringing her Husband with her, and leaving her Son at Berwick, entered Northumberland, took the Castle of Barnburgh, made Captain thereof of Sir Ralph Gray; and then came forward to the Bithropolis of Durham, whither referred to her the lately reconciled, and now again revolted Duke of Somerset, Sir Ralph Percy, and divers others, who all together made a competent Army. King Edward hearing hereof, makes preparation both by Sea and Land; and first he sends Viscount Montacute with some Companies into Northumberland, whom he in person followeth with his whole power: The Viscount marcheth towards King Henry, and by the way encountreth the Lord Hungerford at Hyleg-moor; but he, with Lord Balf, upon the charge ran away, leaving Sir Ralph Darcy alone with his own Regiment, who were valiantly fighting, died. After this the Viscount understanding that King Henry was incamped in Lavelin-plaine, near the River of Douw in Hamshire, marcheth thither by night, and yer upon him in his Camp; whereupon the King's Men receive with a desperate resolution, but were in the end with great slaughter overthrown. Henry Percy, of the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Beaufort, Molins, Hungerford, Mowphant, Holby, and Sir John Findard, with many others, are taken prisoners. King Henry himself by the swiftness of his Horfe escaped, but very hardly; for one of his Hench-men that followed him, was taken, who had on his head, King Henry's Helmet, or some of his, his high Cap of Eflaire, called Aboes, garnished with two rich Crowns, which was presented to King Edward at York the fourth of May. The Duke of Somerset was beheaded presently at Hexam, the other Lords and Knights were had to Newcastle, and there after a little reprieve, were likewise put to death. Besides these, divers others, to the number of five and twenty, were executed at York, and in other places: This Duke of Somerset was never married, but had a natural Son named Charles Somerset, who was afterward created Earl of Warwick, Sir Humphrey Neville, and William Talbot calling himself Earl of Kyme, Sir Ralph Gray, and Richard Threlfall, with divers others that escaped from this Battle, hid themselves in secret places; but yet not so closely, but that they were espied and taken. The Earl of Kyme was apprehended in Riddelsdale, and brought to Newcastle, and there beheaded; Sir Humphrey Neville was taken in Holderness, and at York left his head. After this Battle called Hexam Field, King Edward came to the City of Durham; and from thence into Northumberland, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Montacute, the Lords Fauconbridge and Scrope, to recover such Castles as his enemies there held; which they effected; and taking in the Castle of Dunstanbrough, they found in it John Gois, servant to the Duke of Somerset, who was brought to York, and there beheaded; and taking in the Castle of Barnbrough, they found in it Sir Ralph Gray, whom he be had hower to be true to King Edward, and was
The Reign of King Edward the Fourth.

The Earl of Warwick set foot into France to treat of a marriage with the Lady Bona.

The Queen fled into France.

The Earl of Pembroke had good Sea little better than a Vauban.

The Mayor of London ordered that the Lord Treasurer was placed before him.

Serjeants at Law made.

In the mean time King Edward married the Lady Elizabeth Gray.

Sir Ralph Greyden was abroad in France.

In this time King Edward carries the Lady Elizabeth Gray.

Sir John Gaunt was a good man, and a great scholar.

The Guild of King Henry; they degraded from his order of Knighthood at Doncaster, by cutting off his gilt Spurs, renting his Coat of Arms, and breaking his Sword over his head; and then beheaded him.

In this mean time, King Henry (upon what occasion no man knows; but only led by the left hand of destiny) venturing in diffique, to come into England, and fizing from place to place, was at length discovered, and taken by one Cauton, or as others say, by Thomas Talbot, son to Sir Edward Talbot of Bofhaul; who deceived him, being at his dinner at Waddington-Hall in Lincolnshire, and brought him towards London, with his Legs tied under the horfe belly: in whose company were also taken Doctor Manning Dean of Windfor, Doctor Bole, and one Eilerton, whom the Earl of Warwick met by the way, and brought them all to the Tower of London; whilst the drestilled Queen, with her Son, once again is driven to fly for shelter into France; whither the new Duke of Somerset and his Brother John failed also, where they lived in great misery; and the Earl of Pembroke went from Country to Country littler better than a Vagabond.

At this time King Edward, to reward his followers, distributeth the Lands and Possessions of those that held with King Henry amongst them; but first made Proclamation that whatsoever of the contrary fiction would come in and fuchlike, should be received to the Clearneffe, and re-ferred to their Patrimonies.

In the fourth year of King Edward, in Michaelmas Term were made eight Serjeants at Law, Thomas Young, Nicholas Gentry, Richard Neel, Thomas Brow, Richard Pigot, John Catchly, and Guy Fans; who held their Feast in the Bishop of Ely's place in Belharn, where the Lord Grey of Ruthein, then Lord Treasurer of England, was placed before the Lord Mayor of London, being invited to the Feast; which gave such a diffalfe to the Mayor, that he presently departed with the Aldermen and Sheriffs, without calling of their Feast: and it was required to be a precedent in time to come.

And now King Edward no less inventive to perform the Office of a King in peace, than he had been before of a Captain in War, confidering with himself, that feditious and civil diffentions must needs breed disorders in a State, and that disorders bred by troubled times, are not like subdued waves, but will in time fettle of themselves, but recover clearnesse, like rufhing water, which once being up and let alone, will in time over-run the whole ground where they grow. He like a good Gardiner feeks to weed them out before they grow too rank, and endeavors to make a general reformation of abuses; and to that end in Michaelmas Term in the second year of his Reign, three days together he fate publickly with his Judges in Westminster Hall on the Kings Bench, to acquaint himfelf with the orders of that Court, and to observe what needed reformation in it, either at Bench or at Bar: as likewise he ordered the Officers of his Exchequer to take more moderate Fees; and to be more in tentive to the benefit of the Subject, than to their own unjust gain. He also daily frequented the Council Table, which he furnished for the most part, with such as were gracious amongst the Citizens, whom he employs about refpeces and business of private confequence; whereon mysteries of State were imitated only to such as he selected to be of his more pri vate Cabinet Council; by whom he being now of the age of three and twenty years, was advis ed that it was now time to provide for polli City, by taking a Wife; and to provide affo for the present time, by taking a fit Wife, which they conceived to be no where to flily found as in France; both thereby to bury old grudges between the two Nations, and also to avert af fance from Queen Margaret, the only distur ber of the State. And this being counsel, it only remained to make choice of a fit man for that employment, for which none was thought fo fit as Richard Neville Earl of Warwick; he therefore is presently fent into France, to treat of a Marriage to be had between King Edward and the Lady Bona, Daughter to Lewis Duke of Sutwy, and lifier to the Lady Carlisle then Queen of France; a Lady, no less for beauty and ver tuous qualities, than for Nobility of Blood, worthy to be a Queen. The Propofition is in France readily embraced, and willingly affented unto all parts. But in the mean time King Edward being hunting in Westwood Forrest be sides Stony-Stratford, he chanced to come to the Manour of Grafton, where the Dutchefs of Bedford then lay; and where her Daughter by Sir Richard Woodville, the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Widow of Sir John Gray of Grafton, (then at the right Battel of St. Albans, became a fuitor to her; and when he could not obtain her fuit by terms of wanton love, he was forced to seek it by terms of Marriage.

And here we may well think, there was no small conflict in King Edward's minde, between the two great Commanders, Love and Honour, which of them should be most potent; Honour put him in minde that it was against his Law, to take to Wife a meaner person than himself: but Love would take no notice of any difference of degrees, but took it for his Prerogative to make all perons equal. Honour perfuad feder him that it flood him much to make good the Ambaffege, in which he had fene the Earl of Warwick; but Love per fued him, that it flood him more to make good the Ambaffege sent to himself from a greater Prince. In conclusion, it appeared to be true which one obferves, Improbe amor, qui ne meret ris fortuna cognusc. Is it that Love will not make a man to do? Whether it be, that Love brings upon the minde a forgetfulness of all Circumstances, but such as tend to its own satisfaction: or whether it be that Love is amongst Patrons, as Oys amongst Liquors, which will always be supreme and at the top. Honour may be honoured, but Love will be obeyed; and therefore King Edward though he knew no Superior upon earth, ye he obeys the fummoms of Love; and upon the first day of May marriage the faid Lady Gray at Grafton; the first of our Kings since the Conquest that married his Subject: At which marriage none was present but the Dutches of Bedford, the Prietl, two Gentlemen, and a young man to help the Prietl at Mass. The year was 1366. With great solemnity, he was Crowned at Wolminster. It is not unworthy the relating the speech which King Edward had with his Mother, who sought to crost this Match.

"Where you stay (faith he) that she is a Widow, and hath already Children, by Gods blessed Lady, I am a Batchelor, and have some too; and so each of us hath a proof, that neither of us is like to be barren: And as for your objection of Bigamy, (for his Mother had charged him with being contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) Let the Bishop (faith he) lay it to my charge when I come to take Orders, for I understand it is forbidden a Prietl,

"But I never will it was forbidden a Prince. Upon this marriage the Queens Father was created Earl Rivers, and made High Constable of England; his Brother the Lord Anthony was married to the sole Heir of the Lord Scalf, and by her had that Barony; her Son Sir Thomas Grey was created Marquess Dorset, and married Cecily, heir to the Lord Bawtle. It may be thought a happy fortune for this Lady to be so matchted; but let all things be considered, and the miseries accruing to her by it, will be found equivalent, if not over-weighing all the benefits. For brift, by this match she drew upon herself the envy of many; and was the caufe that her Husband fled the Realm, and her self in his absence glad to take Sanctuary; and in that place to be delivered of a Prince, in a most unprincely manner. After which, surviving her Husband, she lived to see her two Sons most cruelly murdered; and for a conclusion of all, she lived to see her self confined to the Monastery of Benwood in Southwark, and all her goods confiscate by her own Son in Law.

And now the Earl of Warwick at his return, found that knot tied in England, which he had laboured to rive in France: His Ambassadors frustrated, the Lady Bona deluded, the King of France whitened, and himself made a flake, and the disgracefull instrument of all this, which although this be refered in a high degree, yet he had not been a Courrier so long, but in that time he had sufficiently learned the Art of dissembling; he paft it over lightly for the present, but yet carried it in his minde till a fit opportunity; and therupon procures leave to retire himself to his Castle of Warwick.

King Edward in the mean time, having just caufe to suspend he made the French his enemies, seek to make other Princes his friends. He enters into a League with John King of Aghan, to whom he sent for a present a score of Coffsal Ews, and five Rams, a small present in them, but great in the event; for it proved of more benefit to Spain, and of more detriment to England than could at first light have been imagined. And to secure himself at home, he took truce with the King of Scots for fifteen years. And where he had married before his two Sisters, Anne the eldest to Henry Holland Earl of Exeter; and Elizabeth to John de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, he now matchted Margaret his third Sitter to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which proved a greater affiance to him, than that which he had loft in France.

By this time the Earl of Warwick'spleas began to be so well within him, that he could no longer contain it; and having with much ado drawn to his party his two Brothers, the Archibishop of York, and the Marquefs Montacute, he seeks also to draw in the Kings two Brothers, the Duke of Clarence, and the Duke of Gloucester: but he found Gloucester so referred, that he durst not close with him; the Duke of Clarence he found more open, and to himhe ad- dresseth himself, complaining of the disgrace he had sustained by the King in his employment into France, and other wrongs. To whom the Duke prevalently made answer, in as great complaint of his Brothers unkindnesse to himself; saying, he had married his Wives Brother Anthony to the Heir of the Lord Scalf; and her Son Thomas to the Heir of the Lord Bawtle: but could finde no match of preferment for him being his own Brother. And upon this agreement in complaints they agree to join against King Edward; and to make the knot the firmer, the Duke of Clarence takes to Wife Isabel the Earl of Warwick's Daughter; and withir hale affured into himhalf of the Lands the Earl held in right of his Wife, the Lady Alice, Daughter of Richard Beaumont, Earl of Warwick deceased. Upon this marriage the Earl of Warwick discovered to him what heither he had concealed, concerning his project for the restoring of King Henry; to which Clarence gave approbation, with promife to affit him in it to his uttermost.

At this time Sir Thomas Cock, late Mayor of London, was, by one Hawkins apprehended for Treson, for which he was sent to the Tower, and his place in London feized by the Lord Rivers. The case was this, the said Hawkins came to Sir Thomas, requesteing him to lead a thousand Marks upon good faire, who answered, he would first know for whom it should be, and for what intent; and understanding it should be for the use of Queen Margaret, he refused to lend a penny. The matter reitd two or three years, till the Earl of Hawkes was laid in the Tower, and brought to the Bench, called The Duke of Exeters Daughter; by means of which pain, he confessed amongst other things the motion he had made to Sir Thomas, and accused himself so far, that he was put to death. Sir Thomas Cock lying in the Tower from Whit所提供之 till Michaelmas, had his place in Essex named Gyddilke spoiled, his Deer in his Park destroyed; and though arraigned upon life and death, he were acquitted of the Indictment: yet could not be deliuered till he had paid eight thousand pounds to the King, and eight hundred to the Queen.

And now the Earl of Warwick fendeath to his Brothers the Archibishop and the Marquefs, to prepare all things ready to set on foot the intended revolt from King Edward, and to procure some rebellion commotion in the North, whilst he and his new Son in Law would provide to go forward with the work; which they accordingly did in Yorkshire, an occasion being taken taken for the breach of an ancient custom there, to give to the poor people of St. Leonards in the City of York, certain quantities of Corn and Grain. This Commotion the Archibishop and the Marquefs underhand fomented; yet to-colour the matter, the Marquefs opposed the Rebels, and cut off the head of Robert Haldorn their Captain: but his head being cut off, the Rebels got them other Captains; Henry, Son and Heir to the Lord Fitzwee, and Sir Henry Neville, Son to the Lord Latimer; the one the Nephew, the other a Cousin-german to the Earl of Northampton, Lords, who had been their valuable Captain Sir John Cotyrew. These when they could not enter York came marching towards London, all the way exclaming against King Edward, as an unjust Prince, and an Utoper. King Edward hearing of this Commotion, sends Sir VWilliam Herbert, whom of a mean Gentleman, two years before he had made Earl of Pembroke, and his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, together with the Lord Stafford of Southwick, to suppress the Rebels; and they with an Army of seven hundred, most Welchmen, march towards them: but the Lord Stafford being put from his Inne where he used to lodge, by the Earl of Pembroke, took such a dilatate at it, that he withdrew his Archers, and gave over the business. Yet the Earl of Pembroke though thus forfaken, with his own Regiment encountered the Rebels, slew Sir Henry Neville, and divers others; and when being upon the point of Victory, one John Clupam a ferviant to the Earl of Warwick, coming in with five hundred rationally fellows, and crying aloud a Warwick, a VWarwick, the Welchmen supposing the Earl had been come, turned presently their backs and fled: five thoufand of them were slain, the Earl of Pembroke himself, and his much lamented Brother, Sir Richard Herbert, a most goodly performer, were taken prisoners, brought to Benbery, where both of them, with ten other Gentlemen, were put to Death. And now the Northamptonshire men joyning with the Rebels in this fray, made them a Captain named Robert Haldarn, but they named him Robin of Riddlesdale; and suddenly came to Grafen, where they took the Earl Rivers Father to the Queen, and his Son Sir John Woodville, brought them to Northampton, and there without Judgement beheaded them. King Edward advertised of these mischances, wrote to the Sheriffs of Somersethire and Devonshire to apprehend the Lord Pembroke of Southwick (who had foolishly forfaken the Earl of Pembroke) and if they could take him, to put him to Death; who being soon after found in a Village within Bremmarsh was brought to Bridgewater, and there beheaded. After this Battle fought at Hedgecote, commonly called Banbury field, the Northern men returned to Warwick, where the Earl with great joy received them; and hearing that King Edward with a great Army was coming thither, he sent for his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, with all speed to repair unto him: who joyning together, and using means cunningly; by having some communication of Peace, to make the King secure; and to take little heed of himself, they took advantage of his security; and in the dead of the night set on his Camp, and killing the watch before the King was aware, at a place called Woodhay, four miles from Berwick, they took him prisoner in his bed, and presently conveyed him to Middletham Castle in Yorkshire, to be there in safe custody with the Archibishop of York. And now they had the prey in their hand, if they had as well looked to keep it, as they had done to get it: But King Edward whether bribing his Keepers, or otherwife winning them by fair promises, got too much liberty; sometimes for his recreation to go a hunting, by which he caused Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Berwly, and others of his Friends, at a certain time to meet him, who took him from his Keepers, and set him again at liberty: whilst the Earl of Warwick nothing doubting his Brother's the Archibishop's care in safe keeping him, and thinking the brunt of the Wars to be now past, dismissed his Army, and intended only to finde out King Henry, who was kept a prisoner, but few men knew where.

King Edward being now at liberty posteth to York, and from thence to Lancashire; where his Chamberlain the Lord Hastings had raised some Forces; with which he marcheth to London, and is there joyfully received. The Earl of Warwick likewise fendeth to his Friends, and makes preparation for a new Army; whilst in the mean time, by the mediation of divers Lords an interview in Westminster-Hall, is agreed upon, and lefom. Oath taken on both sides for safety, between King Edward, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick; but each party standing strictly upon terms tending to their own ends, they parted as great Enemies as they met: and so from thence the King went to Canterbury, the Duke and the Earl to Lincoln; whether they had pre-appointed their Forces to repair, under the conduct of Sir Robert Wellis, Son and Heir of the Lord Wellis, a man of great valour and experience in the Wars. King Edward to take off so able a man from the Ears part, sends for his Father the Lord Wellis to come unto him; who taking with him his Son in Law Thomas Dymick, and coming to attend the Kings pleasure, was told by his Friends how wonderfully the King was incensed against them: whereupon for their safety, they take Sanctuary at Westminster. But upon the Kings Princely word they came into him, who commanded the Lord Wellis to write to his Son, to dehfe from adhering to the Earl of Warwick, Lord Wellis of Southwick (who had according did; but Sir Robert Wellis notwithstanding his Father's Letters, continuing firm to the Earl still, so much incensed King Edward, that he cauf'd both his Father and Sir Thomas Dymick, to be beheaded. He supposed perhaps, that the Lord Wellis was himself underhand a Friend to the Earl, and had not dealt sincerely with him, in procuring his Son to leave that party. But now Sir Robert Wellis seeing the King draw near to Stamford, where he had pitched his Tent, and hearing of his Fathers beheading, was much disfretted what to do: to decline Battel with the King, he thought would fow too much fear; and to give him Battel before the Earl of Warwick were come with his Forces, would fow too much boldnef. But his Vifs fere filled with with a desire of revenging his Father's death, that he thought he could never shew boldness enough; and therupon encountering with the Kings Army, far greater than his own, opprest with multitude was taken prisoner together Thomas de Land, and divers others: who presently in the same place, were put to execution. As soon as Sir Robert Wells was taken, the Lincolnshire men to make themselves the lighter to run away, threw off their Coats; for which cause, this Battel was afterward called Left-coat field: In which, it is reported, were slain above ten thousand men.

The Earl of Warwick hearing of this defeat, and not having present means to raise an Army sufficient to oppose King Edward; when he could by no means draw the Lord Stanley to his party, he determined to fall into France, and hiring Ships at Dartmouth in Devonshire, he with his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, and their Wives took to Sea; and thinking to land at Calais, of which Town he himself was Captain, he was by the Lord Vaucler a Gascoigne, whom he had left his Deputy there, repelled; and with so great inhumanity, that the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was there on labour, was fain to be delivered in the Ship, (all the courtiers in that dirtifhes shewed was only to send a flagon or two of wine) which fact of Vaucler, when King Edward heard of, he was so well pleased with it, that he presently sent him a Patent to be Captain of the Town, himself; and the Duke of Burgogny, for the same service, sent unto him Philip de Comines (who hath written the History of these times) with a grant of one thousand Crowns pension during his life. Never man was better paid for one act of diffembling; for the truth was, Prie enere excluits foras, it was out of his love that he suffered him not to enter the Town: for he knew there were many great ones in it so addicted to King Edward, and so maliciously bent against the Earl, that if he or any of his company should have come, they would in all likelihood have done them some mischief. And hereof he made a good proof for: For when the Earl took to Sea again, the Lord Vaucler sent sent him word, he should take heed where he landed, for that the Duke of Burgogny lay in wait to take him: which advertisement did the Earl more good, than the keeping him out of Calais did him hurt. The Earl upon this advertisement landed at Dieppe in Normandy, whereof when King Lewis heard, he sent and invited him to come to his Court at Ambois; where he received him with no less honour than if he had been a King: In the mean time, King Edward made enquiry for all such as were aids to the Earl of Warwick; of whom some were apprehended as guilty, some fled to Sanctuary, and some submitted to the Kings mercy; as John Marques Monteaus, whom he courteously received. Queen Margaret; who at this time forfeited with Duke Roynor her Father, hearing of the Earl of warwick's arrival, with her Son Prince Edward, came to Ambois; and with her also came Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, lately escaped out of Prison, and fled into France: between whom a new combination is made, and for a foundation of firmamity, King Henry's Son Prince Edward, marries Anne the Earl of Warwick's second Daughter: After which marriage the Duke of Clarence and the Earl took a solemn Oath, never to leave the War till either King Henry or his Son Prince Edward were restored to the Crown. But now about this time, comes a Gentlewoman out of England, to the diffembling Lord Vaucler at Calais, and pays him in his own coin; For she made a figure of intending great good to the Earl of Warwick, but had a purpose indeed to work his ruine: and by this shee the passed unobserved to the Duke of Clarence, whom she persuaded to forsake the Earl of Warwick, as one that intended wholly the robbing out of the Houfe of Turck, and only the advancing of the Houte of Lancaster; which he might well perceive by his marrying his second Daughter to Prince Edward, King Henry's only Son; and this reason with some other was so urgent, that the Gentlewoman, that it fank deep into the Duke of Clarence his minde. So fit Agents of State are women, sometimes, that can transact a business in covert; which if men should attempt, they would soon be discovered. And from this time forward the Duke of Clarence, as if the Gentlewoman had taught him the art of diffembling, fought secretly to reconcile himself to his Brother King Edward; but made a fair shew till to the Earl of Warwick.

And now the Earl of Warwick having been six months in France, in this time he had procured from the King of France, both Ships, and Men, and Money; and receiving Letters out of England, that many Lords and others were ready to adventure their lives in this quarrel, if he would come (for the people generally held him in such admiration, that they thought the Sun was taken from the world, when he was absent) And this in great part for his great Hospitality, who it is said, used to spend (at a Breakfast) to the Ears of Oxford and Pembroke took to Sea: and though the Duke of Burgogny had a Fleet at Sea to intercempt him, yet his Fleet being tempest scattered; and King Edward desiring to equal that Fleet, having provided no other, the Earl had a quiet passage to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire; where being landed, he made Proclamation in King Henry the sixth's name, that all good Subjects should prepare to fight against King Edward, who contrary to the right had usurped the Crown. Upon which Proclamation, it is scarce to be believed, how many thousands of men referred to him; with which Forces he made towards London: Upon notice of whose approach, on Sunday next after Mischaelmas day, one Doctor Godward a Chaplain of his, preaching at Pauls-Crofts, did so far fort his Ears pions Intention, that many of his Auditor were moved to favoure the Earls proceedings, so much, that the Marquefs Mountague, who had in King Edward's behalf levied six thousand men about London, found them all inclinable to go with him to the Earl of Warwick, and accordingly went and joyned with him. King Edward hearing of the great flocking of people to the Earl, sent forth Letters into all parts of the Realm for raising an Army; but few came, and those few with no great great good will: which when he perceived, he began to doubt his case; and thereupon accompanied with the Duke of Gloucester his Brother, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain, (who having married the Earl of Warwick's Sister, yet continued ever true to King Edward) and the Lord Scrope Brother to the Queen; he departed into Lincolnshire, and coming to Lynn, he found there an English Ship, and two Hulks of Holland ready to make fail: whereupon he, with the fore-named Lords, and about seven or eight hundred persons entered the Ships, having no provision with him but only the apparel they wore: and so bare of money, that he was main to reward the Mater of his Ship with one of his Garters: and thus making course towards the Duke of Burgoyne Country, they were presently chaled by eight great Ships of Eafterlings, open Enemies both to England and France; which drove him before a Town in the Country called Algenware, belonging to the Duke of Burgoyne; where by chance the Lord Governor, Governor of that Country, at that time was, who defended them from the Eafterlings, and brought them to the Hague in Holland, where they had all things minished to them, by order from the Duke of Burgoyne.

At this time, upon news of the Earl of Warwick's approach, Queen Elizabeth forsook the Tower, and secretly took sanctuary at Windsor; where in great penury forsoak of all her friends, she was brought to bed of a Son called Edward, who like a poor mans child was christened: the Godfathers being the Arch and Prior of Windsor, and the Lady Sarah Godmother.

And now the Earl of Warwick entring the Tower, removes King Henry out of his hold of durance, where he had been almost nine years, into his own Lodging, where he was served according to his Estate; which the Earl did more congratulase than the King himself. Upon the sixth day of October, King Henry accompanied with the Archbisp of York, the Prior of St. John, the Bishop of London, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and other Noblemen, apperellae in a long Gown of blue Velvet, was conducted through London, to the Bishops Palace, where he reitd till the thirteenth of that month; on which day he went on in solemn Procession about Paul's Church, wearing his Imperial Crown; the Earl of Warwick bearing up his Train, and the Earl of Oxford the Sword before him. The next day in all usual places about London, King Edward was proclaimed an Ufortier, and all his partrakers Traitors to God and the King; whereof John Lord Tiptoft Earl of Warwick, as a partraker with King Edward, was made the first example. This Lord had been Lieutenant for King Edward in Ireland, where having done something for which he fled, he was afterward found on thop of a high tree, in the Forrest of Waybridge, in the County of Huntling: and being there taken, was brought to London, attainted, and beheaded on the Tower-Hill, and after burned at the Black-Friers.

About this time happened an accident not unworthy to be related: Sir William Harkford Knight, one of the chief Justices at the Law, who dwelt at Anmary in Devonshire, a man of great poftitions; and having no Son, the Lord Fitzwarren, Sir John Stalectre, and Sir William Bellion, married his Daughters, and were his Heirs: This man grew into such degree of Melancholy, that one day he called to him the Keeper of his Park, charging him with negligence in suffering his Deer to be stolen: and thereupon commanded him, that if he met any man in his Circuit in the night time, that would not stand or speak, he should not spare to kill him whosoever he were. The Knight having thus laid his foundation, and meaning to end his doletful dayes, in a certain dark night fecretly conveyed himself out of his houfe, and walked alone in his Park. The Keeper in his night-walk hearing one ftringing, and coming towards him, asked, who was there? but no anwer being made, he willed him to stand; which when he would not do, the Keeper shot, and killed him, and coming to see who it was, found him to be his Mater.

On the twentieth day of November a Parliament is held at Windsor, wherein King Edward and all his partrakers are attainted of high Treason, and all their Lands and Goods forfeited to, King Henry's use. George Plantagenet, Duke of Clarence is by Authority of this Parliament, adjourned Heir to Richard Duke of York his Father, and that Dutchy settled upon him and his Heirs, notwithstanding the Prima geniture of Edward: Upon him also was entailed the Crown of England, in cafe Heirs male of the Body of King Henry failed. Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, are fully restored to their Lands and Honour; and Warwick and Clarence are made Governors of the King and Kingdom. To this Parliament came the Marquse Montague, exculing himself, that for fear of death he had taken King Edward's part; which excule was accepted. Queen Margaret is sent into France; but by reason of contrary winds was keepd back all that Winter.

About this time Jasper Earl of Pembroke going into Wales to view his Land in Pembrokeshire, found there the Lord Henry, born of Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir of John the first Duke of Somerset, not being then full ten years of age, kept in manner like a Captive, but honourably brought up by the Lady Herbert. Him he brings with him to London, and presents him to King Henry; whom when the King had a good while beheld, he said to the Lords about him: Lord Herbert, this is no other than our Adversaries, leaving the poftition of all things, shall hereafter give place. Which if it be true, it shews a very Prophetical Spirit to have been in King Henry; that could so long before foretell a thing so unlikely to happen; for this was he that was afterward King Henry the Seventh, before whom at that time there were many lives in being, of both the Houses of York and Lancaster.

Shortly after this, by the Duke of Burgoyne means, King Edward is furnished with eighteen tall Ships, two thousand Dutchmen; and fifty thousand Florens of Gold; and thus furnished, he took to Sea, and landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, where he found but cold entertainment; nevertheless he made a wary march to Tork, where likewise he found no great expression of welcome; so as he was forced to change his pretence, fleeing deeply and receiving the Sacrament upon it, that he came not to disturb King Henry, but only to recover his own Inheritance; and for the more show thereof, warranting Prince Edward’s Living; which proposition seemed so reasonable, that many, who refited him before, were as ready to assist him now: And if he be blamed for breaking his Oath, it must be considered, it was Regni causa, to recover his Kingdom, which perhaps was the Inheritance he meant, when he took his Oath, that he intended nothing but to recover his Inheritance: and so he brake not his Oath neither. From Tork he marched towards Wakefield and Sandal, leaving the Castle of Pontefract upon his left hand, where the Marquefs Montacute with his Army lay, but did not offer to stop him: from Wakefield he came to Doncaster, and from hence to Nottingham, where there came to him Sir William Parr, and Sir James Harrington with fix hundred men; also Sir Thomas Burgh, and Thomas Montagney, with their aids, who cau’d him to make a Proclamation in his own name; affirming they would serve no man but a King. From this time he was followed by three thousand able men, and well armed came unto him: From Leicester he came before the Walls of Coventry, into which City the Earl of Warwick had withdrawn himself, keeping himself close therein with his people, being about six or seven thousand men: three days together King Edward provoked him to come forth to Battel; but he stay’d for more Forces, and would not do it: whereupon King Edward marched forward to Warwick, eight miles from Coventry, thinking thither at least he should have drawn the Earl of Warwick; but neither would that do it: Indeed the Earl looked for the coming of the Duke of Clarence, with twelve thousand men to join with him; but that expectation proved vain. For the Duke was now fully reconcil’d to his Brother King Edward, and brought all his Forces to join with him, only he fought to make a fray between him and King Edward and the Earl: But though King Edward offered general pardon, and other fair conditions; yet none would please the Earl without restoring of King Henry. But now to repair the defection of the Duke of Clarence, there came to the Earl of Warwick at Coventry, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Exeter, and the Marquefs Montacute; by whose coming that side was not a little strengthened; yet all this aid would not make the Earl of Warwick to come to Battel: whereupon King Edward marched forward towards London, both sides feek to make London their friend, the Earl of Warwick tends to his Brother the Archbishop of York, to labour in it; who thereupon cau’d King Henry to mount on Horseback, and to ride from Pauls through Cheap, down Waller, supposing that this flying of the King would have allure the Citizen to affist him; but this device prevailed not, but eight thousand men, a small proportion to withstand King Edward: and when the Archbishop of York faw this backwarknels in the Citizens, or rather indeed as inclination to King Edward, he secretly sent to him to receive him into grace; which, upon promise to continue faithful hereafter, he obtained. The eleventh of April, in the year 1471, and the eleventh of his reign, King Edward made his entry into the City of London, riding first to Pauls Church, and from thence to the Bishops Palace, where the Archbishop of York presented himself unto him, and having King Henry by the hand delivered him to King Edward (six months after his re-adoption of the Crown) and then King Edward being seif’d of his person, went from Pauls to Witt-minsters, and there gave God most hearty thanks for his safe return. The reasons alledged here by Philip Commyns for the Citizens receiving of King Edward, feem scarce worthy of so good an Author: One cause (faith he) was because King Edward being extremly indebted in the City, if they had not received him, they should have lost their debt; Another, because he had won the love of many Citizens Wives who im-portuned their Husbands to receive him.

The Earl of Warwick, having Intelligence that King Edward was received into London, and King Henry delivered into his hand, marched out, and encamp’d at St. Albans, and after from thence to the front of Barnet, and the two Armies met. The Earl of Warwick comes with his Army to Battel.

The two Armies meet.
the Earl of Warwick had won the field; and he had perhaps done indeed, but for a strange misfortune which happened to the Earl of Oxford, and his men; for they having a Star with streams on their Liveries, as King Edward's men had the Star of Warwick's men, by reason of the Mift, nor well discerning the badges so like, shot at the Earl of Oxford's men that were on their part; whereupon the Earl of Oxford cried Treason, and fled with eight hundred men. At length after great slaughter made on both sides, King Edward (having the greater number of men, as some write, though others say the contrary) caused a new power of fresh men (which he had kept hid) to come on; which the Earl of Warwick observing being a man of an invincible courage, nothing dismayed, rushed into the midst of his Enemies, where he advanc'd so far, that amongst the press he was stricken down and slain. (Though, some write, that the Earl seeing the desperate estate of his Army, leapt on a Horse to fly; and coming to a Wood where was no passage, one of King Edward men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked skin.) The Marques Montacute, then, the Earl of Warwick's brother, lost his Life, and left the Victory to King Edward. On both sides were slain, as Full faith, ten thousand at the least: Edward's faith but fifteen hundred, but then he means only of the Kings side. Upon the Kings part were slain the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Say, the Lord Montjoye Son and Heir, Sir Humphrey Bagcher Son and Heir to the Lord Berners, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. On the Earls part, were slain the Earl himself, the Marques Montacute, and three and twenty Knights, of whom Sir William Tyrell was one, the Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Oxford fled into Wales, to Jasper Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Exeter being stricken down, and so wounded, that he was left for dead, amongst other the dead bodies, because he was not known; but coming to himself, he got up, and escaped to Newport, and thence to Pembroke, where he was safe. The bodies of the Earl and Marques were brought to London in a Coffin, and by the space of three days lay open faced in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; and then buried with their Ancestors in the Priory of Bifham. This Earl of Warwick was Richard Neville, Son and Heir of Richard Neville Earl of Salisbury, who married the Daughter of Richard Beauchamp, the fifth Earl of Warwick, and in her right was Earl of Warwick, in his own, of Salisbury. He was also Lord Montague, great Chamberlain, and great Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the North Marches towards Scotland, and great Steward of the Duchy of Lancaster: He had iffive Daughters; Isabel married to George Duke of Clarence, and Anne, first married to Prince Edward, King Henry the Sixth's Son, and after to Richard Duke of Gloucester.

We may here observe a constellation of different influences, concurring all to the overthrow of this great Warwick; whereas if any one had been missing, the wheel of his Fortune had not perhaps turned; for if the City of York had not too credulously believed King Edward's Oath, not to disturb King Henry; or if the Marques Montacute had stopped (as he might) his passage at Pomfret; or if the Duke of Clarence had not at the very point of the Battle, at St. Albans, deferred his party and joined with King Edward; or if Queen Margaret had not by King Henry been kept from coming into England in time; or if the Rounders had not been reconstituted; and deceived his expectation, he had never perhaps been overthrown as he was: But Fate's incomprehensible, destiny will finde ways that were never thought of, will make way, where it finds none; and that which is ordained in heaven, shall be effected by means, of which Earth can take no notice.

Queen Margaret, when it was too late, accompanied with John Longfrater, Prior of St. John's, and the Lord Wenlock, with divers Knights and Equestries, took flighting at Harfton, the four and twentieth of March, but by rempelt was kept back till the thirteenth of April; and then with her Son Prince Edward, she landed at Weymouth, and from thence went to an Abbey hard by, called Cerne, and then to Bemly in Hampshire, whither there came unto her, Edmund Duke of Somerset, and Thomas Earl of Devon, kept with divers others, among whom it is resolved once more to try their fortune in the Field. But then the Queen would have had her Son Prince Edward to be sent into France, there to remain in safety, till the next Barrel were tried; but they being of a contrary minde, and especially the Duke of Somerset, she at length conferred, though afterward she repented it. From Bemly she with her Son and the Earl of Somerset palteff on to Briflow, intending with what power they could raise in Gloucefher, to march into Wales, to join with Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who was there making preparation of more Forces, King Edward hearing of these things, resolves to cross this conjunction, and follows Queen Margaret with a great power to close, that near Tenbury in Gloucefher he overtakes her Forces, who resolutely turn and make head against him; and the battle was fought on the Queens part, leading the Vant-guard, performed the part of a valiant Commander; but finding his Soldiery through wearinesse begin to faint, and that the Lord Wenlock, who had the conduct of the Battle on the Queens part, moved not, he rode into him, and upbraiding him with cowardise or treachery, never said, but with a Poleax beat out his brains: And now before he could bring in his men to the rescue, their Vaward was routed, and John Earl of Devonshire, with above three thousand of the Queens part were slain. The Queen her self, John Beaumont the Duke of Somerset's Brother, the Prior of Saint John's, Sir Fereis Cifson, and divers others were taken prisoners; all which except the Queen, were the next day beheaded. At which time Sir Richard Crofts preferreted to King Edward King Henry the Sixths Son, and after to Richard Duke of Gloucester.

(as some say) struck him with his Gantlet, and then presently George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Grey, Marques Dorset, and William Lord Hastings standing by, fell upon him in the place, and murdered him. His body was homely interred with other ordinary Corps, in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-Friers in Westminster. After the victory thus obtained, King Edward repaired to the Abbey Church of Westminster, to give God thanks for his good success; and finding there a great number of his enemies that were fled thither to savethemselves, he gave them all free pardon; only Edward Duke of Somerset, John Langstaff Prior of Saint John, Sir Thomas Ts fitness, Sir John Cifton, and divers other Knights and Esquires, who were apprehended there, and brought before the Duke of Gloucester, sitiing that day as Constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk as Marshal, were all arraigned, condemned, and judged to die; and accordingly upon the Tuesday, being the seventh of May, they were all, and twelve other Knights more, on a Scaffold set up in the middle of the Town, beheaded, but not defeminated, and permitted to be buried. The same day Queen Margarret was found in a poor house of Religion, not far from thence, into which she was fled for safeguard of her life; but she was after brought to London, and there kept a prisoner, till her Father ransomed her with great sums of money. This was the last pitch Battel that was fought in England, in King Edward the fourth's days; which happened on the fourth of May, being Saturday, in the eleventh year of his Reign, and in the year of our Lord 1471.

King Edward being afflicted that as long as any partaker of King Henry lived and were at liberty, he should never be free from plots against his life, sent Roger Vaughan, a Gentleman much reckoned of in his own Country, to entrap Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who had escaped from the last encounter; but he having notice of the plot before, prevented it by striking off Vaughan's head.

After thefe Great Clouds were thus dispers'd, there arose a little Cloud, which gave the Realm, at least the City of London, no small disquiet. For now, Thomas Battard Faconbridge, who had been employed by the Earl of Warwick to cow the Seas, hearing of these debates; having inniched himself by Piracy, gathered together an Army of seventeen thousand men; and coming to London, imperiously commanded admission into the City, and re-leafament of King Henry out of prison: but being denied entrance, and hearing that King Edward, with great power, was coming towards him, he brings up his Shipping to Saint Katherine's, and taking with him his most desperate men, with them he marched to Kingstonbridge; but finding that Bridge broken down; and all the places of passage guarded, he withdrew his Forces into Saint George's field, from whence he prepared to assault the City of London: for the effecting whereof he landed all his Ship Ordnance, and planted them all along the Banks side, with which he bartered down many houses, and much annoyed the City; but the Citi-zens on the other side lodged their great Artillery against their Adversaries, with which they so galled them, that they durst not abide in any place along the water side, but were driven even from their own Ordnance. Then he appointed his men to set fire on the Bridge, and withal caused three thousand to pass over the Thames, and some of them to assault Aldgate, and some Bishopsgate; but they were in all places by the industry of the Citizens repelled, and chiefly by Robert Baffet, and Ralph Jocelyne Aldermen. Upon this he retired to Blackbeath, and there encamped by the space of three days, but then hearing that King Edward was coming with a great Army, he got him to his Ship, but the reit fled, some one way, some another. The one and twentieth of May, the King coming to London, the citizens for their pains and care, and dubbed the Mayors, the Recorder Ursewick, and Baffet and Jocelyne Aldermen, Knights.

And now the time was come for King Henry to be delivered out of all his troubles; for the bloody Duke of Gloucester entering the Tower, where he found King Henry nothing at all troubled with all his Groffes, struck him into the heart with his Dagger, and there flew him. And now we have had within the space of half a year, one Parliament proclaiming King Edward an Ulfurper, and King Henry a lawful King; and another proclaiming King Edward a lawful King, and King Henry an Ulfurper: That we may know in humane affairs, there is nothing certain, but uncertainty; nothing flable, but inhabitability.

King Edward, presently after the interment of King Henry, draws his Forces towards Sandwich in Kent, where some of the followers of Faconbridge, to the number of eight or nine hundred, had in the Castle there, strongly fortified themselves; but upon their asking pardon, and submitting themselves to the King, with promise to be faithful Subjects ever after, they had their pardon granted them, and then they delivered up both Castle and Ships, to the number of thirteen, to the King's use. But how this Composition was observed, may be imagined; when Faconbridge, who was comprised in the same pardon, was afterward taken and executed at Southwampen; Spicing, and Quatning the Captains that assailed Aldgate and Bishopsgate, and were in Sandwich Castle at the surrender thereof, were profecely beheaded at Canterbury; and their heads placed on Poles, upon those Gates. And by a Commision of Oyer and Terminery, many both in Effex and Kent, were arraigned and condemned for this Rebellion, and more fined.

And now King Edward Eight, is to be secured from all suspected persons, sent there by his own Bishop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, over to Guiamourshe to be kept in safe custody; and there he remained a long time, till at length by friendship he was delivered, and shortly after died. Likewise John Earl of Oxford, who after Barnet Field yielded himself to King Edward, had his life pardoned; but yet was sent over Sea to the Castle of Hammes, where for the space of twelve years he was shut up in a strong Prison, and narrowly looked to; whose Lady all that time was not sufferd to come un-

* The French King read, and thereupon withdrawing himself, caused the Herold to be brought to his presence, to whom in private he gave this answer: That the Duke of Bourgaigne, and the Earl of Saint Paul the Contable, (by whose intercession he knew the King of England was drawn to this design) would but delude him, for that they were Diffemblers and Impostors; and therefore said, it would conduc more to the honour of the King of England to continue in the League with him, through an old Adversary, than to hazard the forces of France, on the promised alliance of new-comers. Receivers: And to commend me (sai he,) to the King thy Matter, and say what I have told thee; and then with an honourable reward of three hundred Crowns, dismiss him. The Herold promised to do all that in his lay, and (beyond his Commision) showed the French King ways, (by working upon the Lords Howard and Stanley) by which he might enter into a Treaty for Peace, which he doubted not would fort to a good conclusion. The French King glad to hear it, gave the Herold, besides the other reward, a piece of Crimson Velvet of thirty yards long; and withal sent to King Edward the good willer Hope he had in his Stable, as also an AS, a Wolf, and a Wilde Boar, beasts at that time rare in England: And then the Herold returning to Callice, delivered to King Edward the French King's answer.

And now to make good the French King's allegation to the Herold, the Duke of Bourgaigne who had promised in the word of a Prince, to bring to Callice by this time two thousand Launces, and four thousand Souldiers or light-Horfe, failed to come: Whereupon the Lord Sealer is by King Edward sent to the Duke, to put him in mind of his promise, and to hasten his coming with his promised Forces: But the journey was to little purpose, only it occasioned the Duke with a small troop of Horfe to come to the King, formally to excuse himself for having been so backward; but the cause (he said) was, for that he had being inbred in the siege of Nuns, he could not depart thence, without infinite disgrace, if neither composition nor submission were enforced; which now notwithstanding, because he had not yet sent to it at his return, he was enforced to do, by the necessity of the beleaguered; but promised to supply all defects, both with his presence and power, and that speedily.

ments of courtiers reciprocally paid: which finall'd them with their Noblemen there present, take all their Oaths upon the Holy Evangelists, in all their power, to observe the Articles of Accord agreed on. After which, in private, the French King importunes King Edward that the Duke of Britain might be left out of these Articles: but after much urging to that purpose, King Edward gave this refolute answer, that if King Lewis desired the friendship of England, he should not molest the Duke of Britain; for that he was resolved, at any time to come in person to relieve him, if he were disturbed: King Edward pretended the many kindnefses he had formerly received of the Duke of Britain; but it was conceived, that the defire of compafing the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke, now in the Duke of Britain's Country, were the great motives of his flanding so firmly for him. After more fervious discourse, King Lewis told King Edward, that he would never see him at Paris; therefore he must come to court his French Ladies there: and if he committed any sin, he merrily told him, that Cardinal Wolsey should be his Confessor, who (he might be sure) would affign him an easy penance; as one that loved to kifs fair Ladies himself; but when King Edward seemed not unwilling to accept his offer, he was then glad to put it off with other discourse: for that (as he told Commons) too many English Princes had been there before.

The money to be paid to King Edward by the Articles, is accordingly paid; and thereupon the French hostages are delivered, and the English Army retires to Collev, and from thence is transported into England; and then the English hostages are likewise delivered. This Peace was made to be made only by the Holy Ghost; because on the day of meeting, a white Dove came and sat upon the King of England's Tent: though the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham thought it was made by no good spirit.

King Edward being returned into England, had his minde running still upon the danger that might grow from the Earl of Richmond: he therefore dispatched Doctor Stillington, and two other his Ambassadors, to the Duke of Britain, to send him over to him, under this subtile pretence, that he meant to match him in marriage with the Lady Cicely his youngest Daughter; and withal, sent also no small store of Angels to speak for him; which so prevailed with the Duke, that he delivered the Earl of Richmond to the Ambassadors, who conducted him thence to Saint Odelas; where whileft they stayed for a wind, the young Earl by the cunning plotting of Peter Landais, the Duke's Treasurer, (more out of scorn that he was not gratified by the English Ambassador, to the proportion of his place, than any love to the Earl) escapes into the Sanctuary: from whence, neither prayers nor promises could get him out: Nevertheless up put Peter Landais his promise he should be safely kept there, the Ambassadors departed, and returned home, acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Britain's courtie in delivering him, and their own negligence in suffering him to escape; only making amend with the promife of Peter Landais: which might be to King Edward some contentment, but was no satisfaction.

At Christmas following, being the sixteenth year of his Reign, he created his eldest Son Edward, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chefefer. His second Son he made Duke of York; giving the Order of Knights-hood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He created also four and twenty Knights of the Bath, whereof Brian Chief Justice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common Pleas were two.

About this time, there were two examples of severity feen; not unworthy the relating, but only to make us see how dangerous a thing it is to Ludee cum satia, to speak words that may be taken as reflecting upon the King. The first was of Walter Walker, a wealthy Citizen, dwelling at the Crown in Cheefeife: This man one day when his Child cryed, bid him be quiet; and next day he made him Heir of the Crown: which words being sooner or later, as persperation, he was called in question about them, arraigned, condemned, and put to death. The other was Thomas Burdes of a Borough in Warkshire Esquire: It happened that King Edward hunted in his Park, he being from home, and there killed a white Buck, whereas Master Burdes made special account: so as coming home, and finding that Buck killed, he wished it horns and all in his belly that had confounded the King to kill it: and because none confounded the King to kill it but himself, it was thought these words were not spoken without a malignant reflecting upon the King; and thereupon Burdes was arraigned and condemned, drawn to Tyburn, and there beheaded: though Markham, then Chief Justice, chose rather to lose his place, then affent to the Judgement.

And now he began ambition to toil in Richard Duke of Gloucester: whereof the too much heat fell upon his Brother the Duke of Clarence, how to rid him out of the way: to which end he seeks to raise jealousies in King Edward's head against him, telling him, that some of Clarence his followers were Sorcerers and Necromancers, and had given forth speeches, that one whose name began with G. should disinherit his Children, and get the Crown: and for a colour of this suggestion, one of the Duke of Clarence his Servants, who came with him out of Ireland from Dublin, where the Duke was born, is in his Master's absence, by the procurement underhand of the Duke of Gloucester, indited, arraigned, condemned, and executed at Tyburn for a Conjuror, and all within the space of two days: and the Duke of Gloucester, to make shew that he had no hand in this fellow's death, set on the Duke of Clarence to complain of it to King Edward; and in the mean time finds matter, at least colour of matter, to make him swear he had no hand in his imprisonment, bids him be of good cheer, for it should not be long ere he would see him released: and he kept his word; for not long after, by his procurement, he was drowned in a Butt of Malmsey, (and this was his releasemen) and then laid in his bed, to make the people believe that he was he died of distemps: whole death King Edward, though perhaps confentning to it, so much referred, that afterwards, when he was foid to for any man Pardon, he would fighting break out into fuch words: Obfolute Brother! for whole life not one man would open his mouth. Being dead, he was buried at Trunkbury in Glouceftersire, by the Body of his Darchefs, who great with Childie, died of pofion a little before.

It was now the two and twentieth year of King Edward's Reign, when James King of Scotland sent Ambassadors to treat of a marriage between his oldelT Son James Duke of Rothes, and Cicely King Edward's second Daughter. This overture for a Match, was by the King and his Council readily embraced, and a great part of the Portion was delivered to the Scots with this Proviso, That if the marriage did not proceed, the Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh should be bound to repay it again. But the Scotch King, who had other phantimes in his head, and would take counfel of none but his own will, and diverted alfo perhaps by the King of France; not only dafled the proceeding in the Match, but the whole Nobility that perfuaded him to it; inform'd that his Brother the Duke of Albany was enforced to abandon the Country, and to fly for refuge into England: by whom King Edward being informed of King James his fickle disposition, was fo much incenfed, that under the conduct of the Duke of Glouceftir, accompanied with the Duke of Albany, I fet an Army of twenty thoufand againft Scotland; who in their way took in Berewick, and beleved the Cafile; which being retoluely defended by the Earl Bothwel, the Duke left the Lord Stanly to continue the fiege, while he with the reit of the Army, marched toward Edinburgh; where within the Cafile of Mayden, King James had immur'd himfelf. But the Nobility of Scotland fearing the danger they were in, endeavoured by humble humiliffion to procure Peace, at leaft a ceffion from War, which with much importunity they obtained, upon these conditions: That folicitation should be presently given, for all damages fufained by the late incursions: That the Duke of Albany should be fully retriev'd to grace and place, with an aboliion of all difcontent between his Brother King James and him: That the Cafile of Berewick, (which had been now out of the poftification of the English, one and twenty years) should immediately be ferrendred into the Generals hands, and from thence no redution of that, or the Town attempted: That all fuch sums of money as upon propofition of the marriage had been delivered, should be repaid. All which, except the firft Article, were accordingly performed.

When this confents with Scotland was indifferentiy accommodated; King Edward receives intelligence from his Ambaffadour Leiger in France, that the French King not only denied the payment of the annual Tribute of fifty thoufand Crowns, agreed upon and sworn to, upon the ratification of the late concluded Peace, but had also married the Dauphin of France to the Lady Margaret Daughter of Maximian, Son of the Emperor; which to much incenfed King Edward, that he resolves to revenge it; and by the advice of his Council, open War was prefently Proclaimed againft France. But while King Edward is making prepara-tion, and inveting to the bufines, he is attacked by the hand of death; and upon the ninth of April, in the year 1483, at Westminster ended his mortal life.

Of his Taxations.

In his second year, he fent his Privy Seal through England, to move men to give him a certain fumme of money towards relifting the Scots, which was granted and given liberally: In his feventh year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were refumed all manner of gifts, which the King had given from the firft day he took poftification of the Realm, to that time. In his eighth year, at a Parliament were granted two fifteens and a Demy. In his thirtieth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein a Subsidy was granted; and the year following, toward War to be undertaken in the Marches, a new way of rai- sing money is defired, called a Benevolence, by which great fummes of money were gotten of the Subject: And it is not unworthy the relating, what an old rich Widow at this time did; whom King Edward, amongst others, having called before him, merrily asked, what she would willingly give him towards his great charges? By my troth (quoth fie) for thy lovely countenance, thou shalt have even twenty pounds. The King looking scarce for half that fumme, thanked her, and lovingly kiss'd her; which he wrought with the old Widow, that shef presently swore, she should have twenty pound more; and paid it willingly. Not long before his death he was by ill Counfellors put upon a diftrefiif course for raiing of mo- ney; which was, by fining men for Delinquen- cies against Penal Statutes; by which course no money was gathered; but before it came to full execution, he dying, that also died with him.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

In his fourth year, he newly devis'd the Coin both of Gold and Silver, as at this day it is; the Gold, he named Royals and Nobles, the Silver, Grosses, and half Grosses; the new Great weighing feantly three pence; and the Noble of fix fhillings eight pence, appointed to go for eight fhillings four pence. In his fifth year it was proclaimed in England, that the Beaks or Pykes of Shoes and Boots should not pass two Inches, upon pain of curfing by the Clergy, and forfeiting twenty fhillings to be paid, one Noble to the King, another to the Cordwy- ners of London, and the third to the Chamber of London; and for other Countries and Towns the like order was taken. Before this time, and since the year 1382, the Pykes of Shoes and Boots were of fuch length, that they were fain to be tied up to the knees with Chains of Silver, and Gold, or at leaft with filkien laces. The length of Beaks and Pykes of Shoes limited.
The Reign of King Edward the Fourth.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In this King's time the Jubilee, which was before but every fifteenth year, was, by Pope Sixtus the fourth, brought to be every five and twentieth year. Also, where before this time, the Scottish Bishops had no Metropolitan, but the Bishop of York was Metropolitan and Primate of Scotland: Now in this King's time, Pope Sixtus appointed the Bishop of Saint Andrews to be Metropolitan of Scotland, who had twelve Bishops under his obedience.

Works of Piety done in his time.

This King laid the foundation of the new Chappel at Windsor, and his Queen Elizabeth founded the Queens College in Cambridge, and endowed it with large Poffessions. About his fifteenth year, Dofter Woodlark Provost of Kings College in Cambridge, founded Katherine-hall there. In his seventeenth year, the Wall of the City of London, from Cripplegate to Bishopsgate, was built at the Charges of the Citizens; also Bishopsgate it self was new built by the Merchants Almains of the Steelyard. Also in this year died Sir John Crofby, Knight, the Mayor of London, at the repairing of the Parifh Church of St. Hils in Bishopsgate-street, where he was buried, 300. Marks: to the repairing of the Parifh Church of Howorth in Middlesex, forty pounds: to the repairing of London Wall, an hundred pounds: to the repairing of Rochester Bridge, ten pounds: to the Wardens and Commonalty of the Grocers in London, two large Pots of silver chafed half gill, and other Legacies. About this time also, Richford Rawson, one of the Sheriffs of London, caufed an house to be builded in the Church-yard of St. Mary Hospital without Bishopsgate, where the Mayor and Aldermen use to sit and hear the Sermons in Easter Holy-days. In his nineteenth year, William Taylor Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements: for which the City is bound to pay for ever, at every fifteen granted to the King, for all such as shall dwell in Conderainstreet ward, laid at twelve pence a piece, or under. And about the same time, one Thomas Ham, Sheriff of London, builded, at his costs, the great Conduit in Cheapside. In his third and twentieth year, Edward Shaw Goldsmith, who had been Mayor of London, at his own costs re-edified Cripplegate in London, which Gate in old time had been a prifon.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

In his third year, the Minifter of York, and the Steeple of Chrifts-Church in Norwich were burnt. In his feventeenth year, fo great a Peftilence reigned in England, that it swept away more people in four months, than the Wars had done in fifteen years paff. Also in his nineteenth year was another Peftilence: which beginning in the latter end of September, continued till the beginning of November, twelve-months following; in which space of time innumerable people died.

Of his Wife and Issue.

King Edward had been contracted to Elizabeth Daughter to John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, married after to Sir Thomas Butler, Baron of Sudley: but he married Elizabeth the Widow of Sir John Gray, Daughter of Richard Woodville, by his Wife Jacqueline Duchess of Bedford: She lived his Wife eighteen years and eleven months; by whom he had three Sons and feven Daughters. Edward his eldest Son, born in the Sanctuary at Westminster: Richard his second Son, born at Shrewsbury: George his third Son, born also at Shrewsbury, but died a Child. Elizabeth his eldest Daughter promised in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France; but married afterward to King Henry the Seventh: Cicely his second Daughter promised in marriage to James Duke of Rohifay, Prince of Scotland; but was married afterward to John Vifcount Wells, whom the out-lived, and was again re-married, but by neither Husband had any Issue: She lieth buried at Quarca in the Isle of Wight. Anne his third Daughter was married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal and high Treasurer of England, by whom he had two Sons, both dying without Issue: the lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolk. Bridget his fourth Daughter, born at Elizabht in Kent, became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford in Kent, which King Edward had founded, Mary his fifth Daughter was promised in marriage to the King of Denmark, but died in the Tower of Groenbil, before it could be feomnized: the lieth buried at Windfor. Margaret his sixth Daughter died an Infant: Katherine his seventh Daughter was married to William Courtney Earl of Devonfrire, to whom the bare Lord Henry, who by King Henry the eight was created Marques of Exeter.

Concubines he had many, but three special; and would use to say, that he had three Concubines, who in their several properties excelled: One, the merrieft, another, the yfliet: the third, the holieft Harlot in his Realm; as whom no man could lightly get out of the Church to any place, unlefs it were to his bed: The other two were greater perfons than are fit to be named: but the merrieft was Shrewsbury's Wife: in whom therefore he took special pleasure. This woman was born in London, worshipfully defcended, and well married; but when the King had abused her, anon her Husband (as he was an honest man, and did know his good, not presuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her up to him altogether.

By thefe he had natural Issue, Arthur fornaed Plantaogene (whole mother, as is fuppofed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) created Vifcount Lilby, by King Henry the eight, at Bridoel in London: and Elizabeth, who was married to Sir Thomas Lulmy Knight, to whom the bare Nichard, afterward Lord Lulmy, from whom the late Lord Lulmy did defend.

He was (faith Cornwine) the goodliest personage that ever mine eyes beheld, exceeding the tall of stature, fair of complexion, and of most princely presence: and we may truly say, he was of full age before he came to one and twenty; for being but eighteen years old when his father died, he fixed out his Livery presently: so as he began the race of his fortune just like Angulus Caius, each of them at the fame age succeeding an Anceflour after a violent death; and each of them left to set on a roof, where but only a foundation was laid before. For his conditions, he was of an erecte\n\ncomforte both of body and minde, but something juggling on the fleshes side; and never any man, that did marry for love, did for lit\n\ntle love marriage; for he took as much pleasure in other mens Wives as in his own. He was never more confident, then when he was in dan ger, nor ever more doubtfull then when he was secure. Of the four Cardinal Vertues, Fortitude and Prudence were in him naturally: Temperance and Justice, but to serve his turn. He was Politick even to irreligion; for to compass his ends he would not f*tch to sware what he never meant. Yet he was Religious beyond Policy; for before Battels, he used to make his Prayers to God; after Victories to give him Thanks. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious; and could use fa\nmiliarity, and yet retain Majesty. He was a great Briber; and what he could not get by Force, he would by Rewards; as much as what he could not get by Battery, he would by Mines. He was too credulous of Reports, which made him be in error, sometymes to the hurt of him\nfelf, oftentimes of others. He had made the White Rose to flourish as long as Henry the Fourth made the Red; if he had not made it change colour with too much Blood. He had been fortunate in his Children, if he had not been unfortunat in a Brother; but he was well enough served, that would think a Wolf could ever be a good Shepherd. He had an excellent art in improving his favours; for he could do as much with a small courtefe, as other men with a great benefit: And that which was more, he could make advantage of disadvantages: for he got the love of the Londoners by owing them money; and the good will of the Citizens by lying with their Wives.

Whether it began from his minde, being extremely troubled with the injurious dealing of the King of France; or from his body by intemperance of diet, to which he was much given: He fell into a Sickness (some say a Carachere, some a Feaver) but into a Sick\n\nness whereof he died. In the time of which sickness, and at the very point of death, Sir Thomas More makes him to make a speech to his Lords; which I might think to be the speech of a sick man, if it were not so found; and of a weak man, if it were not so long: But it seems Sir Thomas More delivers rather what was fit for him to say, than what he said, the Contents being only, to exhort his Lords, whom he knew to be at variance, to be in love and concord amongst themselves; for that the welfare of his Children, whom he must now leave to their care, could not otherwise be preserved but by their agreement. And having spoken to this purpose so much as his weaknesse would suffer him, he found himself sleepy; and turning on one side, he fell into his long sleep, the ninth of April, in the year 1483. when he had lived one and forty years, reignd two and twenty years, and was buried at Wind\n\nsor, in the new Chappel, whose foundation himself had laid.

Men of valour in his time were many; but himself the chiefest; the rest may be observed in reading his story. For men of Letters, we may have leave at this time to speak of some strangers, having been men of extra\n ordinary fame; as Johannes de Monte Regio, Petrarchus and Blanchinus, all great Altrono\nmers; Ludovicus Pontanus, Paulus Caffrinus, and Antoninus Rosellanus, all great Lawyers; Servo\n nians, Savanarola, and Barzizius, all great Physicions; Baffurion and Caffinus, both great Cardinals; Argropole, Philalethus, Datus, Leonards, Aristims, and Poggius, all great men in humane Literature. And of our Country\nmens, John Harding an Equefr, born in the North parts, who wrote a Chronicle in English Verfe; and, among other special points therein touched, hath gathered all the Submissions and Homages made by the Scottish Kings, even from the dayes of King Alexander; whereby it may evidently appear, how the Scottish Kingdom, even in manner, from the first establishing thereof here in Britain, hath been appertaining unto the Kings of England, and holden of them as their chief and superior Lords. Julian Bemer, a Gentleman of excellent gifts, who wrote certain Treatises of Hawking and Hunting; also a Book of the Laws of Arms, and knowledge appertaining to Heraldes. John Fortescue a Judge, and Chancellour of England, who wrote divers Treatises concerning the Law and Politick Government: Rochus, a Charter\n house Monk, born in London, who wrote divers Epigrams. Walter Hunt, a Carmelit Fryer, who for his excellent learning, was sent from the whole body of the Realm, to the General Council holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence, by Pope Eugenius the fourth; where he amongst others disputed with the Greeks, in defence of the Order and Ceremonies of the Carmelit Fryers, who wrote a Chronicle called Froelis Temporum, and an Appendix unto Trewia, besides divers other Books and Translations. John Milverton, a Carmelite Fryer of Brifon, and Provincial of his Order, who, because he defended such of his Order as preached against endowments of the Church with Temporal Professions, was committed to prifon in the Cattle of Sain\n Angelo in Rome, where he continued three years. David Morgan a Welchman, who wrote of the Antiquities of Wales, and a de\n scription of the Country. John Tiptoff, a Noble\nmans born, who wrote divers Treatises, but left his head in the year 1471. Robert Huggon born in Norfolk, who wrote certain vain Prophecies.

William Caxton who wrote a Chronicle.
Thomas Norton, born in Briflor, an Alchemift, Segan a learned Gentleman, and a Student for a title in Oxford; who for his pleasent wit and merry conceits, was called to Court. But most worthy of all to be remembered, Thomas Littleton, a reverend Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great part of the Law into Method, which lay before confusedly dispersed; and his Book called Littleton’s Tenures.

The REIGN of
KING EDWARD
THE FIFTH.

1483.

King Edward the fourth being dead, his eldest son Edward, scarce yet eleven years old, succeed ed in the kingdom, but not in the crown; for he was proclaimed King, but never crowned: and indeed it may not so properly be called the Reign of Edward the Fifth, as the Tyrant of Richard the Third, for from the time of King Edward's death, though not in name, yet in effect, he not only ruled as King, but reigned as a Tyrant. Prince Edward, when his Father died, was at Ludlow in Wales, where he had lived some time before, the better by his presence to keep the Welsh in awe; he had about him of his Mothers Kin dred many; but Sir Anthony Woodville, the Earl Rivers, his Uncle, was appointed his chief Counsellor and Director. The Duke of Glo caster was at this time in the North; but had word presently sent him from the Lord Ha glings, Lord Chamberlain, of his Brother King Edward's death; who acquainted him withal, that by his will, he had committed the young King, his Queen, and other Children, to his care and government; and thereupon putting him in mind, how necessary it was for him speedily to repair to London; But the Duke of Glocaster needed no spur to set him forward, who was already in a full career; for he had long before projected in his minde, how he might come to attain the crown; and now he thought the way was made for him. For as it was said, the very night in which King Edward died, one Miflerbrook, long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Potter dwelling in Redcross-street without Cripples-gate; where he shewed unto Potter that King Edward was departed: To whom Potter answered, By my troth man, then will my Master the Duke of Glocaster be King: What cause he had to fo think, is hard to say; but surely it is not likely he spake it of nought. And now the young King was coming up to London with a strong guard, partly to make a first expression of his greatness, and partly to oppose any disorders that might be offered. But the Duke of Glocaster finding this proceeding like to be a rub in his way, at least, not fit for his designs, he pre sently falls to undermining; writes most loving Letters to the Queen, protesting all humble and faithful service to the King and her; but withal perswading her, that this great guard about the King might be presently dismi ssed; which did but minister matter of suspicion, and would be apt to breed new jealousies in them who were now throughly reconciled. The Queen of a nature easie to be wrought upon, gives credit to his glowing Letters; and thereupon lends in all haste to her Son, and to her Brother the Lord Rivers; requiring them by all means for some causes to her known, to dismiss their Guards (not mentioning by whose advice she writ them; which if she had done, they would never have done it) but now upon her Letters they presently did, and came forward with only a sober company. And now is Glocaster's first work done; but he, knowing that the work yet behind was too great to be done by himself alone, gets the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Haf ing, two of the greatest men of power at that time in the Kingdom, to join with him in opinion, that it was not fit the Queens Kin dred should be wholly about the King; and others of better blood and desert, to be estran ged from him, and therefore by all means fit, to endeavour to remove them: To which the Duke of Buckingham is easily wrought upon, a promise to have the Earldom of Hertford con ferred upon him: and the Lord Hafings not hardly, upon a hope by this means to cut off many, whom in King Edward's days he had justly offended. And now another great work was done; it remains in the next place to put it in execution, which was presently thus effectcd.

The young King had been at Northampton, and from thence was gone to Ston-Strafford; wher the two Dukes of Glocaster and Bucking dom arrived; but pretending the Town to be too little for the entertainment of their Com panies, they went back to Northampton, and alliging at the same Inne where the Earl Ri ers had taken up his lodging for that night, in	ending the next morning early to overwrite the King. Upon this their accidental meeting, great fuses of courtesie past between them; and Supper ended, the Dukes pretending wea riness, retired to their Lodgings, the Earl to his; but the Dukes being entred into their Cham bers, enter into confutation with their private friends, in which they spent a great part of the night, and then secretly get the Keys of the Ime Gates, suffering none to pass either in or out; whereas the Earl having notice by his Hoft, though he suspected the worit, yet felt The Reign of King Edward the Fifth.

Glocefier, the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl Rivers, the Duke of Glocefier's Chamber, where he found the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl Rivers had been let in Council; with whom he expou-sates the reason of this course, to imprison him in his own against his will: But they instead of answer, command presently to lay hands on him, charging him with many crimes, whereof themselves were only guilty: And then taking order for his safe imprisonmen:, they speedily took Horfe, and came to Stow-Stratford, at tsuch time as the King was taking horse, whom in all respect they thought it proper. But prerently in the Kings presence, a quarrel is pick against the Lord Richard Gray, the Kings half Brother: The Duke of Buckingham making relation to the King, that he and the Marqueis his Brother, with the Earl Rivers the Queens Brother, had endeavoured, and almost effected, to draw to themselves the whole managing the aff-fairs of the Kingdom, and to set variance between the Peers of the Realm; and particularly, that the Lord Marqueis without any Warrant, had taken out of the Tower of London both Treasurie and Armour, to a great quantity: but to what purpose though they were ignorant, yet there was just cause to suspect it was to no good end: And therefore it was thought expedient by the advice of the Nobility, to attach him at Northampton, to have him forth coming to make his answer for theft and many other his over-bold actions: The King unable to found the depth of thefe plots, mildly fay unto him: What my Brother Marqueis hath done, I cannot fay; but for my Uncle and Brother here, I dare anfwer, that they are ignorant of any unlawful practices either againft me or you. Oh (faith the Duke of Buckingham) that hath been their cunning to keep their treachery from your Graces knowledge: And therupon, infantly in the Kings presence, they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, Sir Richard Hall, and brought the King and all his company back to Northampton, putting away all his old Servants, and placing in their rooms creatures of their own, whom they had power to command. At which dealing the young King wept, but it booted nothing; and to colour the matter, the Duke of Glocefier at Dinner lent a Diff from his own Ta-table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheer, for all shortly should be well: But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Meftenger to carry it to the Lord Richard, with the fame meffage for his comfort, as one to whom fuch adverfity was strange: but as he himself, he had all his days been acquainted with it, and therefore could the better bear it.

But for all this comfortable countefie of the Duke of Glocefier, he lent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Country, into divers places to prison, and afterward to Pomfret, where in conclusion they were all beheaded.

And now the Duke of Glocefier having thus gotten the custody of the King; set forwards toward London, giving out by the way, that the Marqueis and the Queens Kindred had plotted the destruction of the King, and of all the ancient Nobility of the Realm, and to alter the Government of the Common-wealth; and that they were only imprisoned to be brought to t heir trial according to Law: And the better to settle these fuggelions in the apprehension of the Vulgar, they brought along with them divers Cartes laden with Armour, (of "heir own providing) with Dry-fats and great Cheifs, wherein they reported to be Treafure for the payment of Souldiers; with which they to potleft the common people, that all was belived for truth which was thus rumored: But the King was always of all ways, to have five of the Duke of Glocefier's instruments manacled and pinioned like Trayers; and thefe in every place where the King lodged, to be dispersed and given out to be men of great birth, drawn into this vile plot of Treafon by the Queens Brother: who much feem to be penitent for their offence, and to confefs their own guilt:

And this device continued acting till the King came to London, where their Vizards were pulled off, and the difguife was soon discovered.

The Queen in the mean time having intelligence of thefe doleful accidents, and fearing there were worse to follow; with her fecond

Son and five Daughters takes Sanctuary at Welfminifter: and the young King hearing of these things, with tears and lights exprefied his grief: but the Dukes making protestation of their fidelity, and care of his safety, seemed only to marvail why he should be melancholy.

At this time a meffenger came from the Lord Chamberlain to the Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellour of England, to humble to him, that there was no fear of any thing, for that he affured him all should be well. Well (quoth the Archbishop) be it as well as it will;

I affure him, it will never be fo well as we have feen it. And thereupon, prefently after the meffengers departure, he calleth up his Servants (being then in the night) and taking the great Seal with him, came before day to the Queen, whom he found tting alone on the Rufhes, all defolate and dismayed, whom he conforted the bet he could; affuring her, that if they Crowned any King but her Son, whom they had with them, he would prefently after Crown his Brother whom he had with her; and therewithal delivering to her the Great Seal, departed: but soon after bethinking himself better, he thought he had done too rashly:

to deliver the Great Seal to the Queen; and therefore fent for it again, and had it delivered him: yet shortly after, reproofed for delivering it, by the Council Table, he had it taken from him, which was then delivered to Doctor

Raffet, Bishop of Lincoln, the moft learned man of that time.

And now the Duke of Glocefier foreseepive-ly carries himself towards the King, with fo much fiew of care and faithfulness, that by a general confent of the Council, he is appointed and eftablidh Protector of the King and Kingdom; and by this means, he hath the King in his custody: It remains now, how to give his Brother the Duke of York; for without having both, he were as good (as to his pur-pofe) have neither: And to effect this, he makes makes the effect to become a cause; for whereas by his undue dealings, he had made the King melancholy, he now makes that Melancholy a cause to require his Brothers company to make him merry; and therefore wishes some course may be taken, either by persuasion or other wife, to procure the Queen to send the Duke of York to keep his Brother the King company.

Here the Archbishop of York, the Lord Cardinal, the man thought most fit to be sent in this employment, rife up and faith, he would do his best endeavour to persuade her; but if he could not, he then thought it was not to be attempted against her will, for that it would turn to the high displeasure of God, if the privilege of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many years inviably been kept, which both Kings and Popes so good, had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more than five hundred years ago, by Sain Peter in his own person, accompanied with great numbers of Angels by night, so specially hallowed and dedicated to God; and for proof whereof, there is yet in the Abby, St. Peter's Cope to shew; that from that time thitherward, there never was so undeavour a King, that durst violate that sacred place, nor so holy a Bishop that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (faith he) God forbid, that any man, for any earthly thing, should enterprise to break the immunity, and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary: and I trust with God's Grace, we shall not need it, at least my endeavours shall not be wanting, if the Mothers dread and womanish fear be not the ler. Womanish fear, nay womanish frowndness, (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it upon my Soul, the welle- knowneth there is no need of any fear, either for her Son, that is shut up, and prosecuting his discourse, declareth at large, that as there was no just cause for the Queen to keep her Son, so there was great cause for them to require him; and that for breach of Sanctuary in this cause there could be none; for that he had often heard of Sanctuary men, but never heard of Sanctuary Children. And to this purpose having spoken much, it was well attested to by the Lords that were present, and with this Interdiction is the Archbishop (upon whom the Queen specially relied) sent unto her; who after humble salutations, acquaints her with his Message, earnestly persuading her not to oppose the Lord Protectors request, and giving her many reasons, first that she ought not, and then that she could not keep him in Sanctuary. She answered all his reasons, though with great mildness, yet with great earnestness, so as the Archbishop finding little hope to prevail with her by persuasion, turns the tenor of his speech another way; telling her plainly, that if she did not consent to send her Son, he doubted some sharper course would speedily be taken. This warning faink do deep into the Queens minde, that after a little pausing, taking her Son by the hand, she said, My Lord Archbishop, here he is, for my own part I will never deliver him; but if you will have him, take him, and at your hands I will require him; and there with weeping bitterly, Dear Child (faith she) let me kiss thee, before we part. God knows whether ever we shall meet again: and so the Child weeping as fast as she, went along with the Archbishop to the Star-Chamber, where the Lord Protector and other Lords had all staid the while looking for his coming back: and as soon as he was enter the Room, the Protector rifting the Child, rife up and embraceth him, saying, "Dear Nephew, now welcome with all my heart, next to my Sovereign Lord your Brother, nothing gives me to much contentment as your presence: and we may believe him, he spake as he thought; for now he had the prey which he so much desired. A few days after, pretending to have them lodged in a place of more security, until the diftempers of the Common-wealth might better be quitted; he causeth them in great pomp and state, to be conveyed through the City to the Tower, there at pleasure to remain, till the time of Coronation; whereof there was great fprew of preparation made.

But now the great work is to be done, the Protectors fray to the two Princes, and to be made away; and how to have it done, How opus, hoc labor est: there must be potent Instruments, and none so potent as the Duke of Buckingham; and he, by a match to be concluded between their Children, and an equal partition of the Treasures of the Realm between them two; not only is drawn to confide, but is most forward to contrive and plot intrigues to effect it. The first rub in the way was the Lord Hastings; who being found to fam his old Master King Edward's Sons, that nothing could remove him, it was fit to remove him out of the way; which was done in this manner: All the Lords of the Privy Council, in the Protectors name, are convened to the Tower, where they are convened, for the Coronation of the young King, are propofed, until the Protector came in; who taking his Chair, very affably faught them, merrily jefting with some, and more then ordinarily pleasant with them all: when after a little talk, he said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, I hear you have very good Strawberries at your Garden in Holborn; I pray let us have a meaf of them: Mott gladly saith the Bishop) and presently fent for some: And then the Protector rising up, prayed the Lords to spare his absence a little; and so departed. Within the space of an hour he returned; but so changed in countenance, and with fuch inward perturbations, which with fighings and other affoniante gestures he exprefied, that it made them all to marvail. After long silence (the better to prepare them to the more attention) he conffrup, What they deferred that nefariously had practis'd his destruction? This unexpected interrogation struck such amazement amongst the Lords, that they all fate gazing on one another, and were as it were, trick-en dumb. At length the Lord Hasting, by Buckingham's intertation, as one presuming of his intimacy with the Protector, boldly anwcr'd, that they deferred the punishment of Traytors; which all the reft by their silence approved: Whereat the Protector rifer up, and with a ferious look upon the Lord Hasting, replied: Why is it the old Sorecars my Brothers Widow, and her partner that common Strumpet Jane Shore, that have by incarnation conspired to bereave me of my life: and though by God's Grace I have escaped the end of their malice, yet see the mischief they have done me; for behold (and then he bared his left arm to the elbow, and shewed it) how they have caus'd this dear limb of mine to wither, and make it bleed; and for should all my body have been serv'd; if they might have had their will a little longer. Tho' to whom the Queens Religious courses were not unknown, and who knew his withered arm to have been such from his birth, fain gazing one upon another, not knowing what to think or say; till the Lord Hastings, thinking thereby to leave all blame upon the Queen, and excuse his Paramour Miftris Shore,(whom ever since the death of King Edward he had entertain'd for his bed-fellow, and had but that morning parted from) her with a sober look submissively said, If the Queen have conspired—that which word was no sooner out of the Lord Hastings mouth, then the Protector clapping his hand upon the board, and frowningly looking upon him, said: Tellst thou me of If and And? I tell thee, They, and none but they have done it; and thou thy self art partaker of the willany. Who is, my Lord, quoth he? Yeas thou Travtou,quoth the Protector, and不应e, his hand. God be thanked that time is past. In faith man, said the Lord Hastings, I never stood in fo great dread of life; as I did when thou and I met here; and lo, how the world is changed! Now stand my Enemies in the danger, as thou mayest hap to hear hereafter: (for the Enemies he meant, were the Lord Rivers, and others of the Queens Kindred, who that very day were beheaded at Pomfret) and I never so mirmery, nor in so good furety as now I am. That we may know, there is nor a greater Omen or sign of ill fortune,then to prepare of good. And indeed, such is the uncertainty of our estate in this life, that we feldom know when we are in a tempell at Sea, nor when we are in a Calm on Shore; thinking our felves oftentimes most safe, when we are most in danger; and oftentimes to be in danger, when we are most safe: He only is in the true Haven that can say, as Chrift teacheth us, They will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven:

The Lord Hastings is beheaded.

His report of Privileges and Wirings.
made one that was Schoolmaster of Paul’s standing by when the Proclamation was read, to say, Here is a gay godly calf; for all away for hoist; To whom a Merchant answered, It was written by Preists. And now by and by it were in revenge of her offence, the Protecor sent the Sheriffs of London into the house of Shore’s Wife, and spoiled her of all her Goods, above the value of three thouend Marks; and then conveying her through London and the Tower, there left her prisoner; where he laid to her charge, that she went about to bewitch him, and was of counsel with the Lord Hoffsings to destroy him. In conclusion she was laid into Lud- gate, and by the Bishop of London put to open Penance for Incontinency; going before the Crofs in Procession upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand: in which, although she were out of all array, save her Kirtle only; yet went she the faire and lovely, and withal so womanly and demurely, that many who hated her course of life, yet pitied her course usage, and were not a little grievous to see her misery. And indeed, this may be said in her behalf, that being in extraordinary favour with King Edward, yet she the never used it to the hurt of any, but to the relief of many: and was ever a Mediator, an Orator.

Now it was so contrived by the Protecor, that the very day in which the Lord Hoffsings was beheaded at London, and about the very fame hour, there were beheaded at Pomfret, the Lord Rivers, and the other Lords and Knights that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony Stratford; which was done in the presence, and by the Order of Sir Richard Ratcliff Knight, whose service the Protecor specially used in that business; who bringing them to the Scaffold, and not suffering them to declare their innocence, left their words might have inclined men to hate the Protecor, calcium them hastily without Judgement or Order of Process to be beheaded.

When these were thus rid out of the way, then thought the Protecor, that now was the time to put himself in possession of the Crown: but all the study was, by what means this matter being fainght then left, might be broken to the people, in such wise as that it might be well taken: for what purpose it was thought fit to call this Counsell Edmund Shaw Knight, the then Mayor of London; who upon promise of advancement, should frame the peoples inclination to it. And because spiritual men are best hearkened to, for matters of Conscience, some of them were used also; amongst whom, choice was made of John Shaw Clerk, Brother to the Mayor; Fryer Penker, Provincial of the Order of the Angelline Fryers; both great Preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. These two were appointed to preach, the one at Paul’s Crofs, the other at the Spittle, in praife of the Protecor: Penker in his Sermon fo loft his voice, that he was fain to leave off and come down in the midst: Shaw by his Sermon loft his reputation; and soon after his life, for he never after durft converse, for the very fame of the world.

But now was all the labour and study, to finde out some convenient pretext, for which the people should be content to have the Prince depofed, and the Protecor be received for King; to which purpose many things were devised; the chief was to allege Bastardy either in King Edward himself, or in his Children, or in both. To lay Bastardy to the Protecor, opened founded to the reproach of the Protecor’s own Mother, who was Mother to them both; he would therefore that point should more favourably be handled: but the other point concerning the Bastardy of his Children, he believed was effectual to the uttermost: The ground whereof was, that King Edward had been formerly contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, by whom he had a Child; though the said Lady, having been examined about it, confessed plainly, they were never affured. Yet upon this pretext, Doctor Shaw taking for his Text, Bastard Plants shall take no deep root; in his Sermon declared, that King Edward was never lawfully married to the Queen, but was before God, Husband to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, and to his Children Bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himself, nor the Duke of Clarence were reckoned very fit for the Children of the noble Duke Richard, as those that by their favours more resembled other known Men; but the Lord Protector (fait he) is the Father own figure, his own counsels, his own voice, the very print of his visage, the plain express likeness of that noble Duke. Now, it was before devised, that just at the speaking of these words, the Protecor should have come, to the end that these words meeting with his presence, might be taken among the hearers, as though the Holy Ghost had put him in the Preachers mouth, and so should move the people even then to cry King Richard; King Richard! that might be alter said, he was specially chosen by God, and in a manner by Miracles: But this device failed; for whether by to Protecors slackness in coming, or the Doctors haste in preaching, he had pass’d those words, and was gone clean to another matter before the Protecor came; so as afterward seeing him come, he was fain to leave the matter he had in hand, and out of all order and frame began to frame other words; and this is the very noble Prince, the Father own figure, his own counsels, the very print of his visage, the plain express likeness of that noble Duke. While these words were in speaking, the Protecor accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, pass’d through the people into the place where the Doctors set; and there fain to hear the Sermon: But the people were so far from crying King Richard, that they cried name on the Preacher, for abusing his sacred Function with so shameful a Sermon.

The Tuesday following this Sermon, the Duke of Buckingham with divers Lords and Knights came to the Guildhall in London; and there before the Mayor and whole assembly of Citizens, made a very solemn and long Oration, wherein he recited many grievances of the late King Edward’s Government; his many unnecessary Communications and unjust forfeitures; and therefore to bring his Children to the Crown, and then remembered them of the late Sermon made at Paul’s Crofs; by a learned Doctor; who clearly... clearly shewed the Bastardy of King Edward's Children; and that Richard Duke of Gloucester was the only rightful and indubitable Heir to the Crown of England: which the Lords of the Kingdom having taken into their consideration, had thereupon agreed to accept him for their King; and now himself was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their consents. Which oration ended, all men stood wondering at the motion, but no man offered to speak a word. At which the Duke, marvelling, as supposing the Mayor had prepared them before; he asked the Mayor privately, what this silence meant? who answered, that perhaps they had not heard or understood what it was he said. Whereupon the Duke with a more audible voice repeated the same matter again, in a more earlent and plain expression; yet neither did that move them to fly any inclination to the motion. Then the Duke whispering with the Mayor, it was thought that the Citizens being used to have such motions made them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him; and thereupon the Recorder is commanded to move them in it: but the Recorder (called Fitzwilliams) being an honest man, and newly come to his place, repeated only as near as he could the words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; so as neither did this move the people to break their silence. At last the Duke seeing their resolved fullness, told them plainly, that all the Nobility and Commons of the Realm were agreed to choose the Protector for their King, as the true and undoubted Heir; so as he needed not to have moved them to it, but only for the great respect they all bear to this honourable City; and therefore required them plainly to speak their minds, whether they would join with them in this choice or no. At this, certain fervants of the Duke, and other of their procuring, standing at the lower end of the Hall, call up their Caps, and cried aloud, King Richard, King Richard; whereas, though the whole multitude of Citizens marvelling what they meant; yet the Duke taking advantage of it, repeated only as near as he could the words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; so as neither did this move the people to break their silence. The next morning according to appointment, they all meet at Baynard's Castle; where the Duke of Buckingham lends up word to the Lord Protector, that himself with the Lord Mayor and his Brethren, were come to present a supplication to him, concerning a business of great importance: But the Protector (though pre-acquainted with all passagers, yet) made it strange what their supplication should be; and answered, that though he suspected nothing which the Duke of Buckingham presented to him, yet he desired at least some flight intimation to what might tend. To this it was answered, that the business they came about was to be made known to himself in person; and therefore humbly besought him of admittance in his presence. Upon this, as it was seen well assured of their meaning towards him, he appeared unto them in an upper Gallery, making semblance as though he would prevent all danger, by standing something aloof and in his Fort: To whom the Duke of Buckingham, in behalf of the Mayor and Nobility there present, in most respectful and reverent manner makes request, that his Grace would pardon what he should deliver to him: and much circumstance he used, before he would discover their cause of coming: but though long, still, yet as last he told it: That in respect of the urgent necessities of the Commonwealth, they all humbly intreated him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom, as in his own right, to whom all rendered their Allegiance. At which words, the Protector starting back, as if he had heard something most unpleasant to hearing him, palely answered: I little thought, good Citizens, that any of all men would have moved me to a matter which is to things in the world I most decline: Far be it from me to accept of that, which without apparent wrong to my dearest deceased Brothers sweet Children, and my own upright Consciece, I cannot well approve of. And then being about to proceed in this premeditated dissimulation; the Duke in a seeming abrupt passion, kneeling upon his knee, said: Your Grace was pleased to give me free liberty to deliver unto you in the name of this worthy assembly the tender of their dutiful obedience to you: but I must further add, that it is unanimously resolved on, that your late Brother King Edward's Children, as being generally known to be illegitimate, shall never be admitted to the Crown of England; and therefore if your Grace shall neither regard your self nor us so much, as to accept it, we are directly determined to continue you, till the House of Lancaster, that will be more fit for unto our own and our good. These words wrought so powerfully upon the Protector's passions, that with some change of countenance, and not without seeming relutuation, he said: Since I perceive the whole Realm is so resolved, by no means to admit my dear Nephews, being but Children, to reign over you; and seeing the Right of succession belongs justly to me, as the indubitable Heir of Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, my illustrious Father: We are contented to confedend to your importunities, and to accept of the Royal Government of the Kingdom, and will, to the uttermost of my power, endeavour to procure and maintain the welfare thereof. And having so said, he came down from his Gallery, and very formally, prevailed them all: which so pleased the golden multitude, that presently they fell to acclamations, Long live King Richard our dread Sovereign Lord! and then every man departed.
KING RICHARD

1483.

It was now the eighteenth day of June, in the year 1483, when Richard Duke of Gloucester took upon him the Crown: so as the imaginary Reign of Edward the fifth continued but just ten weeks. The next day, King Richard with a great train went to Westminster Hall, and placed himself in the Court of the Kings Bench, saying, he would take the Crown upon him in that place where the King himself sittest and ministrith the Law; because he considered that it is the chiefest duty of a King to administer the Laws: And here to get the love of the people by a feigned clemency, he sent for one Foger out of Sanctuary, who for his falseness and treachery was fled thither; and there in the sight of all the people, caused him to kis his hand.

After his return home, he took to Wife the Lady Anne, youngest Daughter of the great Warwicke, and the relict of Prince Edward, Son of Henry the sixth, though the could not be ignorant, that he had been the Author both of her Husband's and Fathers death. But women affections are Eccentric to common apprehension; whereas the two Poles are Paffion and Indifference.

Against his Coronation he had sent for five thousand men out of the North; and these being come under the leading of Robin Riddifdale, upon the fourth of July; together with his new Bride, he went from Beaufort Castle to the Tower by water, where he created Edward his Son a childe of ten years old, Prince of Wales; John LordHoward Duke of Norfolk, his Son Sir Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey; William Lord Berkeley Earl of Nottingham; Francis Lord Lovel Viscount Lover and his Chamberlain, and the Lord Stanley (who had been committed prisoner to the Tower, in regard his Son the Lord Strange was reported to have levied Forces in Lancashire) not only that day was releifed out of Prifon, but was made Lord Steward of his Household. The Archbishop of York was likewise then delivered; but Morton Bishop of Ely (as one that could not be drawn to the delinquenting of King Edward's Children) was committed to the Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brokewick in Wales, there to be in custody. The same night were made seventeen Knights of the Bath, Edmund the Duke of Suffolk's Son, George Gray the Earl of Kent Son, William the Lord Zouches Son, Henry Abbercoven, Christopher Willoughby, Henry Barnington, Thomas Arundel, Thomas Boleyn, Gervas Clifton, William Say, Edmund Bedingfield, William Enderby, Thomas Lewkenor, Thomas of Ormond, John Brown, and William Berckley. The next day, being the fifth of July, the King rode through the City of London to Westminster, being accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk Buckingham, and Suffolk; the Earls of Northumberland, Arundel, Kent, Surrey, Wiltshire, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincoln; the Vicounts Life, and Level, the Lords Stanley, Audley, Darres, Ferrers of Chartley, Powis, Scrop of Upoale, Scrop of Bolton, Gray of Cadmor, Gray of Pitton, Stuart, Calham, Morley, Burgavens, Zouch, Ferrers of Cropby, Wells, Lumley, Materoves, Herberts and Beckham, and fourscore Knights. On the morrow, being the sixth of July, the King, with Queen Anne his Wife, came down out of the White Hall, into the great Hall at Westminster, and went directly to the Kings Bench; and from thence, going upon Ray-cloth, bare-footed, went to St. Edward's Shrine, all his Nobility going with him, every Lord in his degree. The Bishop of Richfetter bore the Cros before the Cardinal: Then followed the Earl of Huntingdon, bearing a pair of gilt Spurs, signifying Knighthood. Then followed the Earl of Bedford, bearing St. Edward's Staff for a Relicf; After him came the Earl of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointlefs Sword in his hand, signifying Mercy: The Lord Stanley bare the Mace of Contibution: The Earl of Kent bare the second Sword, on the right hand of the King, naked, with a point; which signified Justice to the Temporality: The Lord Lover bore the third Sword on the Kings left hand, with a point, which signified Justice to the Clergy: The Duke of Suffolk followed with the Scepter in his hand, which signified Peace: The Earl of Lincoln bore the Ball and Crosses, which signified Monarchy: The Earl of Surrey bore the fourth Sword before the King, in a rich Scabbard; which is called the Sword of Estable: Then went three together; in the midst went Garter King of Arms, in his rich Coat; and on his right hand went the Mayor of London, bearing a Mace; and on his left hand went the Gentleman-Usher of the Privy Chamber: Then followed the Duke of Norfolk, bearing the Kings Crown between his hands: Then followed King Rich-ard

...chard in his robes of purple velvet, and over his head a canopy, borne by four barons of the cinque-ports; and on each side of the king went a bishop; on one side the bishop of bath; on the other of durham; then followed the duke of buckingham, bearing the kings train, with a white staff in his hand, signifying the office of high steward of england. then followed the queen's train; before whom was born the steeper, the ivories, the dove, sir john corbet, miss灵活性 and the crown; her felt apparelled in robes like the kings, under a rich canopy, at every corner thereof a bell of gold; on her head wore a circlet, set full of precious stones, the countes of richmond bearing her train; the duchesses of norfolk and suffolk in their coronets, attending, with twenty ladies of estate most richly attired. in this order they passed the palace into the abbey: and going up to the high altar, there shifted their robes; and having other robes open in divers places from the middle upward, were both of them anointed and crowned: and then after the sacrament received, (having the host divided between them) they both offered to st. edward's shrine, where the king left st. edward's crown, where with he had been crowned, and put on his own: and this done, in the same order and state as they came, they returned with his façade, and there held a most princely feast: at the second course whereof, there came into the hall sir richard dymock the kings champion, making proclamation, that who soever would say that king richard was not lawful king of england, he was there ready to prove it against him; and thereupon threw down his gantlet; and then all the hall cried, king richard, king richard. and thus with some other ceremonies the coronation ended; and the king and queen returned to their lodgings.

Preferently after this, king richard sent a solemn ambassador to lewis king of france, to conclude a league and amity with him: but the french king did abhorre him and his cruelty, that he would not to much as see, or hear his ambassadors; but sent them away with shame, in digresse of their matter.

At this time, with his queen, he made a progress to glossefer, under colour to visit the place of his old regne, but indeed to be out of the way, having a special villany to be effecte: for though he had satisfied his ambition, by depoying his dear nephews of their liveloods; yet it satisfied not his fear, if he deprived them not also of their lives. for effect whereof, his old friend the duke of buckingham was no fit instrument; it must be one of a bafer metal: and to finde out such a one, he needed not go far; for upon inquiry, he was told of two that lay in the next chamber to him; sir thomas and sir james tyrrell, two brothers like jacob and efan, not more near in blood then different in conditions; of equal goodlines of perfowage both, but not of equal goodness of minds; sir thomas a man of an honest and sober disposition; but sir james of a turbulent spirit, and one who gaping after preferment, would not fiek to make a fortune out of any villany. being told of this man as he was lying at the close-stool, he presently rose and went to him: where being met, the match is soon made up between them; for he found sir james more ready to undertake the work, than he was himself to fet him about it. truly remising to procure him free passage to the place where the work was to be done: for king richard had formerly sent a trusty private of his named john green, to sir robert brackenbury then lieutenant of the tower, thinking that he, having been raised by itself, would not have refused to do the deed himself; but when he heard how averse he was from it, good lord (sith he) whom may a man trust? once he few plainly, that whilest he was lieutenant, there was no possibility to effect it. to remove therefore this rub, he sends his letters mandatory to brackenbury, to deliver presently the keys of the tower to sir james tyrrell, who being now lieutenant for the time, and having the two innocent princes under his custody, gets two other, as very villains as himself; the one miles forrest, the other jame digbition, his horle-keeper, a big lurdy knave: and thence he makes his under-agents; who coming into the children's chamber in the night, (for they were suffered to have none about them, but one black will, or william slaughting a bloody rafcal) they suddenly lapped them from their clothes and keeping down by force the feather-bed and pillows hard under their mouths, so filled them, that their breath failing they gave up their innocent souls to god: whom when the murderers perceived, first by their struggling with the pains of death, and then by their long lying still, to be throughly dead; they laid their bodies out upon the bed, and then fetched sir james to see them; who presently caus'd their bodies to be buried under the stairs, under a heap of stones: from whence they were afterward removed to a place of christian burial, by a prieft of sir robert brackenbury; who dying within a few days after, and none knowing the place but himself, was caute that it hath not been known to this day; and gave occasion afterwards to the imposture of perkins warbeck in king henry the sevenths reign. some report that king richard caus'd their bodies to be taken up, and closed in them lead, and then to be put in a coffin full of holes, hooked at the ends with iron, and to cast into a place called the black deeps, at the thames mouth; to be sure they should never rise up, nor be seen again. and now see the divine revenge upon the actors of this execrable murth: miles forrest, at st. martins le grand, piecemeal rot- tied away: digbition liv'd at colles a long time after; but deteled of all men, died in great misery: sir james tyrrell was beheaded afterward on the tower hill for treason; and king richard himself, after this abominable fact done, never had a quiet minde, troubled with fearful dreams; and would sometimes in the night start out of his bed, and run about the chamber in great fright, as if all the furies of hell were raging about him: that it was verified in him, ultime tresiphone verna against facs fono wera.

Confederacies in evil are seldom long-lived, G 2 and and commonly end in a reciprocal destruction: and so was it now with King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham; They had confederated together to the destruction of many;
and now their confederacy dissoves in both their ruines: but what the caufe was of their disnothing, is not so certain: we believe it was that the Duke thought not himself so well rewarded, as his great services had deferved; or whether it were, that King Richard thought not himself absolute King, as long as the Duke, whose means he came to be King, was in such a height of greatness; or whether it were (as was rather thought) that the Duke being a man ambitious, and of an aspiring spirit; though he had himself been the means to bring King Richard to the Crown; yet when the Crown was put upon his head, so envied at it, that he turned his head another way, as not enduring the figh; and for the fame caufe, was willing not to have been prefent at the Coronation, pretending fickness in excufe of his absence: but that King Richard lent him a sharp meetlage, requiring him to come, or he would fetch him: whereupon the Duke went, but with fo ill a minde, that he bore it in minde ever after.
Whatever it was, certain it is, that prefently after the Coronation, there grew great jealousies between them, and the Duke retired himself to his Castle at Brifkwicke, where he had the Bishop of Ely in cuftody; here we may obferve the unearchable depth of the Divine Providence; the bottom whereof, the foundeft judgement of man can never found, as working effects by contrary caufes: for where King Richard had committed the Bishop to the Duke, as to one that would have a moft watchfuleye over him; this which the King did for the Bifhops greater punishment, proved a means afterward of the Bifhops greater advancement, and a means at the prefent of King Richards ruine: for the Duke being retired home, and having his head fo full of thoughts, of necffity it required vent; for his own recreation, would sometimes fall in talk with the Bifhop; with whole discourse (as he was a man of great wit and solid judgement) the Duke was fo taken, that he grew to delight in nothing more than to be conferring with him.
One time it happened that the Duke had open-ened his minde something freely to him, and the Bifhop following him in his owne way, and cu-ningly working upon that humour of the Duke, which he found moft working in the Duke; which he perceived to grow out of envy to King Richard, he faid to this purpofe: My Lord, you know I followed firft the part of King Henry the Sixth, and if I could have had my wife, his Son fhould have had the Crown, and not King Edward: But after that God had ordained King Edward to Reign, I was never fo mad, that I would with a dead man strife against the quick. And fo was I to King Edward also a faithful Chaplain, and glad would have been that his Childe had fecceeded him: Howbeit, if the fecret Judgement of God have otherwife provided, I purpofe not to labour to fet up that which God pulleth down. And as for the Lord Protector, and now King;—and even there he left: faying, he had already medil too much with the world; and would from that day meddle with his Books and his Beads, and no further. Then longed the Duke exceedingly to hear what he would have faid; becaufe he ended with the King, and there sudddenly ftopped; and thereupon intreated him to be bold to fay whatsoever he thought: whereof he faithfully provifed there should never come hurt, and pereadventure more good than he would think; and withal, that himself pretended to ufe his fecret counfels; which (he faid) was the onely caufe for the which he had procured of the King to have him in his cufto-dy. The Bifhop humbly thanked him, and faid, In good faith my Lord, I love not to talk much of Princes, as a thing not all out of peril, though the word be without fault; for so much as it fhall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to continue it.

And ever I think on AEsop's Tale, that when the Lion had proclaimed on pain of death, that no horned Beafh fhould abide in a certain Wood; one that had in his forehead a bunch of feath, fled away a great pace; the Fox that faw him run fo fay, asked him whither he made all that halfe? who anfwered, In faith I neither wot nor reck, for I were once hence, because of the Proclamation made of horned Beasts: Why fool (quoth the Fox) thou myfelf abide well enough, it may be in thee, for it is no horn that is in thy head: Now if thou be) that wot I well enough; but what if he call it a horn, where am I then? The Duke laughed at the Tale, and faid: My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boar shall pick any matter at any thing here spoken; for it fhall never come near their ear. Then faid the Bifhop, In good faith Sir, if it did, the thing I was about to fay, taken as well as afore God I meant it, could delerve but thanks; and yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turn me to little good, and you to lefs.
Then longed the Duke much more, to hear what it was: whereupon the Bishop faid, My Lord, as for the late Prote&or, fith he is now King in poftition, I purpofe not to difpute his title: but for the weal of the Realm, I could with him in thofe excellent virtues which God hath planted in the perfon of your Grace; and there left again. The Duke now that marveling at this sudden paufe, faid, My Lord, I cannot not but note your sudden flopping in your speech, fo as your words come not to anydirectsentence, whereby I may have knowledge, either what your inward intent is now toward the King, or what your affection is toward me: I therefore intreat you to ufe no more such obscurity but plainly to difclove your minde unto me, who upon mine honour will be as secret in the cafe, as the dead and dumb perfon is to the finger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop then upon confidence of the Dukes promife, faid, My Lord, I plainly perceive, the Kingdom being in the cafe as it is, under fuch a King as now we have, mutt needs decay and be brought to confufion; but one hope I have, that when I consider and daily behold your nobile Perfonage, your Juflice, your ardent Love towards your Country, and in like manner the great love of your Country towards you: I must needs think this Realm fortunate, that hath such a Prince in theire, meer and apt to be a Governor; in whose person confifteth the very undoubted Image of true honour. And then taxing the preferd King with many cruelties and oppressions, he concluded, saying And now my Lord, if either you love God, your Lineage, or your native Countrey, you must your self take upon you the Crown and Imperial Dignity: But if your self will not, I dare not. But if your self will take it upon you, I then adjure you, by the faith you own to God, and by the love you bear to your native Countrey, to devise some way how the Realm may by your Princely Policy be reduced to some convenient regiment, under some good Governor by you to be appointed: And if you could devise to set up again the Lineage of Lancaster, or advance the eldest Daughter of King Edward to some puissant Prince: not only the new Crowned King should little enjoy the glory of his Dignity, but all Civil War should ceaze, and Peace and Profite should again flourish. When the Bishop had ended his sayings, the Duke fighed, and spoke not of a good while; which fore abated the Bishop, and made him change colour; which the Duke perceivd, he said, Be not afraid my Lord, all promsies shall be kept; so for that time they parted. The next day the Duke went for the Bishop, and having rehearsed unto him the communication that had beene before, he went on and said, My Lord of Ely, since I perceive your true heart and sincere affection toward me, I will now discover unto you all that hath paffed my own imaginations. After I had found the diffillation and fallence of King Richard, and especially after I was informed of the mother of the two young Princes, to which (God be my judge) I never confedered; I so much abhorred the light, and much more the company of him, that I could no longer abide in his Court; but being a caufe to depart, I took my leave of him, (he thinking nothing left, than that I was displeased,) and so returned to Brecknock to you; but in that returning, whether it were by inspiration, or else through some melancholic distinction, I had divers imaginations how to deprive this unnatural and bloody Butter of his Royal Seat and Dignity. First, I fantasied, that if I lift to take upon me the Crown, now was the time, when this Tyrant was abhorred and detested of all men; and knowing not of any that could pretend Title before me: In this imagination I relifted two daies at Tewkesbury; in my journey from thence, I mused and thought, that it was not best nor convenient to take upon me as a Conquerour, for then I was sure that all men, and specially the Nobility would oppose me; but at last there sprung up a branch in my head, which I surely thought would have brought forth fair flowers, but they turned indeed to dry weeds: for I suddenly remembered that the Lord Edmund Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather, was with King Henry the Sixth, in two or three degrees of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster: so that I thought certainly, my Mother being eldest Daughter to Duke Edmund, that I was next Heir to King Henry the faith, of the Houfe of Lancaster: This Title pleased well such as I made of my Council, and much more it elevated my ambitious intent; but while I was in a maze, whether I were left suddenly to set this Title open amongst the Common people, or else keep it secreat a while, see what chance: As I rode between Worcestcr and Bridgemorth I met with the Lady Margery Countess of Richmord, now Wife to the Lord Stanly, who is the Daughter and Heir to John Duke of Somerset, my Grandfathers elder Brother (which was as clean out of my mind, as if I had never seen her) so that she and her Son the Earl of Richmord have both of them Titles before mine; and then I clearly saw how I was deceived: whereupon I determined, utterly to relinquish all such fantastical imaginations concerning the obtaining the Crown my self; and found there could be no better way to settle it in a true ettablifhment, than that the Earl of Richmord, very Heir of the Houfe of Lancaster, should take to Wife the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward, the very Heir of the Houfe of York; so that the two Roses may be united in one: and now (faith the Duke) I have told you my very minde. When the Duke had faid this, the Bishop was not a little glad, for this was the mark he had himselfe aimed at: and thereupon, after some complements of exolging his device, he faiid: Since by your Graces incomparable wisdom, this noble conjunction is now moved; it is in the next place necessary to consider, what friends we shall first make privy of this intention. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with the Countezes of Richmord the Earls Mother; who knoweth where he is, either in Captivity, or at large in Britaine. And thus was the foundation laid of a League, by these two great men; by which the death of the two young Princes was fully revenged: and it was not told of only, but presently put in execution; for now is Reynold Bray employed by the Bishop, to his Miftris the Dutchefe of Richmord; Doctor Lewis the Dutchefles Phyfician was employed by her to the Queen Elizabeth; Hugh Convey and Thomas Rame were employed to the Earl of Richmord to acquaint them, but in most secret manner, with the intended plot, and to procure their promises to the proposed marriage; which was no hard matter to make them all willing to their own wishes. This doctor, Instrumentes are employed to draw in parties to the confederacy: Bray by his credit drew in Sir Giles Dawbery, Sir John Chynnym, Richard Gildford, Thomas Rowe, and others; Ursack like wise drew in Hugh Convey, Thomas Celappyer, Thomas Reper, with some others: Doctor Lewis drew in Edward Courteny and his Brother Peter Bishop of Exeter. It is memorable that Thomas Convey being sent most part by Sea, and Thomas Rame most part by Land; yet came to the Earl of Richmord in Britain, within the space of little more than an hour; upon whose information of the plot, the Earl acquaints the Duke of Britain with it, who, though by Hutton King Richard's Ambadoulour, he had by many great offers been solicited to detain him in priſon; yet he both readily promiséd, and really performed both his advice and

...and aid to the Earl of Richmond. In this mean time Bishop Morton, not without asking the Dukes leave, though without obtaining it, secretly in disguise, gets him into his life of Ely; and there having done the Earl good Offices by procuring of friendly Letters to Britain from thence returned no more; till afterward the Earl being King, sent for him home, and made him Archbishop of Canterbury.

But though all these things were carried closely, and Ooth taken by all for secrecy, yet came it to King Richard's knowledge: who notwithstanding dissembling it, sends for the Duke of Buckingham to come unto him; and he, putting off his coming with pretended excuses, is at last peremptorily sent for to come upon his Allegiance: when he returned this resolute answer: that he owed no Allegiance to such a perjured Ishumane Butcher of his own Flesh and Blood: and so from that time preparation for Arms is made on both sides. The Duke had a good power of Wellmen, and the Marquis of Dorset having gotten out of Sanctuary, was labouring in Yorkshire to raise Forces; the like did the two Courtyers in Dorsetshire and Cornwall, and Guilford and Rame in Kent. King Richard setting forward with his Forces, the Duke of Buckingham doth the like, intending to Glanfield to have appalled the Severn, and so to have joyned with the two Courtyers; but such abundance of rain at that time fell, that the Severn was broken out, and impossible to be passed over; which the Wellman seeing, and taking it for an ill sign, they secretly flight away: so as the Duke left well near alone, without either Page, or so much a Foot-man, repaired to the house of one Humfrey Bannister near to Shrewbury; who having been railed by him, and his Father before him; he thought himself safe under his roof: But Bannister upon Proclamation made by King Richard, that whosoever could apprehend the Duke, should have a thousand pound for his labour; like an ungrateful and perfidious wretch, discovered him to John Milton, High Sheriff of Shropshire, who took him in a pill'd black Cloak, as he was walking in an Orchard behind the house; and carried him to Shrewsbury, where King Richard then lay, and there without Arraignment or Legal proceeding, he was in the Market-place beheaded. Whether Bannister received the Proclaimed reward from the hand of the King, is uncertain; but certain it is, that he received the reward of a Villain from the hand of Divine Justice, for himself was afterward hanged for man-slaughter, his eldest Daughter was deflowered by one of his Carriers, or as some say, stricken with a foul Leprolie; his eldest Son in a desperate Laziness murthered himself, and was found to have done so, by the Coroners Inquest; and his younger Son in a small puddle was strangled and drowned.

Upon this disfarr of the Duke of Buckingham, his complices shifted for themselves; some taking Sanctuary, some keeping themselves in unknown places, but many conveyed themselves into Britain to the Earl of Richmond: of whom the Marquess Dorset, John Lord Welles, the Bishop of Exeter and his Brother Sir John Bannister, Sir Edward Woodville Brother to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Dunley, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheyne, and his two Brethren, Sir William Brackley, Sir William Brandon, and his Brother Thomas, Sir Richard Edgecumbe, Hollowell and Paynings Captains, were the chief. Whilest these things are in doing, King Richard receives intelligence from Hutton his Ambassador legate in Britain; that the Duke not only refused to refrain the Earl of Richmond, but intended also to give him affiance: whereupon the King took present order for preparing his Navy to stop the Earl landing in any Port of England. He apprehended also in divers parts of the Realm, certain Gentlemen of the Earl of Richmonds confederation; but coming himself to the City of Exeter, and to the Castle there, and understanding that it was called Rugemount, he suddenly fell into a dump, and as one attainted, said; Well, I see my days be not long: He spake this of a Prophecy told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he should not live long after: which fell out to be true, not in respect of this Castle, but in respect of Henry Earl of Richmond.

Upon the twelfth day of October, in the year 1484, the Earl of Richmond with forty Ships, and five thousand armed Britains took to Sea: but that evening by tempest of weather, his whole Fleet was dispersed; so as only the Ship wherein the Earl himself was, with one little Bark, was driven upon the Coast of Cornwall: where discovering upon the shore great store of armed Soldiers to rebut his landing, he hiofed Sail, and returning toward France, arrived in Normandy; whence sending Messengers to Charles the Eighth King of France, he was by him not only kindly invited to come to his Court, but was aided also with goodsummes of money to bear his charges. After this, the Earl returning into Britain, received there the news of the Duke of Buckingham's death, and the dispersing of the Confederates Forces; with which, though he was at first much troubled, yet was he as much comforted afterward, when he saw the Marquess Dorset, and those other Lords and Captains come unto him: soon after whole coming, upon Christmas day before the High Alter in the great Church of Rheims, the Earl of Richmond gave Oath, to marry the Lady Elizabeth, as soon as he should be quietly settle in the Government of England: and thereupon all the Lords and Knights there present did him homage; and in the same place each to other religiously vowing, taking the Sacrament upon it, never to cease professing War against King Richard, till either his Deposition or Destruction.

King Richard being informed of these things, makes diligent enquirey after all such as might be suspected to be favourers of Richard's afociation: of whom Sir George Brown, and Sir Roger Clifford with four other Gentlemen are apprehended, and executed at London: Sir Thomas Stiegel, who married Anne the Duke of Exeter's Widow, this King's own Sister, and Thomas Rame, Esquire were executed at Exeter.
The Earl having pulled this danger in Britain, and being arrived in France, addressed himself to the French king, imploring his aid; and hath it promised and performed: and in this time John V'st Earl of Oxford, who had long time been kept prisoner in the Castle of Hamburgh, so far prevailed with James Blunt, Captain of the Fortresses, and Sir John Fartford, Porter of the Town of Calais; that not only they suffered him to be at liberty, but accompanied him also to the Earl of Richmond, to whom Captain Blunt gave assurance that the Fortresses remained wholly at his Devotion. At this time also there referred to the Earl, divers young Gentlemen that were Students in the University of Paris, professing their service; amongst whom was Richard Fox, at that time famous for his learning; with whom after-ward the Earl advised in all his affairs, made him one of his most Privy Council, and at last Bishop of Winchester.

But now King Richard having been dispoin- pointed of his delight in Britain, hath applied in this manner in his head to disappoint the Earl of Rich- mond of his Marriage with the Daughter of Queen Elizabeth; and to this end, he sent to the Queen, (being full in Sanctuary) divers meffengers, who should first excite and purge the King's mind of this purpose against her; and then should largely promise promotions innumerable, not only to her self, but also to her Son Lord Thomas Marguefs Drft: by Force of which promises the meffengers prevailed with her, that not only she began to relent, but at last was content to submit her self wholly to the Kings pleasure. And thereupon putting in oblivion the murther of her innocent Children, the butchering of her own Brother and Son, the infamy of her Royal Husband, the aspersion of Adultery cast upon her self, the imputation of Balfard laid to her Daughters, forgetting also her Oath made to the Earl of Richmond's Mother: reduced by flattering words, she first delivered into King Richard's hands her five Daughters; and after sent Letters to the Marguefs her Son, being then at Paris with the Earl of Richmond; willing him by any means to leave the Earl, and with all speed to repair into England; where for him were promised great Honours and Promotions: Assuring him further, that all offences on both parts were forgotten and forgiven; and both he and the incorporated in the Kings Favour. If we consider at this credulity in the Queen, we may conceive the was moved with the two great motives of Fear and Hope; she feared (no doubt) that if she denied the Kings request, he would presently take some sharp course both against her and her Daughters; and she hoped that if they yielded to his request, he would undoubtedly perform his promise, seeing it was as easy for him to keep it as to break it.

But now King Richard's purpoce being to marry one of his Brother King Edward's Daughters; there was one impediment which directly hindered it, that he had a Wife living, and how to be rid of her, that he might bring new affairs upon himself, he could not well; yet this he resolved, that he would of her her he would by some way or other: but before he would life extremity, he would first try milder ways: and first he abstained both from her bed and company, and complained to divers of her barrenness; which coming to her ear, he hoped might cause her to dye with grief: And when this device failed, he then caused a rumour to be spread among the people, that she was suddenly dead: hoping the very conceit thereof would kill her: When this device also failed, (for the Queen hearing of it, and mistrusting the word,) with a most forcible countenance came unto him, demanding what she had done, that he should judge her worthy to dye? who answered with fair words, bidding her be of good cheer, for (to his knowledge) she should have no other cause he then made fure work; for within few days after, whether by poyon, or by what other means, it is not certainly known, she departed this life; and with all solemnity, not without some formality twas of King Richard, was interred in St. Peter's Church at Westminster.

King Richard now by his Wives death, having made himself way to marry another, used all the alluring means he could devise, to win the love of the Lady Elizabeth his niece, but making little or no attempt to purchase his desire by Rafe, if he could not otherwise; and had perhaps done it, but that the storms threatened from beyond the Seas; growing every day more strong than other, forced him to protract the execution of his desires, and look to the prevention of his present danger. The Lord Stanley is commanded presently to levy Forces for the Kings aid, as he will justify his integrity to him: but yet is not permitted to go down into the Country, until he had left George Lord Strange his eldest Son, as a pledge of his Loyalty behinde him. And now King Richard being informed (though the information was craftily suborned by his Enemies) that the Earl of Rich mond was out of hope of any great adherence from France, discharg'd the Ships which he had appointed to guard the Seas, and likewise all the Soldiers; only order is given for diligent watching of the Beacon.

At this time, one Morgan Kidderly, a Student at the Inns of Court, with great hazard of his life, passed over to the Earl; informing him, that King Richard by all means laboured to match himself with the Lady Elizabeth; which so wrought with the Earl, that he saw there was no lingering: and the more, being by him further informed, that Rice ap Thomas and John Savage, two powerful men in their Countries, were ready with great Forces to affist him: Whereupon, not having above two thousand Mercenaries, and but indifferent Shipping to convey him over, about the middle of August he put to Sea, and by the advice of the said Kidderly, steer'd his course for Wales, and on the fourteenth day after his departure from Harles, arrived at Milford Haven; and there landing his Forces without trouble or impediment, from hence marched peaceably to Hereford; where the Inhabitants he was joyfully received. Here he receiveth news by Captain Arnold Butler, that the Earl of Pembroke with all his retinue was upon the way to join with him; also thither came to him Richard Griffith, and John Morgan, with a band of brave Welfmen; and the same day Sir Gilbert Talbot with all the Earl of Shrewsbury's Tenants (being about two thousand well appointed men) came unto him: with these the time was brought him, that Sir Robert Harley and Rice ap Thomas were ready with a great power to stop his passage, which somewhat troubled him, that his friends so suddenly should revolt: but it was but a trick of Rice ap Thomas to make his bargain the furer: for soon after, Rice ap Thomas meets him, and offers him his service, so as the Earl will pledge his faith to perform his promise formerly made; which was, that having once obtained the Crown, he would make Rice sole Governor of Wales: which was now attent'd to, and afterward performed.

At this time the Lord Stanley with five thousand men had taken up his lodging at the Town of Leicester; but hearing of the Earls march that way, he left Leicester and went to Adderbury, too daring to shew himself openly for the Earl, for fear the King should put his Son the Lord Strange to death, whom he had left an Hostage with.

All this time King Richard lay at Nottingham, and was as it were fatally taken with a spirit of security, hearing that the Earl had but small assistance either from France or in England; and therefore fighting him as little able to do any greater matter: but when he heard that part of his own Forces was revolted to him, then he began to look about him, and fends present direction to the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with Sir Thomas Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, with all speed to bring their Forces to him at Lutterworth; from whence upon their arrival, hearing that the Earl was encamp'd at Liefield, he marcheth thitherward: At which time, Sir Walter Hungerford and some others, withdrew themselves from King Richard's part; and Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Stanfords, and Sir Simon Digby, with their several Forces, joyned with the Earl.

King Richard took the advantage of a large Plain near Bosworth, adjoyning to a hill called Anne Beamo; where he encamp'd: And observing by his Adversaries manner of approach, that they meant to give him Battell, he the next morning put his Forces in order: The Vaunce guard was led by the Duke of Norwalk, which consisted of one thousand two hundred Bowmen, flanked with two hundred Couravers, under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey: The Battell King Richard led himself, which consisted of a thousand Bill-men, enpaile with two thousand Pikrs: The Reparward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled Weapons, with two wings of Horse men, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast into square Maniples; especcially the Lord Stanley's coming with two thousand, most of them Horsemen; But the Lord Stanley carried himself so warlike, that he might neither give cause of supicion to the King, nor yet cause of disadvantage to the Earl; that when early in the morning the Earl sent unto him, defining his his present repair; he answered, that he must look for no aid from him, till the Battel should be joined; and therefore advised him, with all possible speed to give the onfet. This anfwer somewhat staggered the Earl, because his number did but little exceed one half of the Kings: Yet to make the best show he could, by the advice of his Council of War, he made his Vaufard open and thin; of which John Earl of Oxford had the leading: The Earl himfelf led the Battel, Sir Gilbert Talbot commanding the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left: whole Souldiers being all alike clad in white Coats and Hoods of Prize, by the reflection of the Sun upon them, made an admirable view of their Enemies, double the number. The Rereward was governed by the Earl of Pembroke, which confifted moft of Horfe, and some Pikes and black Bills. King Richard, to incourage his Souldiers, made a solemn speech unto them: But alas! what hope could he have to put them in heart, whose hearts he had loft? or to raffe alacrity in others, who had none in himfelf? For now the remembrance of his fore-paffed vanities, and specially a fearful Dream he had the night before, wherein it feemed to him, he faw divers Images like Devils, which pulled end haled him, not affuring him to take any reft or quiet: so damped his fpirits, that although he fea a good face upon the matter, yet he could not chose but have a prefaging fear, that the date of his days was not far from expiring: The Earl of Richmond on the other fide, having a clear confidence in himfelf, and speaking to men that followed him for love, had the eafier means to give them encouragement: which he did with fo cheerful a countenance, as though al- ready he had got the Victory. After their military exhortations ended, King Richard commanded to give the onfet. Between both Armies there was a great Marsh; which the Earl left on his right hand, that it might be a defence for his Souldiers on that fide; and besides, by fo doing he had the Sun at his back, and in the faces of his Enemy. When King Richard fot that the Earls company was paffed this Marsh, he commanded with all speed to fet upon them. Then were the Arrows let fly on both fides, and thofe spent, they came to hand-frokes; at which encounter comes in the Lord Stanley, and joys with the Earl. The Earl of Oxford in the mean time, fearing left his company fhou’d be compaffed in with the main body of his Enemies, gave charge in every rank, that none fhou’d go from the Standard: whereupon they knitting themfelves together, and ceased a while from fighting: which the Enemy feeing, and muttering some fraud, they also paufed and left striking. But then the Earl of Oxford, having brought all his Band together, fet on the Enemy afreth; which the Enemy perceiving, they placed their men fìnder and thin before, but thick and broad behind; and refolutely again began the fight. While these two Van-guardes were thus contending, King Richard was informed that the Earl of Richmond with a small number was not far off: whereupon he presently makes towards him; and being of an invincible courage, whereof he was now to give the laft proof, he made fo furious an allufat, that firft with his own hands he flw Sir Williams Brandon, who bore the Earls Standard; next he unhoft and overthrow Sir John Cheyney, a strong and ftrong man at Arms; and then affaulted the Earl of Richmond himfelf, who (though no man would have thought it, yet) for all the Kings fury held him off at his Leuncope point, till Sir William Stanley came in with three thoufand freef men; and then oppref with multitudes, King Richmond is there flain. It is faid that when the Battel was at the point to be loft, a whif Horfe was brought unto him, with which he might have faved himfelf by flight, but out of his undaunted courage he refufed it, faying, He would that day make an end of all Battels, or elfe lose his life. In this Battel Henry Earl of Northumberland, who led King Richard’s Rereward, never flroke ftrke; as likewife many other, who followed King Richard more for fear than love; and fo King Richard, who had deceived many in his time, was at this time deceived by many: which was not unforefen by fome, who caufed a Rhyne to be fet upon the Duke of Norfolfs Gate the night before the Battel, which was this:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,

For Dicken thy Mother is brought and fold.

Yet notwithstanding this warning, the noble Duke continued firm to King Richard; and more confidering what he was towards him, than what towards others, followed him at the laft, and in his quarrel left his life. This John Howard was the Son of Sir Robert, Earl of Norfolk, Knight, and Margaret eldefl Daughter of Thomas Membury Duke of Norfolk, in whole right he was created Duke of Norfolk by King Richard the Third, in the yeare 1483: having beene made a Baron before by King Edward the Fourth. The whole number flain in this Battel on King Richard’s part was not above a thoufand perfones; whereof of the Nobility, besides the Duke of Norfolk, only Walter Lord Ferrers of Chariley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby, one of the chief Counsellours of King Richard, with divers others, was two daies after beheaded at Leifer: Amongst thofe that ran away, were Francis Viscount Lofvel, Humphrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his Brother, who took Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Glocefer. Of Convaine and Prisoners there were great number. Henry Earl of Northumberland, was brought on King Richard’s fide, intercmeffed not in the Battel, was incontinent taken into favour, and made of the Counfeil: But Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, though he submitted himfelf, yet, as having beene specially familiar with King Richard, was committed to the Tower; where he remained a long time: but at laft was delivcred and highly promoted. On the Earl of Richmond’s part were flain scarce a hundred perfones; (fome fay but ten)of whom the principal was Sir William Brandon, the Earls Standard-bearer. This Battel was fought at Ratmor, near Bosworth in Leicercifhire, the two and twentieth day of day of August, in the year 1485, having continued little above two hours. Presently after the Battle, the Earl of Lincoln in the field, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Martyn, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice de Thomas, Sir Roger Peynt, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir John Tawkesville, Sir Hugh Powshal, Sir R. Edgecumbe, Sir John Pyke, and Sir Edmund Carew: and then kneeling down, he rendred to Almighty God his hearty Thanks for the Victory he had obtained; and commanded all the hurt and maimed perfons to be cured: whereat the people rejoicing, clapp'd their hands and cried, King Henry, King Henry: which good will and gladness of the people when the Lord Stanley saw, he took the Crown of King Richard, which was found amongst the spoils in the field, and set it on the Earl's head, as though he had been elected King by the voice of the people. It may not be forgotten, that when King Richard was come to Beverforth, he sent to the Lord Stanley to come presently to his presence: which if he refused to do, he swore by Chrills Paffion, that he would strike off his Sons head before he dined: whereunto the Lord Stanley anfwered, That if he did do, he had more Sons alive, and he might do his pleasure: but to come to him, he was not then determined. Which anfwer when King Richard heard, he commanded the Lord Strange immediately to be beheaded; but being at the very time when both Armies were in fight of each other; his Lords perfwaded him, it was now time to fight, and not to put to execution: and so the Lord Strange elafped.

Of his Taxations.

We must not look for Taxations in kinde in this Kings Reign; for he drew from his Subjects not money so much as blood; and the money he drew was moli by blood, which drew on Confcations: whereof let never any Prince make a Precedent: for where Taxations properly do but Toutes, these did Deglude. Yet in his second year, he called a Parliament, wherein besides the great confinations of thofe that were then attainted, he imposed upon the people a great Tax, which what it was, is not recorded.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

Having gotten the Crown by perfent courfes, he fought to eftablifh it by wholefome Laws; for in no Kings Reign were better Laws made, than in the Reign of this man. Amongst other of his Laws, it was enacted, That from thenceforth the Comonalty of the Realm fhould in no wife be charged by any imposition called a Benevolence, nor any fuch like charge: and that fuch actions called a Benevolence, before this time taken, fhall be taken for no ex- ample to make any fuch like charge hereafter; but fhall be damned and annulled for ever. Many other good Laws were by him made: that we may say he took the ways of being a good King, he had come to be King by ways that had been good.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In his time the troubles of the Temporality kept the Clergy at quiet; and though there were complaimings in the fleets, there was none in the Church. Only Shore's Wife might complain, why she should do Penance for offending lightly against only the Seventh Command- ment; and King Richard do none for offending heavily against all the ten: but that perhaps he had gotten some good fellow to be his Confeffor.

Works of Piety done by him.

As bad as this King was, yet some good works he did; he founded a Colledge at Middleton beyond York, and a Colledge Chancrilly in London; near unto the Tower, called our Lady of Barking: He endowed the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, with five hundred Marks of yearly Revenue; and disfored the great field of Whitefwood, which King Edward his Brother had inclofed for Deer.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

In his second year, at the time when the Duke of Buckingham meant to pass with his Army over Severn, so great an inundation was of water, that men were drowned in their beds, houses were overturned, children were carried about the fields swimming in Cradles, beasts were drowned on Hills: which rage of water continued ten days; and is to this day in the Countrys hereabout,called the Great Water, or the Duke of Buckingham's water.

Of his Wife and Issue.

He married Anne the second Daughter of Richard Neville the great Earl of Warwick, being the Widow of Edward Prince of Wales, the Son of King Henry the fifth: she lived his Wife to the last year of his Reign; and then, to make way for another, was brought to her end, and laid at rest in the Abbey of Westminster: By her he had only one Son, born at Middleton near Richmond in the Countiy of York; at four years old, created Earl of Salisbury by his Uncle King Edward the Fourth; at ten years old created Prince of Wales by his Father King Richard, but died soon after.

There never was in any man a greater uni- formity of Body and Minde than was in him; both of them equally deformed. Of Body he was but low, crook-backed, hook-shouldered, fplay-toowed, and goggle-eyed, his face little and round, his complexion swarthy, his left arm from his birth dry and withered; born a Monster in nature, with all his teeth, with hair on his head, and nails on his fingers and toes. And julf fuch were the qualities of his minde: One quality he had in ordinary, which was, to look favoringly when he plowed, sternly when he executed. Those Vices, which in other men are Passions, in him were Habits; and and his cruelty was not upon occasion, but natural. If at any time he shewed any vertue, it was but pretence; the truth of his mind was only lying and falsehood. He was full of courage, and yet not valiant; valour consisting not only in doing, but as well in suffering, which he could not abide. He was politicke, and yet not wife; Policy looking but to the middle, Wisdom to the end: which he did, and did not. And it was not so much Ambition that made him desire the Crown, as Cruelty; that it might be in his power to kill at his pleasure: and to say the truth, he was fierce of the number of men who consist of flesh and blood, being nothing but blood. One miracle we may say he did; which was, that he made the truth of History to exceed the fiction of Poetry, being a greater Hero than those that were renown'd. He would fain have been accounted a good King, but for his life he could not be a good Man; and it is an impossible thing to be one without the other. He left no issue behind him: and it had been pity he should, at least in his own Image. One such Monster was enough for many Ages.

Of his Death and Burial.

Being slain in the Battel at Bosworth, as before is related; his body was left naked and defpoiled to the very skin, not so much as a clot of blood, to cover his priy parts: and taken up, was trufled behind a purifying at Arms, one Blanche Sengly, or White-hair; his head and arms hanging on one fide of the Horse, and his legs on the other; and all be-sprinkled with mire and dirt, he was brought to the Grey-Friers Church within the Town of Leicefter, and there for some time lay a miserable Spectacle; and afterward, with small Funeral Pomp, was there interred. But after this, King Henry the Seventh caufed a Tomb to be made, and set up over the place where he was buried, with a Picture of Alabaster, representing his person; which at the Suppreffion of that

Monastery was utterly defaced: Since when, his Grave, overgrown with Nettles and Weeds, is not to be found; only the Stone-Chrift, whereby in his Corps lay, is now made a Drinking-Trough for Horses at a common Inn in Leicefter, and remains the only memory of this Monarch's greatness. But his body (as it reported) was carried out of the City, and contemnously bestowed under the end of Bow-bridge, which gives paflage over a branch of Stuarts, upon the West side of the Town. Upon this Bridge (the like report runneth) ftood a Stone of fome height; against which King Richard, as he passed toward Bosworth, by chance ftook his Spur: and againft the fame Stone, as he was brought back, hanging by the horse fide, his head was defhafed and broken: as a Wife Woman (forfouth) had forefett'd; who before his going to Battel, being asked of his Suc-cess, faid, That where his Spur ftook, his head should be broken. But these are but reports. He had lived seven and thirty years, Reigned two, and two months.

Of men of Note in this time.

Of men of Note for wickednefs and villany, enough have been mentioned in the body of the Story: and for men of Valour and Learning, they will fitter be placed in a better Kings Reign.

The Reign of

KING HENRY

THE SEVENTH.

1485

Henry Earl of Richmond born in Pembroke Castle, Son to Edmund Earl of Richmond, by his Wife Margaret; sole Daughter of John Duke of Somerset, which John was Son of John Earl of Somerset, Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, by his third Wife Katherine Swinford; and by this descent, Heir of the Houfe of Lancaster: having won the Battle of Bosworth, against King Richard, is by publick acclamations fauted King of England, on the 22. day of August, in the year 1485; and this was his first Title. And now to take away a root of danger, before his departure from Leicester, he sent Sir Robert Willoughby to the Castle of Sheriffhate in the County of York, for Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence, being then of the age of fifteen years, whom King Richard had there kept a prisoner all his time; who was thence conveyed to London, and shut up in the Tower to be kept in safe custody. In the same Castle also King Richard had left refiding the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward the fourth: and her now King Henry appoints honourably attended to be brought up to London, and to be delivered to the Queen her Mother. This done, he took his journey towards London; where at his approaching near the City, Thomas Hill the Mayor, Thomas Brittin and Richard Cheffer Sheriff, with other principal Citizens, met him at Sker- ditch, and in great state brought him to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where he offered three Standards: In the one was the Image of St. George; in the other was a red fiery Dragon, beaten upon white and green Sarce- ner; in the third was painted a Dan Cow, upon yellow Tarnern. After Prayers said, he departed to the Bishops Palace; and there fotted a feaon: And in the time of his stay there, he advised with his Council, and appointed a day for solemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth: before which time notwithstanding, he went by water to Whiminfir, and was there with great solemnity Anointed and Crowned King of England, by the whole consent as well of the Commons as of the Nobility, by the name or Henry the Seventh, on the thirtieth day of October, in the year 1485, and this was his second Title. And even this was receaved to Cadwallader, last King of the Britains, seven hundred ninety and seven years past; That his Off-Spring should Reign and bear Dominion in this Realm again.

On the seventeenth day of November following, he called his High Court of Parliament; where, at the first sitting, two scruples appeared; One concerning the Burgesses for that many had been returned Burgesses and Knights of Shires, who by a Parliament in King Richard's time had attained still: and it was thought incongruous for men to make Laws, who were themselves out-lawed: For remedy whereof an Act was presently paffed for their refunding, and then they were admitted to fit in the House. The other concerning the King himself, who had been attainted by King Richard: but for this, It was resolved by all the Judges in the Chequer Chamber, that the possession of the Crown takes away all defects; yet for Honours sake, all Records of his Attach- der were taken off the File. And to these scruples thus removed, the Parliament began; wherein were attainted, first, Richard late Duke of Gloucester, calling himself Richard the Third: Then his Attendants at the Battle of Bosworth; John late Duke of Norfolk; Thomas Earl of Surrey; Francis Viscount Lovel; Walter Devereux; late Lord Ferrers; John Lord Zouch; Robert Har- rington; Richard Carterton; Richard Ratcliffe, William Berkeley of Wely; Robert Middleton; James Harington; Robert Brackenbury; Thomas Pilkington; Walter Hope; William Catesby; Roger Wake; William Sayepe; Humfrey Stafford; William Clark of Wenlock; Geoffrey St. Germain; Richard Wals- kin Herauld at Arms; Richard Sewel; Thomas Pitter; John Wolfe; John Kendall late Secretary to the late King Richard; John Buck; Andrew Rat; and William Brampton of Burford. But notwithstanding this Attainder, divers of the persons aforesaid were afterwards not only by King Henry pardoned, but restored also to their Lands and Livings. As likewise he caused Proclamation to be made, that whatsoever would submit themselves, and take Oath to be true Subjects, should have their Pardon: whereupon many came out of Sanctuaries and other places; who submitting themselves, were received to mercy.

And now King Henry considering that Panis & Præmia Rex Publice continuat; after punishing for Offences, he proceeds to rewarding for Service; and first, Jasper Earl of Pembroke his Uncle he created Duke of Bedford; Thomas Lord Dukedone Earls created.
Lord Stanley he created Earl of Derby; the Lord Chancellor of Britain, his special friend, he made Earl of Bath; Sir Giles Daubeny he made Lord Daubeny; Sir Robert Willoughby was made Lord Brook; and Edward Stafford eldest Son to Henry late Duke of Buckingham he restored to his Dignity and Possessions. Besides, in this Parliament an Act was made, for setting the Crown upon the person of King Henry and the Heirs of his body successively for ever. And then with all speed he sent and redeemed the Marquefs Dorset, and Sir John Bouchier, whom he had left Hothages in France for money; and called home Morton Bishop of Ely, and Richard Fox, making Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Bishop of Winchester. Besides these, he made also of his Privy Council, the Duke of Bedford, John Earl of Oxford, Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, John Bishop of Ely, Sir Will. Stanley, Lord Chamberlain of his Houftold; Sir John Elphinstone upon his person; Lord Steward of his Houftold; Giles Lord Daubeny John Lord Dynaum, after made Lord Treasurer of England; Sir Reginald Bray, Sir John Chelney, Sir Richard Grifford, Sir Richard Tusfial, Sir Richard Edgecomb, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Edmund Powings, Sir John Rylfe, with some other.

These things thus done, as well in performance of his Oath, as to make his Crown fit the furer on his head; on the eighteenth day of January, he proceeded to the solemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth; which gave him a third Title: And indeed this conjunction made a wreath of three fo indifensible, that no age since hath ever questioned it: and it is fixt upon a Tree planted so happily by the waters tide, and hath at this day so many flourishing branches, that there is good hope it will continue as long as the World continues.

And now whether King Henry desired any sudden Restoration upon his person, or whether he did it to follow the example of France; in the very beginning of his Reign, he ordained a band of tall perfonable men to be attending upon him, which was called the Kings Guard; which no King before, and all Kings since have always used: But though he provided a Guard for defence of his own body, yet for the body of his people he could provide none; for at this time a Sicknes (of the Symptome called the Sweating Sicknes) feized so violently upon them, that within a short time many thousands perished: particularly in London, two Mayors successively, and six Aldermen within eight days died: and for this Sicknes no Physick afforded any cure; till at last this remedy was found: If a man were taken with the sweat in the day time, that then he should prefently lie down in his Cloaths, and fo lie till the whole morning, and twenty hours; if he were taken in the night, then he should not rise out of his bed, for the space of four and twenty hours; not provoking sweat, nor yet eating or drinking at all, but at least very moderately. In this sicknes there was one good circumstance; that though it were violent, yet it lasted not long: for beginning about the one and twentieth of September, it cleared up before the end of October following.

And now all things being set in good order in the South parts, there ariseth a little storm in the North, but was soon disperfed. For King Henry, making a journey into the North parts, to shew himself there where he had not yet been; and where the respect to King Richard might have left some opposites: as his coming to Lincoln, was certified that the Lord Lovel and Humfrey Stafford were gone out of Sanctuary in Cockfet; but whither, no man knew. The King therefore not much regarding it, went forward to Toke; and being come thereto, it was then plainly told him, that the Lord Lovel with a strong power was at hand, and would presently invade the City. This made the King in a great straight; for neither had he any Army ready; nor if he had men, had he any Weapons or Munition for them. Yet in this straight, he commanded the Duke of Bedford, with three thousand men to set out against him, but so ill armed, that their Armes were of the most part with the head of tanner Leather, who being come near the Camp of the Rebels, caufed Proclamation to be made, that whoever would submit themselves as Loyal Subjects, should have their Pardons, and be received into Grace: which Proclamation so prevailed, that it made the Lord Lovel secretly in the night to flee away; and then the Army, left without a head, submitted themselves to the Kings mercy. The Lord Lovel fled into Lancashire; and there for a time lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton, a man powerful in those parts. Humfrey Stafford took Sanctuary in a Village called Culsionham, two miles from Albington: but the Sanctuary being judged, by the Jultices of the Kings Bench, to be no lawful defence for Traytors; he was taken from thence by force, and conveyed to the Tower, afterward to Trybun, and there hanged. His Brother Thomas was pardoned, because it was thought he was drawn in by his Brother Humfrey.

In this year John Perseful the Mayor of London's Carver, waiting at his Table, was chosen one of the Sheriffs of London, only by Sir John Collet, then Mayor, drinking to him in a cup of Wine, (as the custom is to drink to him whom he lift to name Sheriff) and forthwith the said Perseful sat down at the Mayors Table, and covered his head, and was afterward Mayor himself.

At this time a mean instrument attempted a great work; by which we may fee, how far imagination may out-go reason: One Richard Simond a Priest, a man of base birth, though some learning had a Scholar of better birth, the Son of a Shoemaker (some say a Baker) named Lambert Vyned; but of a pregnant wit and comely personage: Him he gives over to be Edward Earl of Warwick, lately (as was said) escaped out of Prifon, but of them of being of like years and figure; with this Scholar or his, he falls into Ireland, and so forth with the matter, that not only the Lord Thomas Fitz- Gerard Earl of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland, but many other of the Nobility gave credit to his words; and as those that affected the House of York, were ready to take his part, and even already saluted the young Sultan King, Withal they they sent into Flanders to the Lady Margaret, Sitter to the late King Edward, and Widow of Charles Duke of Burggaigne, requiring aid and assistance from her. This Lady being of the Houfe of York, bare an inward grudge againft King Henry, being of the Houfe of Lancaster; and therefore, though she well understood it was but a coloured matter, yet was willing to take advantage of it: and thereupon promised her assistance. King Henry being advertized of these things, advized with his Council; by whom it was agreed, that two things prefently should be done. First, to grant a pardon to any that would submit themselves, for any ofience whatsoever, though it were for High Treafon: The next, that the Earl of Warwick should be openly fhewed abroad in the City, and other publick places; whereby, the report spread abroad of his being in Ireland, might appear plainly to be falle. Withal, the Queen Elizabeth, Widow of King Edward the fourth, and Mother to the prefent Queen, was advised with the Earls of Hereford, and to live confined in the Abbey of Ber Mond fray in Southwark; where in great penfiveness within a few years he died. But for what caufe this fervility was ufed againft this Queen, is not altogether certain: To fay, (as was commonly faid) that it was for rending her felf and her Daughters into the hands of King Rich ard, were manifest injustice, to punifh her for doing things out of fear, which elle the fhould have been complicated to do by force: and to fay (as fome also have faid) that it was for giving aid underhand to Perkin, were a manifest unlikelihood, that the fhould aid a Counterfeiter againft her own Son inlaw: we muft therefore content our felves with knowing the bare colourable pretext, and leave the true reafon as a fecret of State. But this fhewing abroad of the true Earl of Warwick, though it fatisfied fome, yet not all: for some went out fhadowed under the name of the Earl of the first, and not the true Warwick. At leaft the Earl of Lincoln, Son to John de la Poul, Duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Sitter to King Edward the fourth, would not omit to take the advantage, though he knew that Symnel was a Counterfeiter. And thereupon, as soon as the Parliament was defolved, he fled fecretly into Flanders, to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Duches of Burggaigne; between whom it was concluded, that he and the Lord Lovel fhould go into Ireland, and there attend upon the Counterfeiter Warwick, and honour him as a King; and with the power of the Irish men bring him into England: but it was concluded withal, that if their actions fucceeded, then the Counterfeiter Warwick fhould be depofed, and the true be delivered out of Prison, and Anointed King. And to this purfue, the Earl of Lincoln by the aid of the Lady Margaret, had gotten togetherness two thousand Arms, with one Martin Smart, a valiant and expert Captain to be their Leader. With this power the Earl failed into Ireland; and at the City of Dublin, caused young Lambert, the Counterfeiter Warwick, in molt folemn manner, firft to be proclaim’d, and after to be Crowned King of England: and then with a great number of beggarly and unarmed Irish men, under the conduct of the Lord Thomas Gerardine Earl of Kildare, they failed into England, and landed at a place called the Pile of Fawney, not far from Lancaster; hop’d there by the means of Sir Thomas Broghton, a powerful man in that Country, to have their Army both furnifh’d and increaf’d. King Henry hearing that the Earl of Lincoln was landed at Lancaster, assembled a great Army, conducted by the Duke of Bedford, and the Earl of Oxford, and with thefe he marched to Nottingham, and there by a little Wood called Bowwes, he pitched his Field: whither there came unto him, the Lord George Talbot Earl of Shrewbury, the Lord Strange, Sir John Cheyney, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. In which mean time the Earl of Lincoln being entred into Yorkshire, paffed quietly on his journey, without doing spoil or hurt unto any; trufting thereby to have won the people to come to his aid; but when he perceived few or none to refent unto him, he then determined to venture a Battel from the fecond to the third time, and thence took his way from York to Newark upon Trent.

King Henry understanding which way he took, came the night before the Battel to Newark; and going three miles further, near to a Village called Stoke, there waited the approach of the Earl of Lincoln; so the next day they joyned Battel; where after a long fight of the leaft three hours; though the Amintim, and specially their Captain Martin Smart behaved themselves moft valiantly; yet their Irish, being in a manner but naked men, were at laft overthrown; four thoufand slain, and the reft purloined, but not one of their Captains; for the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Lovel, Sir Thomas Braghton, Martin Smart, and the Lord Gerardine were all found dead in the very place, where they had flood fighting; that though they loft the Battel, yet they won the reputation of bare and honourable Souls. Only of the Lords two reports, that according to one, he fave himfelf by flight, in pafling over the River of Trent, he was drowned. On the Kings part, though fome were faine, yet not any man of note. This Battel was fought on a Saturday (oberved as always fortunate to King Henry) being the fixteenth of June, in the second year of King Henry’s Reign. The young Lambert and his Mafter Simond the Prieff, were both taken; and both had their lives faved: Lambert, becaufe but a Childe, Simond became a Prieff; yet Simond was kept in priifon, Lambert was taken into the Kings Kitchin, to turn the Spit in the turn of his fortune, and at laft made one of the Kings Faulkner.

In the beginning of his third year, King Henry having been in Yorkshire, to settle the minds of that people, about the mift of the Augufi came to New-castle upon Tyne, and from thence to the Army of the Southerners. To them to the, Richard Fox, lately before made Bishop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgcoube Componentr of his Houfe, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James King of Scott: A Peace, by reafon of the peoples backwardnes, could not be obtained: but a Truce was concluded for the term of seven years; with a promife from the King, that it fhould be renewed before

They were all found dead in the very place, where they had stood fighting; that though they lost the Battel, yet they won the reputation of bare and honourable Souls. Only of the Lords two reports, that according to one, he saved himself by flight, in passing over the River of Trent, he was drowned. On the King's part, though some were slain, yet not any man of note. This Battel was fought on a Saturday (observed as always fortunate to King Henry) being the sixteenth of June, in the second year of King Henry's Reign. The young Lambert and his Master Simond the Priest, were both taken; and both had their lives saved: Lambert, because but a child, Simond became a Priest; yet Simond was kept in prison, Lambert was taken into the King's Kitchin, to turn the Spite in the turn of his fortune, and at last made one of the King's Faulkners.

In the beginning of his third year, King Henry having been in Yorkshire, to settle the minds of that people, about the midst of August came to Newcastle upon Tyne, and from thence to the Army of the Southerners. To them there was sent, Richard Fox, lately before made Bishop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgcumbe, Comptroller of his House, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James King of Scott: A Peace, by reason of the peoples backwardness, could not be obtained: but a Truce was concluded for the term of seven years; with a promise from the King, that it should be renewed before. fore the first seven years should be expired. At this time Ambassadors came from the King of France, to King Henry; who declared, that their Master King Charles was now at War with Frank Duke of Orleans, for that he successed the Duke of Orleans and other Rebels against the Realm of France; and therefore requested, that for the old Familiarity that had been between them, he would either affit him, or not affit the Duke, but stand Neuter. King Henry answered, that having received courteys from them both, he would do his uttermost endeavour to make them friends: and to that end, as soon as the French Ambassadors were departed, he sent Christopher Orsuck his Chaplain over into France, who should first go to the French King, and after to the Duke of Britain, to mediate a Peace between them.

In the time of Orsuck's Ambassage, King Henry caugeth his Wife the Lady Elizabeth to be Crowned Queen, on Saint Katharine's day in November, with all solemnity; and at the same time delivered the Lord Thomas Marquefs Dorso out of the Tower, and received him again into his former favour.

He first travelled between the two Princes to prepare Peace; but they, though making a Show to incline to Peace, prepared for War, and offers on neither side would be accepted. In which time Edward Lord Woodville, Uncle to the Queen, made fuit to the King, for leave to go over with a power of men, in aid to the Duke of Britain; which suit though the King denied, yet the Lord Woodville would venture it; and with a power of four hundred able men, got secretly over, and joyned with the Britains against the French. This the French King took ill at King Henry's hand; but being informed that it was against the Kingswill, he seemed satisfied; and a Peace was concluded between France and England, to endure for twelve months. But in conclusion, King Henry finding that the French King dealt not really with him, but only held him with pretences; he called his High Court of Parliament, requiring the same arms what he was given when it was concluded, that the Duke of Britain should be sided; and to that end great sums of money were by Parliament granted. This determination of the Parliament, King Henry signifieth to the French King, hoping it would have wrought him to some terms of Peace. But the King of France little regarding it, proceeded on in his violent courst against the Britains; so as at last, on the eight and twentieth day of July, the Britains gave Battel to the French, near to a Town called St. Aultyn; having appalled seventeen hundred of the Britains in Coats with red Crosses, after the English fashion, to make the French men believe they were all English, although indeed they had no more English than the four hundred of the Lord Woodvile's; But notwithstanding this device, the Victory fell to the French; so that all the English men almost were slain, with the Lord Woodville himself besides five thousand Britains. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange, who were on the Britains part, were taken Prifoners. The French loot twelve hundred men; and amongst other, that valiant Italian Captain James Galeot.

This news being brought into England, caugeth King Henry to make haste to send forth his Army; and thereupon the Lord Brook, with Sir John Cheynys, the Lord John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Grebe, Sir Thomas Leighten, Sir Richard Lacy, and Sir Edmund Carmell, are sent over with all speed into Britain; having with them eight thousand men, to aid the Duke of Britain against the French. But while this War was thus set forward, the Duke of Britain died; leaving in effect, one only Daughter, the Lady Anne (for the other being the younger, died soon after) and then the chief Rulers of Britain falling at disposition amongst themselves, little regarded the defence of the Countrey: whereupon the Englishe returned home, within five months after their setting forth; and the French King getting the upper hand of the Britains, and marrying the Lady Anne sole Daughter of the Duke of Britain, incorporated that Dutche to the Crown of France.

In the last Parliament, a Subsidy was granted, for the furnishing out an Army into Britain; and it was agreed that every man should be assayed after the rate of his Subsidy, to pay the tenth penny of his goods: which Tax, the moit part of Yorksire and the Bishoprype of Durham: refused to pay: whereas the Collectors complained to Henry Earl of Northumberland, President of the North Parts; The Earl signifieth to the King, and the King commands him to levy the fame, by diftreff or otherwise (without sparing of any) as he should think most meet. The rude multitude, hearing of this Command from the King, with great violence set upon the Earl, by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber; and alledged all the fault to be in the Earl, as chief author of the Tax; they cruellly murdered both him and divers of his houfhold Servants. And to make good their seditious fafher, they assembled a great number, and made one Sir John Eyestrem their Captain; Declaring, that in defence of their liberties, they would make the Earl to yield, if they might rythe ftood, as long as none opposed them: but when Thomas Earl of Surrey appeared with an Army, though they skirmifhed a while, yet they were foon confounded, and their Ring-leader John a Chamber was taken, and at Tack on a Gibbet fet upon a square pair of Gallows, like an Arch-traitor, was hanged, and many of his Complices on a lower Gallows; the innocent people for the moit part pardoned. But Sir John Eyestrem fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret Dutchefs of Burgandy; the common and sure refuge for all Rebels against King Henry. After this, the King appointed Sir Richard Townsend to gather the Subsidy, and would not pafs the payment of a Penny. This year, notwithstanding this Tax, the King borrowed of every Alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eighty two pounds, seventeen shillings and four pence, which was paid again at the time with great thankfulness; which he did at a time he needed not, nor to the end perhaps he might do it another time, when he needed.

At this time James the third, King of Scots, "King Henry leads an Army to aid the Duked of Britain, the French King marries the Hoit of the Duke of Britain, The Earl of Northumberland demands in cabining to the Subsidy, 1489." Land, having by some errors of Government incurred the hatred of his Nobility and people, laboured with King Henry, as also with the Pope, and the King of France, to make an accord between him and his people; who had compelled Prince James his Son, to be the Titular head of those Arms which they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by Ambassadors; but could receive no other, but this outrageous answer. That there was no talking of Peace, unless he would resign his Crown. Which answer the Kings proceeded against, declaring by their Ambassadors, that they thought it a common injury to themselves, and that the Example was not fufferable for Subjects to lift their hands against their Sovereign. Hereupon it came to a Battel at Bannockburn, where King James, rashly beginning the fight, before his whole Forces were come, was (notwithstanding the contrary commandment of the Prince his Son) slain in the Mufl of that field, where his body fell the Battel landed.

About this time, a difference fell out which grew to a war, between the Emperor Frederick, and some Towns of his in Flanders, especially Gazaun and Burges: In this war, the Lord Ravenstein a principal person about Maximilian, not only forsook the Emperor and his Son Maximilian his Lord, (corrupted as was thought from France) but made himself head of the popular party, feizing upon the Towns of Ipre and Sluys: and not only this, but forthwith with sent to the Lord de Cordes, Governor for the French King in Picardy, to aid him against some Towns in Flanders: To which the Lord de Cordes, willing of any occasion to fet foot in Flanders, was easily drawn. But King Henry not liking to have the French to near his English pale, lent over the Lord Morley with a thousand men, who should join with the Lord Daniell then Deputy of Calais, to reftit them. Amongst other Acts by them performed, this was chief. That the Lord de Cordes, taking with the Lord Morley Sir James Tyrell Captain of Guifnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and Sir Henry Talbot Marshal of Calais, and others to the number of two thousand, issued secretly one night out of Calais, and came to Newport, and from there to Dussande; where the Lord Daniell commanded all men to send back their Horses: which the Lord Morley only refusing to do, was caufe that he only of all the Captains was slain with a Gun: for the rest after their arrows discharged, fell prostrate to the ground; by which means the Enemies Ordinance over-shot them, killing only the Lord Morley that was on Horseback. Here they flew of the Enemy to the number of eight thousand; of the English part was slain the Lord Morley, and not above a hundred more. This Victory so enriched the English, that they who went forth in Cloath, came home in Silk; and they who went on foot, returned back on Horseback. Upon this defeat, the Lord de Cordes lying at Ipre with twenty thousand, and thinking to be revengeed besieged the Town of Newport; and so strongly assaulted it, that one day his men entred, and let up his Banner upon a Tower of the Town; when suddenly a Bark arriving with only fourscore fresh English Archers, so terrifed them, thinking their number to be far greater, that the French were glad to leave their Banner behind them, and give over the affaull; and the night following the Lord de Cordes (who so much longed for Calais, that he would commonly say, he would be content to lie seven years in Hell, so that Calais were in the possession of the French) broke up his siege, and returned to Holding with as much shame, as the English to Calais with honour.

A little before this time, Francis Duke of Britain dying, left only one Daughter, the Lady Anne, affienced to Maximilian King of the Romans; and so to solemn a manner, that the taking upon her to be the Bride, and being laid in her bed, was contented to permit Maximilian's Deputy, in presence of many noble witneses, as well men as women, to put his leg fryst naked to the knee, between the spousal sheets; accounting that Ceremony to amount to the Confirmation. The King of France likewise had been contract to the Lady Margaret, Daughter to the forefaiied Maximilian, and had received her to that end: Yet all this notwithstanding, out of a violent desire to join the Dutchy of Britain to the Crown of France, he diisannulled and made void both the Contracts. But to the end he might do it without opposition of the King of England, he sent Ambassadors, the Lord Fransc of Luxemburg, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gagnite, to King Henry; partly to conclude a Peace, but chiefly to procure King Henry's good will to make void the forefaiied Contracts; to which though King Henry was not willing to give content, yet he confessed willingly to have a Treaty for Peace; and to that end, sent over Thomas Earl of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenfne Prior of Christ's Church in Canterbury, to the French King about it. But during this Treaty, and before conditions of Peace could be agreed on, the French King had gotten into his possession the Lady Anne, and did desire the Honour of her; which underhand dealing so incensed King Henry, that he presently called his High Court of Parliament, and there declared the just cause he had of War with France, desiring their Benvolence to the Charge thereof, which was as readily granted as desired, and great fummes of money were soon collected.

In the year 1491, being the fifth year of the Kings Reign, on the sixth of April, the Nobility of the Realm assembled in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, where also was the Mayor and Aldermen, and principal Citiens in their Liveryes: to whom Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor made an Oration; declaring from his own Letters, that the King of Spain had won the great and rich City and Country of Granada from the Moors; which had been in their possession above seven hundred years; and having, in places of their conquests, built Churches to the Honour of Christ, was thereupon entituled the Catholick King. For joy whereof the Commons were sung with great festimomity.

In the month of May was holden a solemn Juffting at the Kings palace of Steren, now called Richmond, which continued the space of a month.
month, sometimes within the Palace; and sometimes without, upon the Green before the Gate; in which James, Sir James Parker running against a Gentleman named Hugh Pagheman, by reason of a faulty Helmet, was strucken into the mouth at the first stroke; so that his tongue was born to the hinder part of his head, in such fort that he died presently upon the place.

And now Maximilian having received back his Daughter from the King of France, was so displeased, that he presently sent an Ambassador, one James Constable, to King Henry, requiring him to take his part in a War against the French King; which promise he promised to provide ten thousand men, with pay for two years: King Henry contented to it; and having provided himself of a puissant Army, on the sixth day of October failed to Calais; but sending his Ambassador Christopher Urswick, and Sir John Resby to Maximilian, requiring his promised Forces; they found him altogether unprompted of either men or money: which brought King Henry into a great strait what he should do: To proceed in the War, with his own Forces alone, would be full of hazard; to return home without doing any thing would bring an imputation upon him amongst his Subjects; as though he had used the presence of War but as a trick to get money: at last, he resolved to do something; and thereupon went and besieged Bolognæ, having in his Army, of chief Lords, Jasper Duke of Bedford, his Lieutenant General, Thomas Marques of Dorset, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Suffolk, Shrewsbury, Dorset, Kent, Devonfer, and Ormonde, many Baron, as Downes, Abergeley, Dale, Ware, Zouch, Holfing, Cuthman, and others. During his Siege of Bolognæ, (in which there were but a few flaws, and none of note, but Sir John Sisage, who riding to take view at what place the Town might best be assaulted, was set upon by certain French men, and by them slain) King Henry was secret-ly dealt with by the Lord Cardes Governour of Heymoutis, on the King of France's behalf, to accept of certain conditions of Peace. Who thereupon sent Richard Fox, Bishop of Exeter, and Giles Lord Davenfort to conclude them; which amongst other Articles were, That King Henry without quitting his claim to France, should, for a Peace to continue during the two Kingdoms, receive in present of Charles King of France, for his charges in that War, seven hundred forty and five thousand Ducators, which in English money amounts to one hundred eighty thousand two hundred and fifty pounds; and five and twenty thousand Crowns yearly, towards the expenses he had been at before in aiding the Britains; which (by the English called Tribute) was duly paid, during all the Kings Reign, and after King Henry his Son afterward, longer then it could continue upon any computation of charges. There were also agreed by the French King unto all King Henry's principal Counsellors, great Penions, besides rich gifts for the present. Whether which the King did permit, to save his own parre from Rewards, or to communicate the envy of a benefite that was displeasing to his people, was diversely inter- preted: for certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this Peace; and therefore a little before it was concluded, he had under-hand procured some of his best Capitains and Men of War, to advise him to a Peace under their hands in an earneit manner, in the nature of a Supplication; that he might have it to flew for justifying himself, and to give some allay to the discontentments of many, who had sold and engaged their estates upon the hopes of the War. After the Peace thus concluded, he went to Calais, where he stayed some time, and the seventeenth of December following came to Welfminster, where he kept his Christ-mas.

Soon after his return, he elected into the Or- der of the Garter, Alphonse Duke of Calatriva, Son and Heir to Ferdinand King of Naples: to whom Christopher Urswick the Kings Almoner, was sent to Naples to carry it; which as soon as Alphonse had received it, he apperellled himself presently in the Habit, before a great assembly, indeed to shew what favour he was in with the King of England.

There had been a disturbance in the Realm be- fore, by a Counterfeit Son of the Duke of Clarence; but that device had two main imperfections: One, that the true Son of the Duke was forth coming, and to be shewed openly for convincing the false; the other, that though the counterfeit had been the true, yet he could have laid no claim to the Crown, as long as any Daughters of King Edward the fourth were living. Now therefore a device is found, by which those imperfections were both of them amended, for now a Counterfeit was set on foot, who pretended to be Richard the younger Son of King Edward the fourth; so that ne- ther any other could be produced to convince him of being false, nor any Daughters of King Edward could hinder his Right for claiming the Crown. This device was first forg'd by Margaret Dutchess of Burgundy, a woman that could never be quiet in her minde, as long as King Henry was quiet in his Kingdom; and by this device she hoped, if not to put him clean out of his fear, yet tould at least to disturb him in it; and this was the purpose of the plot: but by what instrument it was set forth, by what abettors fomented, and what issue the device had, are worthy all to be related. The Dutchess having formerly given out, that Richard the younger Son of King Edward, was not mar- ther, but in comparison spared, and sent secretly away to seek his fortune; and having after long search gotten at last a fit Boy to personate a Prince, keeps him secretly a good time with her; in which time she so thoroughly instructed him in all Circumstan- ces, and he afterward put them so gracefully in practice, that even those who had seen and known the young Prince while he lived, could hardly perceive but that this was he. It is true, though he were not King Edward's Son, yet he was his Godson; and might perhaps have in him some bafe blood of the House of York. This Perkin Warbeck, (for so was the youths name, called Perkin, as a diminutive of Peter) when he so-perfectly had learned his Jeftion, that he was fit to come upon the Stage; he sent him into Portugal, that coming 1 from a strange Country, it might be thought, he had been driven to wander from one Country to another, for safeguard of his life, at least that the of all other might not be suspected. From Portugal she caused him to pass into Ireland, where the House of York was specially suspected, in respect of the great love which Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the fourth, had won amongst them; by reason whereof, this Perkins as esteemed his Grand-childe, was well entertained by them, and held in great estimation. He had not been long in Ireland, the French King sent for him; for being at that time at variance with King Henry, he thought he might make good use of Perkins, as a pretender against King Henry for the Crown. Perkins being come to Paris, was entertained in a princely fashion; and for his more honour, had a guard assigned himover which the Lord Congested was Captain; He had not been long at Paris, when there reformed to him Sir George Neville Balfard, Sir John Tyler, Richard Robinson, and about a hundred other English. Amongst the rest, one Stephen Fryen, that had been King Henry's Secretary for the French Tongue; but discontented, fled, and became a chief Instrument in Perkins's proceedings. But this flour of Perkins lasted not long; for as soon as Peace was concluded between the two Kings, the King of France dismissed Perkins, and would keep him no longer. Then passed he secretly to his first foundress, the Lady Margaret, who at his first coming, had thought of supplanting him to be Chief Countersfeit: but causing him in great assembles to be brought before her, as though the had never seen him before; and finding him to answer directly to all questions she put unto him: the openly professed, that she was now satisfied, and thought him verily to be her true Nephew, and thereupon assigned a Guard of thirty persons, clothed in Murrey and Blue, and called him the White Rofe of England. Upon report hereof many in England were inclined to take his part; and Sir Robert Clifford, and Robert Barsley were sent into Flanders, to acquaint the Dutch with the peoples respect to Perkins: and indeed Sir Robert Clifford upon sight and conference with him, wrote Letters into England, wherein he affirmed, that he knew him to be the true Son of King Edward, by his face, and other Linements of his body. King Henry hearing of these things, sent certain epilplets into the same King: which in the first instance, fled to Perkins, and by that means the better search out who were of the Conspiracy with him. Whose names being returned unto the King, he caufed them to be apprehended and brought to his presence: the chief of whom were John Ratcliff, Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Monford, and Sir Thomas Thynneys Knights, William Dawbery, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Creffny, and Thomas Aftwood: Also certain Priests, William Richford D. of Divinity, Thomas Boys, D. William Sutton, William Wesly, Dean of Pauls Robert Layern and Richard Lifley,of whom some hearing of it, fled to Sanctuary; others were taken and condemned, as Sir Simon Monford, Robert Ratcliff, and William Dawbery, who were all three behelden. The Lord Lord Fitzwater pardoned of life, was conveyed to Callice, and there laid in hold; where seeking to make escape by corrupting his Keeper, he left his head. Shortly after, Sir Robert Clifford, returning out of Flanders, (not as some think, sent a slip from the beginning, but rather now at last, either disaffuming the fraud, or won by rewards) submitted himself to the Kings mercy; discovering unto him as far as he knew, all that were either open or secret abettors of the Conspiracy; amongst whom, he accused Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain: his accusation being confirmed, Sir William was on a commission between them, Sir William had said, that if he had not been known, that the young man named Perkins were the Son of King Edward the fourth, he would never fight nor bear Arms against him. These words being confidered of by the Judges, seem ed to express a tickle hold of Loyalty; for who could tell how soon he might be perswaded that he knew it? and upon the matter was to be disloyal to King Henry; but for want of better: and withal it struck upon a string, which had always founded harsh in King Henry's ears, as preferring the Title of York before that of Lancaster. Sir William being hereupon arraigned; whether trusting to the greatness of his favours, or the smallnes of his faults, denied little of that wherewith he was charged, and upon confession was adjudged to die; and accordingly on the sixteenth day of February was brought to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded; after whose death, Giles Lord Darby was made Lord Chamberlain. This was that Sir William Stanley, who came in to rescue the Earl of Richmond, when he was in danger of his life, who fet the Crown upon his head: and was the cause of his being faint ed King: And could it enter into his breast, to put him to death, that had faved his life and done him so many great services besides? But it may be said, It was not the Earl of Richmond that did it, but the King of England: for certainly, in many cases, a King is not at liberty to the mercy, so much as a private man may. Though there be that affirm, the cause of his death was not words only, but real acts, as giving aid to Perkins underhand by money. And it seems there was some conflict in the minde of King Henry, what he should do in this case; for he stayed six weeks after his Accusat, before he brought him to his Arraignment. However it was, the summer following, the King went from Engledo to Lathem, to the Earl of Derby, who had married his Mother, and was brother to Sir William Stanley: perhaps to congratulate his own fatety; perhaps to conci dely with him his Brothers death; but certainly to keep the Earl from conceiving any finister opinion of him: For to think that Sir William's being to be Earl of Chester, (an Honour appointed to the Kings Son) or his great wealth, (for he left in his Castle at Hol, in ready money forty thousand Marks, besides Plate and Jewels) were causes that procured or set forward his death; are considerations very unworthy of fo just a Prince, against a servant of fo great despairing. But in this mean while Perkins having gotten a power of idle loose fellows, took to
The Reign of King Henry the Seventh.

The King of Scots in Perkin's quarrel enters and spoils Northumberland.

A Commotion in Cornwall by the Infraduction of Thomas Flammeck, a Lawyer, and Michael Jephthab Smith.

Sea, intending to land in Kent; where, though he were repelled, yet some of his Soldiers would needs venture to go on Land, of whom a hundred and sixty per sons were taken prisoners, whereas of five were Captains; Mortford, Carbic, Whitehalls, Qnatinon, and Gemyns. The hundred and fifty per sons were brought to London, railed in Ropes, like Horfes drawing in a Cart, who upon the Arraignment, confessing their offence, were executed, some at London, and fome in Towns adjoining to the Sea. Perkin finding no entertainment in Kent, failed into Ireland, and having stayed there while, and finding them alfo, being a naked people, to be no competent afliftants for him, from thence he failed into Scotland, where he fo moved the King of Scots with his fair words and colourable pretences, (made no doubt before by the Dutchefs of Burgogny) that he received him in great hate, and caufed him to be called the Duke of York; and to perfwade the world, that he thought him so indeed, he gave him in marriage the Lady Katherine Gourdon, Daughter to Alexander Earl of Huntingly, his own near Kinwoman; and foon after, in Perkin's quarrel, entered with a pifant Army into England, making Proclamation, that whofeover would come in and aid the true Duke of York, fould be fpared; but none coming in, he then used all kinds of cruelty, and the whole County of Northumberland was in a manner walled, whereas Perkin at his return, expresfed much grief, faying, It grieffed him to the heart, to fee fuch havoc made of his people: To whom the King anwered, Alas, alas, you take care for them, who for any thing that appears are none of yours; for not one of the Country came in to his Succour. King Henry, inccined with this bold attempt of the King of Scots, called his High Court of Parliament, acquainting them with the necelfity he had of a prefent War to revenge his indignity offered him by the Scots; and thereupon, requiring their aid by money, had a Subfidy of fix confiderable thousand pounds readily granted him; and then in all halfe a pifant Army is provided, and under the conduct of the Lord Daverny, fent into Scotland; but before he arrived there, he was suddenly called back by reafon of a commotion begun at Cornwall, for payment of the Subfidy lately granted, though it were not great, yet they grudged to pay it. The Ring-leaders of this Commotion were Thomas Flammeck a Gentleman learned in the Laws, and Michael Jephthab Smith, who laying the blame blame of this effection upon John Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Reynold Bray, as being chief of the Kings Council, exhorted the people to take up Arms; and having assembled an Army, they went to Taunton, where they flew the Provost Peron, one of the Commiffioners for the Subfidy, and from thence came to Wells, intending to go to London, where the King then lay, who having revoc'd the Lord Daverny, appointed Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey (after the death of the Lord Dinhum) made Lord Treasurer of England) to have an eye to the Scots, and if they made invasion, to reft them. In the mean time James Twichet Lord Audley confederated himself with the Re- leaders, who from Wells went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and fo to Kent, hoping there to have great aid; but found none; for the Earl of Kent, the Lord Albemarle, John Brook, Lord Cobham, Sir Edmund Poyning, Sir Richard Quifold, Sir Thomas Beauchief, John Peakey, and William Sew, were ready in Arms to receive them; whereupon the Rebels brought their Black-battle, four miles distant from London, and there they fett on the top of a hill encamped themselves; whereof the King had knowledge, he presently sent John Earl of Oxford, Henry Beauchief Earl of Liff, Edmund de la Peul Earl of Suffolk, Sir Ricm exp thomas and Sir Hansfrey Stanly to encamp the hill on all fides, that to all hope of flight might be taken from them; and then fet forward himfelf, and encamped in St. George's fields; where for encouragement he made divers Banneries. The next day he fent the Lord Daverny to fet upon the Rebels early in the morning, who firft got the Bridge at Dedford Strand, though strongly defended by the Rebels Archers, whose Arrows were reported to be full Cloth-yard in length; but notwithstanding, the Lord Daverny coming in with his company, and the Earl affailing them on every fide, they were foon overcome: In which conflict were flain of the Rebels above two thousand, taken prisoners a very great number, many of whom the King pardoned, but of the chief Authors none for the Lord Audley was drawn from Newgate to Tower-hill, in a Coat of his own Arms, paint- ed upon paper, reverfed and all torn; and there on the four and twentieth day of June was beheaded; Thomas Flammeck and Michael Joseph were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and their heads and quarters pitched upon stakes, fet up in London and other Places, of the King's Army were flain not above three hundred: It is memorable; with what comfort Joseph the Blacksmith cleared up himfelf at his going to execution, faying, That ye he hoped by this that his name and memory fhould be everlat- ing; so dear even to vulgar spirirs is perpe- tuity of Name, though joyned with infamy: what is it then to Noble Spirits, when it is joy- ned with Glory?

In the mean time the King of Scots, taking ad- vantage of these troubles in England, invaded the Frontiers, forraaped the Bisipromp of Durham, and at laft befieged the City of Norham, whereof Richard Fox then Bishop of Durham was owner: who thereupon fent prefently to the Earl of Surrey, acquifiting him with this: Infeation: Whereupon the Earl, taking with him Ralph Earl of Wemasland, Thomas Lord Barnes, Ralph Lord Nevil, George Lord Strange, many other Lords and Knights, and an Army of little left then twenty thousand men; besides a Navy, whereof the Lord Brook was Admiral, fet forward againft the Scots, and not only forced the Scots to raife the fiege of Norham Caflle; but followed them also into Scotland where he overthrew and deftroyed the Castle at Callimfrair, the Tower of Heten-hill, the Tower of Edington, the Tower of Fulden, and at laft by competition took the strong Caflle of Heyton, and rafed it to the ground.

1496. The King of Scot invades the Frontiers, but is repelled.
At the Earls being at Hopton, the King of Scots sent to him Marchmont and another Herald, requiring him at his Election, either to fight with him with their whole Armies, or else they two to fight with him in single combat; upon condition, that if the victory fell to the Scottish King, the Earl should deliver for his Ransom the Town of Berwick: Whereunto the Earl made answer, that the Town of Berwick was the King his Mistress, and therefore not for him to dispose of; but for his offer of single Combat, he willingly accepted it, and thought himself highly honoured by such a match: But King James of Scotland had no meaning to perform either one or other, but privately in the night fled back into Scotland, and then the Earl returned to Berwick. In the mean time, one Peter Hylaes, a man of great learning and policy, was sent Ambassadour to the King of Scots, from the King of Spain, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings of England and Scotland; who finding the King of Scots conformable to his motion, found after the King of England (who was never averse from Peace upon honourable conditions) no less inclining to: and so a Truce was concluded for certain years; upon condition, that Perkins Warbeck should be sent out of the Scottish Dominions.

About this time the Lord Complayner, and others sent from Philip Archdale of Auffria, and Duke of Burgundy, came to King Henry for a conclusion of Amytis, and to procure the English Merchants return again to his Country: for being Henry of Burgundy before, upon displeasure with the Flemings, but specially with the Lady Margaret, for asserting Perkins Warbeck, not only had banished all Flemish Wares and Merchandizes out of his Dominions, but had also restrained all English Merchants from having any Traffick in any of their Territories, cutting the Mars for all English Commodities to be kept at Calais: but now, upon this invitation, and having found it had been a great hindrance to his own Merchant-Adventurers, and therupon some Intimations had risen, he willingly condescended to their request, and so the English rejoined again to the Archdales Dominions, and were received into Antwerp with general Proclamation; so glad was that Town of the English mens returns.

In the eleventh year of this Kings Reign, died Civicly Dutches of York, Mother to King Edward the Fourth, at her Castle of Berkmestaid, being of extremage age; she had lived two years next to theTY of her Body Crowned, and four Murthered: she was buried at Sherbingham by her Husband.

Shortly after the Truce concluded between England and Scotland, Perkins Warbeck was commanded to depart out of the Scottish Dominions: who thereupon with his Wife and Family failed into Ireland: where understanding that the Corish men were ready to renew the War again, he thought best not to let pas for so an occasion; and thereupon, having with him four small Ships, and nor above tixscore men, he failed into Cornwall, and there landed in the month of September, and came to a Town called Bodmin: where with fair words and large promi-for making enquiry of the Offenders, and for affailing their Fines, which they did with great severity to some, with great mildness to others, to all with equity.

It was now the fourteenth year of the Kings Reign, when one Sebastian Gobato, a Genoese Son, born at Brissow, persuaded the King to man and Victual a Ship at Brissow, to search for an Island, which (he said) he knew to be replenished with rich Commodities, who letting forth with three other small Ships of London Merchant, was drowned home two years after, when he had made a large discovery Westward, and would have gone to Cataia, if the Mariners had not forced him to return; as likewise six years before, one Christopher Columbus a Spaniard, made the first discovery of America.

Perkins being in the Tower and carefully guarded, yet found means to escape, and fled to the Priory of Sheen near Richmond, where discovering himself to the Prior of that Monastery, he begged of him for Gods sake, to get the Kings Pardon for his life, which the Prior effectuated: but then was Perkins brought to the Court at Westminster, and was one day fettered in a pair of Stocks before Westminster-Hall, and there stood a whole day; the next day he was set upon a like Scaffold in Cheape-Street, and there standing the whole day alfo, he then read openly his Confession, written with his own hand, wherein he declared his Parentage, and the place of his Birth, and all the passages of his Life, and by what means he was drawn to make this attempt. After this, he was committed again to the Tower, and care taken that he should be better looked to than he was before. But all the care notwithstanding once again Perkins attempted to escape, and drawing into a Confederacy with him the young Earl of Warwicke; by fair words and large promises so corrupted his Keepers, Strangways, Blewets, Affwood, and Long Roper, Servants to Sir John Digby Lieutenant of the Tower, that they intended to have slain their Matter, and set Perkins and the Earl of Warwicke at liberty: But this practice was soon discovered, so that Perkins and John a water, sometime Mayor of Cork in Ireland, one of Perkins chief Founders, were on the sixteenth day of November arraigned at Westminster and condemned, and both of them on the two and twentieth day were drawn to Tyburn and there hanged; and Perkins took upon his death, that the Confession on he had formerly made was true: soon after also Blewet and Affwood, two of the Lieutenants men, were in the same place executed. On the one and twentieth day of the same month, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwicke was arraigned at Westminster before the Earl of Oxford, then High Steward of England; not for conferring to break Prison, but for conspiring with Perkins to raise Sedition, and destroy the King: and, upon his confession, bad Judgement, and on the eight and twentieth day of the same month, in the year 1499, was brought to the Scaffold on the Towerhill, and there beheaded. This Earl of Warwicke was the eldest Son of the Duke of Clarence, and was the last Heir-male of the name of Plantagenet, and had been kept in the Tower from his infancy out of all company of Men and fight of Beasts; so as he scarcely knew a Hen from a Goose, nor one Blast from another; and therefore could never know how to practice his escape of himself, but by Perkins Constabulary: for which cause the King fa- voured him so far, that he was not buried in the Tower, but at Baffman by his Auncles. And thus ended the designs of Perkins Warwick, which had troubled both the Kingdom and the King, the space of seven or eight years, a great part of the Reign of King Henry the Seventh.

But in the time of Perkins being in the Tower, another like practice was set on foot; for an Anglican Friar called Patrick, in the County of Suffolk, having a Scholar named Ralph Wiford, a Cordwainers Son, he caunited him to take upon him to be the Earl of Warwick, lately by great chance gotten out of the Tower; and they going together into Kent, when the Friar perceived some light credit to be given to him, he then stuck not to declare it openly in the Pulpis, defiring all men to assist him. But this practice was soon discovered, and both the Master and the Scholars were apprehended and arraigned; the Scholar Wiford was hanged on Shrove-tuesday at S. Thomas Watting, and the Friar was condemned to perpetual Prison for at that time to much reverence was attributed to Holy Orders, that a Priest of such proportion against the King, yet had his life spared: and this practice was some cause to exasperate the King against the Earl of Warwick, who though innocent in himself, yet was noot in pretenders: and besides King Ferdinand of Spain, with whom at this time there was a Treaty for marriage of his Daughter to Prince Arthur, had written to the King in plain terms, that he gave no assurance of his Sons affection, as long as the Earl of Warwicke lived; and thus all things unfortunately concurred to bring this innocent Prince to his end.

In the fifteenth year of his Reign, partly to avoid the danger of the Plague, then reigning in England; but chiefly to confer with the Duke of Burgoyne about many important business: the King and Queen failed over to Colicic, where at an interview between them and the Duke, at St. Peter's Church without Colicic, the Duke offered to hold the Kings Surrump at his alighting, which the King by no means would permit, but depending from Horse-back, they embraced with great affection: and after Communication between them, the King and Queen in the end of June returned into England.

In his feventeenth year, two great Marriages were solemnized: the Lady Katherine of Spains was sent by her Father King Ferdinand, with a perfect Armament of Ships into England; where she arrived at Plimoth, the second day of October; and, on the fourteenth of November after, was espoused openly to Prince Arthur, both being clad in white: he of the age of fifteen years, she of eighteen: at night they were laid together in one Bed, where they lay as Man and Wife all that night: when morning appeared, the Prince (as his Servants about him reported) called for drink, which before he had not used to do: whereas one of his Chamberlaines asking him the cause, he answered merrily, saying, I have been this night in the midst of Spains, which is a hot Country, and that that makes me so dry: though some write, that a grave Marron was laid in Bed between them, to hinder actual Consummation. The Ladies portion was two hundred thousand Duckers; her joynture the third part of the Principality of Holmby, Caflle and Cheyter. At this Marriage was great solemnity and Royal Jultings: during which time there came into London an Earl, a Bishops, and divers other Noble Perfons, sent from the King of Scots for a conclusion of Marriage (before treated of) between the Lady Margaret, the Kings eldest Daughter, and him; where the Earl, by Proxy in the name of King James his Master, affinced and contrated the said Lady, which Contract was published at Pauls Crofs, the day of the Conversion of Saint Paul; for joy whereof, Te Deum was sung, and great fires were made through the City of London; and it such joy were made when the march was made, what joy shoulde be made now at the issue of the March, when by the Union of those persons is made an Union of these Kingdoms; and England and Scotland are but one great Britain? The Ladies portion was ten thousand pounds, her joynture two thousand pounds a year, after King, and in present one thousand. When this March was propounded at the Council Table, some Lords opposed it; obferving, that by this means the Crown of England might happen to come to the Scotch Nation. To which King Henry answered, What if it should? It would not be an accession of England to Scotland, but of Scotland to England: and this answer of the King passed for an Oracle: and so the March proceeded, and in Auguft following was conffimuated at Edinburgh, and the conducted thither in great flate by the Earl of Northumberland.

Prince Arthur after his marriage, was fent again into Wales, to keep that Countrie in good order; to whom were appointed for Counfellers, Sir Richard Pool his Kinfman and chief Chamberlaine, Sir Henry Vermyn, Sir Richard Crofs, Sir David Philips, Sir William Old, Sir Thomas Engelfield, Sir Peter Marten, John Waite, Henry Marten, and Doctor William Smith President of his Council; but within five months, his marriage, at his Castle at Ludio, he deceafed, and with great folemnity was buried at the Cathedral Church at Worcester. His Brother Henry Duke of York was stayed from the Title of Prince of Wales, the space of half a year, till to women it might appear, whether the Lady Katherine, the Relat of Prince Arthur, was with childe or no. The towardlines in learning of this Prince Arthur is very memorable; who dyeing before the age of feventeen years, was faid to have read over all or most of the Latin Authors, besides many other.

And now prince Arthur being dead, and the Lady Katherine of Spain left a young Widow; King Henry lath to part with her Dowry, but Catly being defirous to continue the Alliance with Spain; prevailed with his other Prince, though with some refufition, fuch as could be in thefe years (for he was scarce twelve years of age) to be contrated with the Princes Katherine his Brothers Widow; for which marriage, a fepifation, by advice of the moft learned men at that time in Christendom, was by Pope furmifh the fecond granted, and on the five and twentieth day of June, in the Bishop of Salisbury'shoule in Flet-ntrt, the marriage was folemnized.

But before thefe time Edmund de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, Son to John Duke of Suffolk and Lady Elizabeth Sister to King Edward the fourth, had in his fury killed a mean perfon, and was thereupon indicted of Merchur; for which although he had the Kings Pardon, yet because he was brought to the Kings Bench-Bar, and there arraigned, he took it for so great a blemiff to his Honour, that in great rage he fled into Flanders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret; where having stayed a while, when his passion was over, he returned again. But after the marriage between Prince Arthur and the Lady Katherine, whether it were that in that folemnity he had run himself in debt, or whethcr he were drawn to do fo by the Lady Margaret, he passed over the fecound time, with his Brother Richard into Flanders. This put the King into fome doubt of his intention; whereupon he hath recourfe to his utifal courfe in fuch cafes, and sent Sir Robert Conyn Captain of Hamn, to difcover the truth, to learn the depth of their intentions: And to take away all fuppfion of his employment, the first Sunday of November, he caufed the faid Earl and Sir Robert Conyn, with five others, to be accuses openly at Pauls Crofs, as enemies to him and his Realm.

In conclusion, Sir Robert Conyn acquainted the King with divers of that faction; amongst whom, William Lord Courtry, and William de la Pole, Brother to the forefaid Earl of Suffolk, who were taken but upon fuppfion, yet held long in Prifon but Sir James Tyrrell (the fame that had murdered the two young Princes in the Tower) and Sir John Wifham, who were proved to be Traytors, were accordingly that, and on the fith day of May at the Tower-hill beheaded. Whereof when the Earl heard, despairing now of any good fuccefs, he was wandering about the Country, Sifting finding no succour, he submitted himfelf at last to Philip Duke of Austria, by whom afterward he was delivered to King Henry, by this occasion; Ferdinand King of Aragon, by his Wife Isabella Queen of Cafille, had only two Daughters, the eldest whereof named Jane, was married to this Philip Duke of Austria; the youngerr named Katharine to Arthur Prince of England: and now Queen Isabella being lately dead, by whose death the Kingdom of Cafille defended in Right of his Wife, to this Duke Philip; they were failled out of Germany into Spain, to take pofiefion of the Kingdom; but by tempeft and contrary wifdes were driven upon the Coast of England, and landed at Yewmouth in Dorsetshire; where deliring to refresh themselves a little on shore, they were invited by Sir Thomas Trenthard (a principal Knight in that Country) to his house, who presently fent word to the King of their arrival. King Henry glad to have his Court honoured by fo great a Prince, and perhaps upon hope of a courtesie from him, which afterward he obtained; fent presently the Earl of Arundel to wait upon him, till himself might fol; follow; and the Earl went to him in great magnificence, with a gallant troop of three hundred horse, and for more state came to him by Torch-light. Upon whose Majestie, though King Philip had many reasons of hate on his journey; yet not to give King Henry diffidence, and withal to give this Queene a comfort of seeing the Lord Katherine his Sitter; he sent upon speed to the Queen at Windsor, while her Queen followed by exili journeys. After great magnificence of entertainment, King Henry taking a fit opportunity, and drawing the King of Caffie into a room, where they two only were private, and laying his hand civilly upon his arm, said unto him, Sir, you have been fasten upon my Coast; I hope you will not suffer me to wax upon yours. The King of Caffie asking him what he meant by that speech? I mean it (said the King) by that hare-brain'd fellow the Earl of Suffolk; who being my Subject, is protected in your Country, and begins to play the fool when all others are weary of it. The King of Caffie answered; I had thought, Sir, your felicity had been above those thoughts; but if it trouble you, I will banish him. King Henry replied, that his defire was, that the said gentlemen should be delivered to him; with the King of Caffie a little confudted and said, That can I not do with my Honour: Well then (said the King) the matter is at an end: as left the King of Caffie, who held King Henry in great estimation, composing his countenance, said, Sir, you shall have him; but upon your Honour, you shall not take his life. I promisse it upon your Honour, said King Henry; and he kept his promise, for he was not put to death during all his Reign; but yet he took such order, that in the Reign of his Son King Henry the Eighth, he had his head cut off. During the King of Caffie being here, a Treaty was concluded and bears date at Windsor; which the Fleming term Incontrovertible main, for that the free Fishing of the Dutch upon the Coasts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Uvedemus, was not by his Treaty confirmed, as all other Articles were. And now when King Henry had received the King of Caffie into the Fraternity of the Garter, and had his Son Prince Henry admitted to the Order of the Goldene-fleece; and that the Earl of Suffellke was brought over and committed to the Tower, the King of Caffie departed home.

In this Kings time were two Calls of Serjeants at Law; one in his eleventh year, in which were called nine Serjeants, Mordant, Higham, Kingsfoule, Constable, Butler, Tacyly, Frouck, OXenbridge, and Confable; who kept their Feast at the Bishop of Ely's Palace in Hol-burn, where the King, the Queen, and all the chief Lords dined. The other Call in his twentihethyear, in which were called eleven Serjeants, Robert Bradell, William Gowrell, Thomas Maron, George Edger, Lewis Pollard, Guy Palmes, and William Fairfax, who kept their Feast at the Archbishops House in Lambeth.

King Henry having gotten as much honour as the esteemment of neighbouring Princes could give him, began now to be intensive to getting of wealth; wherein he quickly found Instruments fit for his purpose, but especially two, torney must speak with you about it. And it is part of the Report, that it cost the Earl for a composition, fifteen thousand Marks. And to show further the King's extreme diligence: I remember (faith Sir Francis Bacon, Lord of Verulam in his History) to have seen long since a Book of accounts of Empson, that had the Kings hand almost to every leaf, by way of singing: and was in some places polluted in the Margaret with the Kings own hand likewise, where was this remembrance:—

Item, received of such a one five Marks for the Pardon to be procured, and if the Pardon do not pass, the money to be repaid, except the Party be some other was satisfied.

And over against this Memorandum (of the Kings own hand) Otherwise faithful. This (faith he) I do the rather mention, because it shews in the King a carnesse, but yet with a kind of junfrus.

In his three and twentieth year, there was a sharp prosecution against Sir William Capel, now the second time, for mis-government in his majorly: The great matter was, that in some payments he had taken notice of false monies, and did not his diligence to examine who were the Offenders: for which, and some other things laid to his charge, he was two thousand pounds, whereas, being a man of honest, he refused to pay a farthing; and thereupon was sent to the Tower, where he remained until the Kings death. Kneiforth, likewise, that had been lately Mayor of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for abuses in their Offices question'd and imprisoned, and not delivered but upon payment of one thousand four hundred pounds, Sir Lawrence Almier, who had likewise been Mayor of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of one thousand pounds; and Sir Lawrence for refusing to pay it, was committed to prison, where he stayed till Empson himself was committed in his place. By these courses he accumulated to great store of Treasure, that he left at his death, most of it in secret places, under his own key, and keeping at Richmond (as is reported) the sum of near 18,000 hundred thousand pounds and more. But though by this course he preserved to the King's estate, yet by it he lost the great treasure (the peoples hearts) but that he something qualified it by his last Testament, commanding that Restitution should be made of all such monies as had unjustly been levied by his Officers.

It seems King Henry, after the death of his Queen the Lady Elizabeth, had an inclination to marry again; and hearing of the great beauty and vertue of the young Queen of Naples, the Widow of Ferdinand the younger; he sent three confident persons, Francis Martin, James Braybrook, and John Stile, to make two inquiries; one of her person and conditions, the other of her estate: Who returning their answer, that they found her Beauty and Vertue to be great, but her Estate to be only a certain Pension or Exhibition, and not the Kingdom of Naples, as he expected: he then gave over any further meditating in that matter. After this, another Treaty of marrying was brought to the King, betwixt him and the Lady Margaret Dutches Dowager of Savoy, only daughter to Maximilian, and Siller to the King of Caffel; a Lady wife and of great fame: In which business was employed, for his first piece, the Kings then Chaplain, and after, the great Prelate, Thomas Wooley. It was in the end concluded, with ample conditions for the King, but with the promise de Futuro only, Which marriage was procrastated from time to time, in respect of the incontinence of the King: which held him by firs till he died.

He left Executors, Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, Richard Fitz-James, Bishop of London, Thomas Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Worcester, John Knight, Thomas Duke of Norfolk and Treasurer of England, Edward Earl of Wessex and Lord Chamberlain, John F. Knight, chief Justice of the King's Bench, and Robert R. Knight, chief Justice of the Common Pleas. A little before his death, he had concluded a Marriage (in which negotiation Fox Bishop of Winchester was employed) between his younger Daughter the Lady Mary, of the age of ten years, and Charles King of Caffile, not much elder: but though concluded, yet not solemnized; and she was afterward married to Lewis the French King.

Of his Taxations.

In his third year, there was by Parliament granted toward the maintaining an Army in Britain, that every man should pay the tenth penny of his Goods: which Tax thought at first withfidd in Yorkshire and Durham, yet was afterward levied to the uttermost. In his seventh year, towards his Wars in France, a Benevolence was by Parliament granted, by which great summes of money were collected of the richer fort only. In his eleventh year, a Subsidy of sixfirc hundred pounds was granted him by Parliament, towards his Wars with Scotland, which came afterward the infurrection in Cornwall. In his ninthteenth year a Subsidy was granted him by Parliament. In his one and twentieth year, he raised great summes of money from Offenders against Penal Statutes: the greater, but the unjustly way for raising of money, that ever any King of England used; and not consent with this, he required, and had at the same's benevolence both from the King of Caffel, and the Little Duke, that every man should pay Richard Fox, then Bishop of Winchester; who attending the Clergy before him, exhorted them to be liberal in their contribution: but the Clergy being of two sorts, rich and poor, made each of them several excuses: The rich and such as had great livings, said, they were at great charges in keeping Hospitality, and maintaining their Families; and therefore desir'd to be spared. The poor sort alleged, that their means were small, and scarce able to find out necessaries, and therefore desir'd to be born. But the Bishop answered them both with a pretty Dilemma, saying to the rich, It is true, you live at great charges in Hospitality, in apparel, and other demonstrations of your wealth; and seeing you have more to spend in that order, there is no reason but for your Princes service you should do it much more, and therefore you must pay. To the poorer sort he said, though your lives be small, yet your frugality and economy, and you spend not in haute-keeping and apparel as others do; therefore be content for yourselfly.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

This King was the first that ordained a company of tall strong men (naming them Yeomen of the Guard) to attending about the person of the King; to whom he appointed a Librariy by which to be known, and a Captain by whom to be chosen. In his time the authority of the Star-Chamber, which fitted before by the Common Laws of the Realm, was confirmed in certain cases by Act of Parliament. In his time were made these excellent general Laws: One, that from thenceforth fines should be final, and conclude all straggers rights: Another for admission of poor pursuors, In forma pauperis, without paying Fee to Counsellor, Attorney, or Clerk. Another, that no person that did afflict by Arms or otherwise the King for the time being, should after be Impeached thereof, or Attained either by course of the Law, or by Act of Parliament; and that if any such Act of Attainer did happen to be made, it should be void, and of none effect. Another for the Benevolence, to make the summes which any had agreed to pay, and were not brought in, to be leviable by course of Law. Another, that Murtherers should be burnt on the Brawn of the left hand, with the Letter M. and Thieves with the Letter T. so that if they offended the second time, they should have no mercy, but he put to death and this to reach also to Clerks Convicted. In his fifth year, it was ordained by Parliament, that the Mayors of London should have Confravation of the River of Thames, from the Bridge of Stanns to the waters of Thames and Medway. In his seventeenth John Shaw Mayor of London caufed his Brethren the Aldermen to ride from the Guild-hall to the water side when he went to Westminster to be presented in the Exchequer: he also caufed the Kitchens and other houses of Office to be built at the Guild-hall; where since that time the Mayors Fealt hath been kept, which before had been in the Grocers or Taylors Hall. In his eighteenth year King Henry being himself a Brother of the Taylors Company, as divers Kings before had been, namely, Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henry the sixth, Henry the eldest, Henry the fourth, and Richard the second, also of Dukes 11, Earls 28, Lords 48, he now gave to them the Name and Title of Merchant Taylors, as a name of worship to endure for ever:

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In the tenth year of his Reign, John Bough toon, Widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certain opinions of John Wickliffe. In his seventh year, King Henry, finding great inconvenienc by the privilege of Sanctuaries, wrote to Pope Alexander, deliring him by his authority, to adjudge all English men being fled to Sanctuary for the offence of Treson, to be enemies to the Christian Faith; and co prohbit the privilege of Sanctuary to all such as had enjoyed it before: which request the Pope granted, to the great contentment of the King, and quiet of the Realm. In his sixteenth year, being the year 1500, a Jubliee in Rome was celebrated; whereof Alexander the then Pope, by his Minister Gasper Pons a Spaniard, gave notice to the King, offering withal, that those who would come to Rome, should notwithstanding at a certain price have Pardons, and as full a benefit of the Jubliee, as if they came; and to the end the King should not Sunder his purpose, both offered part of his gains to the Pope, and also promised to bellow it upon a War against the Turk; by which course he gathered great summes, for which he had other use than to spend it to idely. In the two and twentieth year of this King, Pope Alexander the sixth died of Poyfon, by this accident: He went to supper in a Vineyard near the Vatican, where his Son Valentine meaning to poyson Adrian Cardinal of Cornetta, sent thither certain flagons of Wine infected with Poyfon, and delivered them to a servante of his, who knew nothing of the matter; commanding him, that none should touch them, but by his appointment: It happened, the Pope coming in something before supper, and being very dry through the immoderate heat of the season, called for one of his own provision being not yet come: The servante that had the poiuned Wine in keeping, thinking it to be committed to him as a special Wine, brought of it to the Pope; and while he was drinking, his Son Valentine came in, and drank also of the same; whereby they were both poiyned; but the Pope only overcome of the Poyson, died: his Son by the strength of youth bare it outstong with long languishing.

another at Newcastle, and a third at Southampton. And drawing near his end, he did these works of Charity: He granted a general Pardon to all men, for any offence committed against any of his Laws, Thieves, and Murderers only excepted: He paid also all Fees of all Prisoners in all Goals in and about London, abiding there for that cause only: He paid also the Debts of all such persons as lay in the Counters or Ludgate for forty shillings or under, and some also for ten pounds. In his eighteenth year, the Chappel of our Lady, above the East-side of the High Altar at Westminster Church, with a Tavern called the White-Rose near adjoining, was taken down, in which place a most beautiful Chappel was then prefently begun to be built by King Henry; the charges whereof amounted to the summe of fourteen thousand pounds (as Stow witnesseth.) In his second year, the great Conduit in Cheshiefe at the charges of Thomas Alcoider of London, was new made; and the Crofs also in Cheshiefe was new built; towards the charges whereof Thomas Fisher Mercer gave five hundred Marks. In his fourteenth year, the Conduit in Greatfrecia was begun to be built by the Executors of Sir Thomas Hil Grocer, late Mayor of London. Also this year, Hugh Clapton Mayor of London, builded the great Bridge of Stratford upon Avon; as likewise a fair Chappel towards the South-end of that Town; and near unto the same, a pretty house of Brick and Timber, where he lay and ended his life: He gazed also the Chancel of the Parish Church in that Town; and made a way of four miles long, three miles from Albury towards London, and one mile beyond Albury. In his tenth year, John Tate Mayor of London, builded the Church of St. Anthonies with a Free-School, and certain Alm-houses for poor men. In his time his Mother the Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond built two Colledges in Cambridge, one called Chriftis Colledge, the other St. John's; and endowed them with large Poffeffions, for the maintenance of Learning. Edward Bishop of Winchester, founded Corpus Chrifti Colledge in Oxford, and William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, Bracon's Colledge: He also built at Lichfield an Hospital, for a Master, two Priests, and ten poor men; as likewise a Free-School, with a School-Master, and an Ufher. Anne Aveling gave an hundred Marks towards the building of the Church in Ciefter. In his time also John Alcock Bishop of Ely, builded Jesus Colledge in Cambridge: and in his two and twentieth year Theobald Mayour of London builded the Conduit at Bishopfgate at his own charge; and gave to the Fifhmongers certain Tenements; for which they are bound to allow to four Scholars, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, to each of them four pounds a year; also to poor people and Prisoners in Ludgate something yearly. In his twentieth year, Sir William Cafl-Mayor of London, caused all Hunsftedch to be paved over; which till that time, had lien very noxiously to all travellers that way. In his fortieth year, all the Gardens without Margate (which had continued time out of minde) were destroyed, and of them was made a plain Field, for Archers to shoot in. In this Kings time also, Thomas Savage Archbishop of York, repaired the Castle of Carloue, and the Manor of Sroby, and founded the Chappel at Mulesfield in Chesire, where he was born. Also in his time Sir Stephen Gunning Mayor of London, founded a Free Grammar School at Wolverhampton in Staffordshire, where he was born; and gave Lands sufficient for a Master and an Ufher, leaving the oversight to the Merchant Taylors in London. This Town of Wolverhampton, commonly called, is originally and rightly called Whiffrane, or Whiffram, upon this occasion. The Town was anciely called Hampton, to which a noble Woman named Whiffrane, a Widow, for sometime Wife of Athelm Duke of Northampton, obtained of King Ethelred, to give lands to the Church there which she had founded; and thereupon the Town took the addition of the said Whiffrane. In this Kings time also John Colet Dean of Painsford, founded Pains School in the Church-yard there.

Casualties happening in his time.

In his first year, happened the Sicknes called the Sweating Sicknes, which though it continued not long, yet took away many thousands; and in his two and twentieth year, the like Sweating Sicknes happened again; but, by reason of Remedies found in the former, took away fewer.

In his second year Wheat was sold for three shillings the Quarter, Bay-falt at the like price.

In his seventh year Wheat was sold at London for twenty pence the Bushel, which was counted a great dearth. In his tenth year, Wheat was sold at London for six pence the Bushel, Bay-falt for three pence half-penny, Nantwich Shillings for six pence, white Herrings nine shillings the Barrel, red Herrings three shillings the Cade, red Sprats six pence the Cade, and Gafargon Wines for six pounds the Tun. In his fifteenth year Gafargon Wine was sold at London for forty shillings the Tun, a quarter of Wheat four shillings, and Bay-falt four pence the Bushel. The two and twentieth of August 1485, the very day that King Henry got the Victory of King Richard, a great fire was in Bread-freet in London, in which was burnt the Parfon of St. Mildred's, and one other man in the Parfonage there.

In his tenth year, in digging a new Foundation in the Church of St. Mary Hill in London, the body of Alice Blackway, which had been buried in the Church a hundred fifty years before, was found whole of skin, and the joints of her Arms pliable, which Corps was kept above ground four days, without annoyance, and then again buried.

In his twelfth year, on Bartholomew day, at the Town of St. Becks in Bedfordshire there fell Hail-stones that were measured eighteen Inches about.

A dead body found in a whole of skin above a hundred years after he was buried.

In his thirteenth year, on the one and twentieth of December, suddenly in the night broke out a fire in the Kings Lodgings, being then at his Manor of Sloen; by violence whereof a great part of the old Building was burnt, with Hangings, Beds, Apparel, Plate, and many Jewels. In his fifteenth year, the Town of Brabam in Nor Norfolk was burnt: also this year, a great Plague happened, whereof many people died in many places, but specially in London, where there died in that year thirty thousand.

In his twentieth year, Alum which for many years had been sold for six shillings a hundred, rose to five Nobles a hundred, and after to four Marks.

In his two and twentieth year the City of Norwich was well-near consumed with fire. Also in the same year, in July, Gallery new builded at Richmond, wherein the King and the Prince his Son had walked not an hour before, fell suddenly down, yet no man hurt.

The great Temple which drave King Philip into England, blew down the Golden Eagle from the Spire of Pauls; and in the fall, it fell upon a sign of the black Eagle, which was in Pauls Churchyard, in the place where the School-house now standeth; and battered it and brake it down. This the people interpreted to be an ominous Prognostick upon the Imperial House; as indeed it proved: for this King Philip being the Emperour Son, arriving in Spain, sickned soon after; and being but thirty years of age, deceased: upon whose decease his Wife Queen Anne, out of her tender love to him, fell distracted of her Wits.

Of his Wife and Children,

He married Elizabeth eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, being of the age of nineteen years; whom two years after his Marriage he caused to be Crowned: She lived his Wife eighteen years, and died in Childbed in the Temple of London, the eleventh of February, the very day in which she was born; and is buried at Westminster, in the magnificent Chappel and rich Monument of Copper and Gilt, which her Husband had erected. He had

by her three Sons and four Daughters: his eldest Son Arthur was born at Winchester, the twelfth day of September, in the second year of his Reign, and died at Ludwidge, at fifteen years old and a half: and of this short life some cause may be attributed to his Nativity, being born in the eighth month after conception: He was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Marie in Pariis; where he is buried, in the South-side of the Quire he lies entombed in Touch or Jet, without any remembrance of him by Picture. His second Son Henry was born at Greenwich in Kent, on the two and twentieth day of June, in the seventh year of his Fathers Reign; and succeeded him in the Kingdom. His third Son Edmund was born in the tenth year of his Fathers Reign, and died at five years of age, at Bishops Hatfield, and lies buried at St. Peters in Westminster. His eldest Daughter Margaret was born the ninth and twentieth day of November, in the fifth year of her Fathers Reign; and at fourteen years of age was married to James the fourth King of Scotland; unto whom the bare three Sons, James, the third, Arthur, and Alexander, and one Daughter, which three last died all of them young; and after the death of her Husband King James, (slain at Flodden-field in fight against the English) she was re-married to Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus, in the year 1514, to whom the bare Margaret, espoused to Matthew Earl of Lenox, Father of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine months, and lieth interred in the upper end of the Chancel in the Parish Church of Stepney near London: Her second Son was Henry Lord Darnley, reputed for Periagon the goodliest Gentleman of Europe; who married Mary Queen of Scotland, the Royal Parents of the most Royal Monarch James the first, King of Great Britain. Her third Son was Charles Earl of Lenox, Father to the Lady Arbeles. King Henry's second Daughter the Lady Elizabeth was born in the year 1492, at three years of age died, and was buried at Westminster; His third Daughter the Lady Mary had been promised to Charles King of Caliile; but was married to Lewis the twelfth, King of France; who dying three months after, she was then married to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk: His fourth Daughter, the Lady Katherine was born in the year 1503, in the eighteenth year of her Fathers Reign, and died an Infant.

He was of body lean and spare, yet of great strength; of stature somewhat higher than the common fort; his eyes gray, his hair thin, of a fair complexion, and pleasing countenance. Concerning his Conditions, he had in him the Browse of a Prince, and of a private man; affable, yet reserved. We might say he was Politick, if not rather that he was Wise: for though he used tricks of Cunning sometimes, yet solid Circumpection more. He loved not War, but in case of necessity; always Peace, but with conditions of Honour. Never any Prince was les addicted to bodily pleasures of any kind, than he. Three pleasures he had, but in three cafes; one for Satyry, another for Honour, and the third for Wealth; in all which he attained his end. His great respect of the Church was feen by his great employment of Church-men; for through the hands of Bishops Moron, Bishops Fox, and his Chaplain Uffewich, the greatest part of all his Negotiations passed. He was frugal from his Youth, not covetous, still affable and kindly: and therefore what defect he had in this kind, must be attributed to age and weakness. The City of London was a Paradise, for what good fortune forever befell him, he thought he enjoyed it nor, till he acquainted them with it. His Parliament was his Oracle; for in all matters of importance he would ask their advice; and he put his very Prerogative sometimes into their hands. He was no great lover of Women; yet all his great fortune both precedent and subsequent came by Women; his own Title to the Crown was by a Woman; his Confirmation in the Crown was by a Woman; his transmigration of the Crown to his Politery, was by a Woman: The first by the Lady Margaret, descended from John of Gaunt; the second by the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of King Edward the fourth; the third by the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of himself King of England, and married to James the Fourth, King of Scotland; by means whereof, as he was...
The Reign of King Henry the Seventh.

By Ben Jonson

The Prince that joyed the two Roes in one, for he was the Founder of joying the two Kingdoms in one. And lastly, it may be said of him as was said by one of Angius Caeftt, Ecter, qui quem promissi fapius amavit: For Cadwalader last King of the Britains seven hundred years before had prophesied of him; and of later time King Henry the sixth plainly foreshadowed him.

Of his Death and Burial.

In the twentie and twentieth year of his Reign, he began to be troubled with the Gout; but a defluxion also taking into his Breast, wafted his Lungs, so that thrice in a year, and specially in the Spring, he had great fits and labours of the Pulpick, which brought him to his end; at his Palace of Richmond, on the two and twentieth day of April in the year 1508. when he had lived two and fifty years, reigned three and twenty and eight months, being dead, and all things necessary for his Funeral prepared; his Corps was brought out of the Nor- chamber, into the great Chamber, where it rested three days; and every day there was a Dirge and Mafs sung by a Prelate, Mitered; and from thence it was conveyed into the Hall, where it remained also three days, and had a like service there; and so three days in the Chapel: Upon Wednesday the ninth of May, the Corps was put into a Chariot, and over the Corps was a picture of the late King, laid on Cushions of Gold; and the Picture was apparelled in the Kings rich Robes, with a Crown on the head, and a Ball and Scepter in the hands: when the Chariot was thus ordered, the Kings Chaplain and a great number of Prelates set forward, praying; then followed all the Kings Servants in Black; then followed the Charior, and over the Chariot nine Mourners, and on every side were carried torches, to the number of sixty; and in this order they came from Richmond to St. George's Field, where the corpse met with it all the Priests and Religious men within the City and without: The Mayor and Aldermen, with many Commoners, all clothed in Black, met with the Corps at London Bridge; and so the Chariot was brought throughout the City to the Cathedral of St. Paul, where the Body was taken out, and carried into the Chroy, and set under a goodly Hearse of Wax; where, after a solemn Mafs, was made a Sermon by the Bishop of Rochester: The next day the Corps in like manner was removed to Westminster; Sir Edward Howard bearing the Kings Banner. In Westminster was a curious Hearse full of Lights, which were lighted at the coming of the Corps; and then was the Corps taken out of the Chariot by six Lords, and set under the Hearse, which was double roiled: when the Mourners were set, Garter, King at Arms cried, For the soul of the Noble Prince Henry the seventh and late King of this Realm: The next day were three Masses solemnly sung by Bishops, and after the Masses was offered the Kings Banner and Courier; his Coat of Arms, his Sword, his Target, and his Helm, and at the end of the Mafs, the Mourners offered up rich Pall of Cloth of Gold and Bodkin: and when the Chrise sung Librums, the Body was put into the Earth; then the Lord Treasurer, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Kings Houfhold brake their Staves, and cast them into the Grave: Then Garter cried with a loud voice, Vive le Roy Henry le huitieme, Roy d' Angliëre & de France, sire d'Irlande: And thus ended the Funeral.

Of Men of Note in his time.

Of Men of Valour and Arms, they are to be seen in the History of this Kings Reign: For men of Letters in his time, of Foreigners were Santius Pagninus a great Hebrician; Leoncricus, Gattinaria, Celatius and Optatus, Physicians; Angius Niphius, Jacobus Faber, Stephanus and Pighius, Philosophers; Petrus Brandon, and the famous Clerk Renckin, who restored again the knowledge of the Hebrew Tongue. Of our own Country, there lived in his time, George Ripley a Carmelite Frier of Bofom, who wrote divers Treatises in the Mathematicks; and after his death was accounted a Necromancer; John Erghom born in York, a Black Frier, studious in Prophecies, as by the Title of the works he wrote may appear. Thomas Maclerie a Welfman, who wrote of King Arthur, and of the Round Table. John Royle born in Warwickshire, a diligent searcher of Antiquities, and wrote divers Treatises of Historical Argument: Thomas Scroop furnamed Bradley, of the Noble Family of the Scroops, entred into divers Orders of Religion, and after withdrew himself to his house, where for twenty years he lived the life of an Anchoret; and after, coming abroad again was made a Bishop in Ireland, and went to Roode in Amblaflage; from whence being returned, he went barefooted up and down in Norfolk, teaching the Ten Commandments, and lived till near a hundred and old, John Tomney, an Aughite Frier in Norvich, who wrote certain Rules of Grammar, and other things princed by Richard Pincon. Robert Fabian a Shiffe of London, and an Historigapher. Edmund Dudley, the faman whom King Henry used to take the forreiters of Penal Statutes; who wrote a Book entituled Arbor Rei-publicae. John Bockingbam an excellent Schoolman: and William Blackeye a Carmelite Frier, a Doctor of Divinity; and a Necromancer.

The REIGN of

KING HENRY
THE EIGHTH.

KING Henry the Seventh being deceased, his only son Prince Henry heir by his Father of the House of Lancaster, and by his Mother of the House of York; by unquestionable right succeeded in the Crown, at the age of eighteen years, on the two and twentieth of April, in the Year 1509, who having been trained up in the study of good Letters all his Fathers time; he governed at first as a man newly come from Contemplation to Action, as it were by the Book; in so regular and fair a manner, that as of Newe Government, there was said to be Quiquamium Nomen; so of this Kings, there might as just be said, Decennium Henry; and perhaps double so long a time, comparable with so much time of any Kings Reign, that had been before him. How he came to alter, and to alter to such a degree of change as he did, we shall then have a fit place to shew, when we come to the time of his alteration.

King Henry, having learned by Books, that the weight of a Kingdom is too heavy to lie upon one mans shoulders, if it be not supported by able Councillors; made it his first care, to make choice of an able Council; to which he called William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of England, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, and Treasurer of England, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Steward of his Household, Charles Somerset Lord Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyat, Doctor Thomas Rishal, and Sir Edward Poyning; by advice of these Councillors, his first Act after the care of his Fathers Funeral, was the care to perform his Fathers Will, in marrying the Lady Katherine of Spain, the Relief of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which perhaps, but in respect of formal piety, he had not the greatest devotion; and for relinquishing whereof, he might (no doubt) more easily have obtained a Dispensation from the Pope; than his Father had done, for getting it to be allowed; but obstinacy in his Fathers desire, and respect to his Councils advice, so far prevailed with him, that he would not be Crowned, till that were performed, that one Coronation might serve them both; and so on the third day of June following, he married the said Lady at the Bishop of Salisbury House in Fleet-street; where of many great Solemnities, I will remember but this one; that though the Bride were a Widow, yet to shew she was a Virgin Widow, she was attired all in white, and had the hair of her head hanging down behind at the full length; and then (having made in the Tower Court and twenty Knights of the Bath two days after being Midsummer day, he was Crowned at Westminster, together with his Queen, by the hands of William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, with all circumstancies of State in such cafes usual; and then all the Nobility, Spiritual and Temporal, did him Homage; and the people being asked whether they would receive him for their King, they all with one voice, cried, Yes, Yes. This done, his next Act was another part of performing his Fathers Will, which was to proclaim Pardons for all Offences, (Treason, Murder, and Felony only excepted) and to have restitution made of all goods unjustly taken from any; and because the Instruments of such injustice are always most odious, and nothing gives the people so much contentment, as to see their Persecutors punished; he therefore caused Empson and Dudley, the two chief Actors of the late unjust proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of their inferior Agents, called Promoters, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wight, Simpson, and Scott, to be fet on the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their heads, and then to ride through the City, with their faces to the Horse tails; with the flame whereof in seven days after, they all died in Newgate. Shortly after a Parliament was called, whereof Sir Thomas Ingley was chosen Speaker; and therein Empson and Dudley were attainted of High Treason, and after arraigned; Edmund Dudley in the Guildhall, on the seventeenth of July, and Sir Richard Empson at Northampton in October following; and on the seventeenth of August the year following, they were both of them beheaded on the Tower-hill, and their bodies and heads buried, the one at White-Friers, the other at the Black.

On Midsummer Eve at night, King Henry came privily into Cheapside, cloathed in one of the Coats of his Guard, to behold the fame; and this first year King Henry spent in Juilts and Masks, which were almost perpetual, performed with great Magnificence always; and sometimes with great acts of Valour on the Kings part specially.

In February the same year, Ambassadors came from from the Kings Father in law, the King of Ara gon, requiring aid against the Moors; in which service, the Lord Thomas Darcy, a Knight of the Garter, making suit to be employed, he was sent thither, and with him the Lord Anthony Gray, Brother to the Marques Dalset, Henry Guilford, Wolsum Brown, and William Sidney, Esquires of the Kings House, Sir Robert Consable, Sir Roger Hastings, Sir Ralph Ellerton, and others, who, on the Monday in the Rega-ton Week, departed out of Plymouth Haven with four Ships Royal, and on the first of June arrived at the Port of Cadiz in South Spain; whence coming the King of Aragon's hearing, sent to bid them welcome; but advertising them thither, that he had other occasion of new troubles with France, took truce with the Moors, and therefore they might return again to their own Countrey, to whom yea he allowed wages for all his Souldiers. Whereupon the Lord Darcy and all his men went aboard their Ships; but Henry Guilford, Wolsum Brown, and William Sydney, desirous to see the Court of Spain, went thither, and were honourably entertained. Henry Guilford, and Wolsum Brown were made Knights by the King; who gave to Sir Henry Guilford a Canton of Granado; and to Sir Wolsum Brown an Eagle of Sicily on a Chief, to the augmentation of their Arms; William Sydney so excuted himself, that he was not made Knight, After this they returned to their Ships and their Ships into England.

During the time that the Lord Darcy was in Spain, the Lady Margaret Dutchefs of Savoy, Daughter unto Maximiliano the Emperor, and Governor of Flanders, and other of the King's Court Natives, pertaining to Charles the young Prince of Caffile, sent to King Henry for fifteen hundred Archers, to aid her against the Duke of Gelders, which the King granted; and thereupon Sir Edward Papers Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings House appointed to go, accompanied with his Son in Law the Lord Clinton, Sir Matthew Brown, Sir John Digby, John Wrogton, Richard Willerick, and others to the number of fifteen hundred, took Shipping at Sandwich, and passing over to the said Lady Regent, did her there great service; for which John Norton, John Fosse, John Scot, and Thomas Linde were Knighted; and then with many thanks and rewards returned, not having lost in all the Journey, by War or Sickness, above an hundred men.

In the third year of King Henry's Reign, one Andrew Barton a Scottish Pyrate, was grown so bold, that he robbed English ships more than he should. At last the King sent his Admiral, Sir Edward Howard, to reprefent him, who in a fight wounded the said Barton, that he died; and then taking two of his Ships, brought the men Prisoners to London; and though their offence deferred no less than death, yet the King was so mercifull as to pardon them all; provided they departed the Realm within twenty days. The King of Scots hearing of the death of Barton, and taking of his Ships, sent to King Henry, requiring reparation; but King Henry answered his Herald, that he rather looked for thanks for sparing their lives, who so justly had defered death.

The third year also of King Henry's Reign, the French King made sharp War against Pope Julius the second; whereupon King Henry wrote to the French King, requiring him to defait his War against the Pope, being his Friend and Confederat; but when the King of France little regarded his request, he then sent him word to deliver him his Inheritance of the Dutchy of Normandy and Guayen, and the Countreys of Anjou and Mayne; as also his Crown of France, or else he would recover it by the Sword. But when the King of France was not moved with this threatening neither; King Henry then joining in League with the Emperor Maximiliano, with Ferdinand King of Spain, and all the rich order Princes, retired by advice of his Council to make War on the King of France, and to that end made preparation both by Sea and Land.

This year the King kept his Christmas at Greenwich, in a most magnificent manner. On New-years day was presented one of his Jovial Devices, which, only for a Pattern what his shows at other times were, I think fit to set down at large. In the Hall was made a Caffle, garnished with Armillery and Weapons, in a molt warlike fashion, and on the Front of the Caffle was written, la Fortrefq Dangereuf: within the Caffle were fix Ladies, cloathed in Ruffet Satten, laid all over with leaves of Gold; on their heads Crowls and Caps of Gold. After this Caffle had been carried about the Hall, and the Queen had beheld it, in came the King with five other, appareld in Coats, one half of Ruffet Satten, with Spangles of fine Gold; the other half of Gold, and the rest of the heads Caps of Ruffet Satten, embroidered with works of fine Gold. These six assaulting the Caffle, whom the Ladies seeing so lulty and courageous, they were contented to folace with them; and upon further communication, to yield the Caffle; and so they came down and danced a long space; after that the Ladies led the Knights into the Caffle, and then the Caffle suddenly vanifhed out of their sights. On the twelfth day at night, the King with eleven more were disguifed, after the manner of Italy, called a Mask; a thing not seen before in England.
They were appareld in Garments long and broad, wrought all with Gold, with Vitfors and Caps of Gold. And after the Banquet done, their Maskers came in, with fix Gentlemen dis-guifed in Silk, bearing daft Torches, and depired the Ladies to dance, and after they had danced and communed together, took their leave and departed.

The first of February began the Parliament, of which was Speaker Sir Robert Sheffield, Knight, where the Archbishop of Canterbury fliewed the wrong which the King of France did to the King of England, in withholding his Inheritance from him; and thereupon the Parliament concluded; that War should be made on the French King and his Dominions.

At this time King Ferdinand of Spain, having War with the French King, wrote to his Son in Law King Henry, that if he would lend over an Army into Bavy, and invade France on that side; he would aid them with Ordinance, Horses, and and all other things necessary: whereupon Thomas Gray, Marquefs Dorset, was appointed to go, and with him the Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Brook, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Ferrers, the Lords John, Anthony, and Leonard Gray, all Brothers to the Marquefs; Sir Griffith ap Rice, Sir Maurice Berkeley, Sir William Sands, the Baron of Burford, and Sir Richard Crawford his Brother, William Haver, John Melton, William King of Ely, and Sir Henry Willoughby, with divers others, to the number of a thousand men, who being at Southampton on the fiftenth of May, the third of June they landed on the Coaft of Bidey, whither, within three days after their arrival, came the King a Marquefs and an Earl to welcome them; but of such necessaries as were promised, there came none: for the English being in some want of victuals, the King of Navarre offered to supply them, which they accepted; and promised thereupon not to molest their Territories. After the Army had lien thirty days, looking for aid and provision from the King of Spain, at laft a Bishop came from the King, defiring them to have patience a while, and very shortly he would give them full contentment. In the mean time the English men forced to feed upon much Garlick, and to drink of hot Wines, fell into such sickness, that many of them died; at laft eighteen hundred persons: which the Lord Marquefs feeing, he went to the King to know his pleafures who fent him another, that very shortly the Duke of Alba fhould come with a great power, and joy in with him: and indeed the Duke of Alba came forward with a great Army, as if he meant to joyn with him as was promised; but being come within a days journey, he suddenly turned towards the Realm of Navarre; and entering the fame, chafed out the King, and conquered the Kingdom to the King of Spain's ufe. This Spanish policy pleafed not the English, who finding nothing but words from the King of Spain, and being weary of lying so long idle, they fell upon some small Towns in the borders of Guien; but, for want of Horfes, as well for service as draught, were unable to perform any great matter: at which time, being now Oliver, the Lord Marquefs fell sick, and the Lord Howard fupplied his place of General. To whom the King of Spain once again fent excufing his prefent coming, and requiring him, being the time of year was now past, that he would be pleased to break up his Army, and difperfe his Companies into Towns thereabouts till the next Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his promifes: Hereupon the Lord Howard and his Company went to Rendes, the Lord Willoughby to Gorfechance, and Sir William Sands with many other Captains to Fentery. King Henry in the mean time, hearing what the King of Spain intention was; fent his Herald Windor with Letters to the Army, willing them to tarry there; for that very shortly he meant to fend them a new supply of Forces, under the conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain; but this meafage fo incenfed the Soldiers, that in a great fury they had flain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded preternaturally to return home; who thereupon was forced to hire Ships, and in the beginning of December they landed in England; being caught by this experience what truth is to be given to Spanish promises.

About the fame time that the Marquefs went into Spain, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral of England, with twenty great Ships made forth towards Britain: where letting his men on land, he burned and waited divers Towns and Villages, and being threatened by the Lords of Britain to be encountered, to encourage his Gentle-men, he made order of them Knights; as Sir Edward Broad, brother to the Lord Willoughby, Sir Griffith Down, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir John Burdet, Sir William Perton, Sir Henry Sherburn, and Sir William Ball. The British were near thousand, the English but five and twenty hundred; yet the British, not con-tented with this advantage of number, would needs use policy besides; for, by the advice of an old experienced Captain, their General commanded his men, that as soon as the Battles were joyned, they fhould retire a little, mean-ting thereby to draw the English into some dif-ad-venture; but the common Soldiers not knowing their Generals purpofe, and supposing he had fent some prefent danger, instead of retiring took their heels and fled; fo giving the English by their British policy, if not a Victory, at laft a safety to return to their Ships. After which the British fied for Truce, and could not obtaih it; for the English Admiral pursued his Forraging the Country, till fearing there were many French Ships abroad at Sea, he came and lay before the Ifle of Wight. King Henry in the mean time followed his pleasures, and in June kept a folemn Jult at Greenwich, where he and Sir Charles Brandon took up all comers; and the King fiewed himfelf no lefs a King at Arms than in Estate.

After this, King Henry having prepared men and Ships ready to go to Sea, under the Go vernance of Sir Anthony Othoebred, Sir Edmund Ichingham, William Sidney, and divers other Gentlemen; appointed them to take the Sea, and to come before the Ifle of Wight, there to joyn with the Admiral; which all together made a Fleet of five and twenty fair Ships: and to Portsmouth he went himfelf to fee them, where he appointed Captains, for one of his chiefef Ships called the Regent, Sir Thomas Knave Matter of his Horfe, and Sir John Carnew of Downs-hire, and to another principal Ship called the Sovereign, he appointed for Captains, Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford; and then making them a Banquet, fent them going. The French King likewise had prepared a Navy of nine and thirty Ships in the Haven of Brift, whereof the chief was, a great Carrick, called the Cordeliers, pertaining to the Queen his Wife. These two Fleets met at the Bay of Britain, and there entered a terrible fight: the Lord Admiral made with the great Ship of Deep, and falted her; Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guilford being in the Sovereign, made with the great Carrick of Brift, and laidiffe to fitime to her; but, whether by negligence of the Miter, or by reason of the feoke from the Ordinance, the Sovereign was call at the stern of the Carrick; whereas the French men houted for joy; which Sir Thomas Knott seeing, suddenly he caus'd the Regent in which he was, to make to the Carrick, and to grapple with her a long board; and when they of the Carrick perceived they could not get ainder, they let slip an Anchor, and so with the_stream the Ship turned, and the Carrick was on the West side, and the Regent on the Lee side; at which time a cruel fight passed between these two Ships: But in conclusion the English men enreader the Carrick, which when a Gunner faw, he desperately fere fire on the Gun-powder (as some fay) though others affirmed, that Sir Anthony Northfread following the Regent at the Stern, bow'd her on divers places, and fet her powder on fire; but howsoever it chance'd the Carrick and the Regent both were confumed by fire. In the Carrick was Sir Peter Morgan, and with him nine hundred Men: In the Regent were Sir Thomas Knott and Sir John Carew, and with them seven hundred Men, all drowned and burnt. King Henry to repair the los of the Regent, caus'd a great Ship to be made, such a one as had never been feen in England, and name'd it Henry Gracete Dici.

Though King Henry had hitherto followed his pleafures, as well agreeing with his youth and conftitution; yet he neglected not in the mean time the fefterer duties of his place; he frequenc'd daily his Council Table, and no matter of importance was refolved on, till he had heard it first maturely discussed: as was now a War with France, which he would not enter into upon his own head, nor yet upon advice of his private Council, till he had debated and concluded in Parliament; whereupon he call'd his High Court of Parliament, wherein it was refolved, that himfelf in perfon with a Royal Army, fhould invade France; and towards the charges thereof an extraordinary Subsidy was willingly granted.

On May even this year, Edmund de la Pool Earl of Suffolk was beheaded on the Tower-hill: This was that Earl of Suffolk, whom King Philip Duke of Austria had delivered up into the hands of King Henry the Seventh, upon his promise that he would not put him to death; which indeed he performed; but King Henry the Eflhing was not bound by that promise, and by him he was; and shortly after, to bring another Lord in his place, Sir Charles Brandon was created Viscount Lifhe.

For all the great preparations for France King Henry forbore not his course of Revelly, but kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with divers curious devices, in most magnificent manner. In March following, the Kings Navy Royal, to the number of two and forty Ships was fet forth, under the conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompanied with Sir Walter Deveraux, Lord Ferrers, Sir Walfam Brown, Sir Edward Lechingham, Sir Anthony Payniga, Sir John Wollap, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Stephen Bull, William Fizwilliams, Arthur Placenteg, William Sidney Eifique, and divers other Gentlemen, who failing to Brittain, came into Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in fight of the French Navy. Hereon Sir John was Admiral, who keeping himfelf clofe in the Haven of Breff; the English Admiral intended to aflail him in the Haven; but because his Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he caus'd certain Boats to be manned forth, thin king thereby to roule out the French; but when this neither would draw them to come abreast, he then call'd a Council, where it was determined, that first they should aflail Prior John and his Gallies, lying in Blankefide Bay, and after set upon the reft of the French Fleet in the Haven of Breff; and it was further appointed that the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others should go on Land, with a convenient number, to affaulk the Balwarks, which the French had there made; while the Admiral with Row Barge, and little Gallies entered into the Bay, that to the French men might at once be aflail'd both by Sea and Land. But though this were determined by a Council of War, yet the Lord Admiral had a trick by himfelf, for by the advice of a Spanish Knight called Sir Alphonso Caesar, affuring him that he might enter the Bay with little danger; he called to him William Fizwilliams, William Cook, John Colley, and Sir Walfam Brown, as his moft truy friends, making them privy to his intent, which was to take on him the whole enterprise with their affifants only; and fo confident he was of success, that he wrote to the King to come thereto in perfon, to have the honour of the victory himself; but it seems the King had better Fires, at leaft went not; and thereupon on Saint Marys day the Admiral put himself in a small Row Barge; and appointing three other small Row Ships, and his own Ship-Boat to attend him, therein on a sudden row'd into the Bay, where Prior John had moor'd up his Gallies just to the ground; which Gallies, with the Balwarks on the Land, shot mortally, yet the Admiral went on, and coming to the Gallies, drove out the French men, the Bay was shallow, and the other Ships, by reason of the Tide was spent, could not enter; which the French men perceived, they entred the Gallies again with Morris Pikes, and began a new fight; whereupon the Admiral attempting to return back into his Row Barge, which by violence of the Tide, was driven down the stream, was thrown over-board and drowned; the field was not therein, but the enterprize; the fore-named Alphonso was also there slain; upon which soreful accident, the Lord Ferrers with the rest returned into England. After whose departure Prior John came forth with his Gallies; and coasting over the Borders of Suffolk, burnt certain poor Cottages; but the King made suddenly a new Admiral, the Lord Thoma Howard, eldest Brother to him that was drowned, Son and Heir of the Earl of Surrey whose men the French had saw, the Sea was calm; the French were no more to be seen on any Coast of England.

King Henry had hitherto performed Acts of Arms, though in Jelt, yet with great magnificence; he will not perform them with less, being now in earnest, and specially to deal with so potent an Adversary: and therefore when it was concluded by Parliament, that he should make a War against himself in perfon; he first before to prepare the way for him, George Dalles Earl of Shrewsbury high Steward of his Household.
The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

Houhold, accompanied with the Lord Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, the Lord Davenant Prior of Saint John, Sir Robert Ratclife Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Cobham, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Thomas Cornewall and others, to the number of eight thousand, who arrived at Calais about the middle of May; after him in the end of May, followed Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Herbert, Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Pierce Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Gray Earl of Kent, the Lord Stafford Earl of Wiltshire, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Sir Edward Hoby, Sir Edward Dimmock, Sir David Owen, with the number of two thousand. These Generals joyning together,

On the twenty and twentieth day of June, one thousand, this day, before the strong Town of Terwin, which City was strongly fortified; and in it was Governor the Lord Paul Troy, who had with him six hundred Horfemen, and five and twenty hundred Almain, besides the Inhabitants. Here at the very first two happened disaffairs to the English, one, that the Baron Caron was slain with a shot from the Town; the other, that Sir Nicholas Vaux, and Sir Edward Belknappe coming from Calyfeye, with four and twenty Cart's of Provision, were fet upon by the Duke of Vendôme, Lieutenant of Picardy, and many of the English, plain, and the Provision taken. In this fame was the English Camp at Terwin, when King Henry the last day of June came himself to Calais, and on the one and twentieth of July took the field, having in his Army of fighting men not above nine thousand, but with Pioneers and others that attended the Marchings, to the number of three hundred and three hundred men: His forward was led by Charles Brandon Viscount Laffa, his main Batel by himself, and Sir Henry Guiford carried his Standard; and in this order he marched forward to the siege of Terwin, entering upon the French ground the five and twentieth of July. On the morrow after, by negligence of the Carters, that mistook the way, a great Gun called the John Evangelist, was overthrown in a deep Pond of water, and could not at that time be recovered, but a few days after, the Master Carpenter taking with him a hundred Labourers, went and weighed it up; but having carried it ready to bring away, was yet upon by eight hundred French; and the most of his company slain: The Gun was taken by the French, and carried to Bulloghe. In the French Army were to the number of eleven thousand Footmen, and four thousand Horse; whereof were Captains, the Lord De la Puye, the Lord De Fréams, the Duke De Longueville, the Earl of Saint Paul, the Lord of Frewigs, the Lord of Clermont, and Richafs de la Poal an English man, Son to John Duke of Suffolk. The Armies were come within two miles one of another, and some light skirmishes passed between them, particularly one; on a day called the dry Wednesday, for the day was wonderful hot, and the King with his Army staid in order of Battle, from fixa clock in the morning, till three in the afternoon: after this, the King removed towards Terwin; and as the Army marched, another of the Kings Bombards of Iron, called the Red Gun, was overthrown in a lane, and there left; which the French understanding, went with a great power to fetch it away, as they had done the other; but the Lord Berners, Captain of the English Pioneers, prevented them; and though sent upon by the French to the number of nine or ten thousand, yet by the valour of the Earl of Essex, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the bold adventures of Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharp, they recovered it, and brought it late to the Camp. On the fourth of August King Henry came before the City of Terwin, where he strongly fortified himself with Ordinance, and other warlike defences. In which mean, the Captain of Bulloghe knowing that many of the Garrison of Calais were gone with the King, thought to take advantage of their absence, and do some great exploit upon Calais; and thereupon with a thousand men, came to Newham Bridge, and killing the Watchmen, took it; but afterward some of his Company going to fetch Booties, and coming so near the Walls of Calais, that they were defrayd; about five rogue Coopers and other Artificers issuf forth, and driving them back, recovered again Newham Bridge, and took divers of them prisoners; especially when the Gate of Calais, called Bulloghe Gate, was opened, and that Caliceps the under-Marsh, with two hundred Archers issu'd forth, and joynd with them. The French prisoners were brought to Calais, and there fold in open Market amongst others a Cooper of the Town of Calais bought a prisoner that dwelt in Bulloghe, and had of the Prisoner for his ransom, a hundred Crowns; when the money was paid, the French man made the Cooper to fee him safe delivered, and to conduct him out of danger, the Cooper was content, and went himself alone with the French man, till he came beyond the Cawfey, and there would have departed; but the French man perceiving that the Cooper was aged, and that no refuge was nigh, by force took the Cooper prisoner, and carried him to Bulloghe, making him pay two hundred Crowns, before he was delivered.

Whilst King Henry lay thus at the siege of Terwin, on the eleventh of August the Emperour Maximilian came to Ayre; which King Henry understanding, went and met him between Ayre and the Camp, where with great complements they felavd each other; but their complements were broken off by the extremal sore weather which happened that day: the morrow after, the Emperour Maximilian came from Ayre to the Kings Camp, wearing a Croft of Saint George, as the King's Souldier, and receiving wages of him for service, an hundred Crowns a day: An honour never done to any King of England before; and yet was no disparagement to the Emperour; for he was royally received, and lodged in a Tent of Cloth of Gold; that as no Emperour before had ever been Souldier to a King; so no Souldier before was ever lodged in such a Tent. At this time the City of Terwin, being in some diftre of want of Viuels; the French King appointed all his Souldiers to the number of eight thousand;
The English defeat the French in a Battel called the Battel of Spurs.

Tournay is delivered up to King Henry.

King Henry lays siege to Tournay.

Thos, and to see victuals by any means conveyed into it; the charge of which Convoy was committed to Mounser De Prisnot: but King Henry by advice of the Emperor Maximilian had made Bridges to pass his men over the River, to the other side of the Town, while it was ease, and his; in such sort, that when the French Convoy came with their Victuals, and thought to have entred the Town, they found the English Army there ready to refute them; whereupon a fierce Battel was fought between them: but in conclusion the French were put to flight, and fled so fast, that from thence it was called the Battel of Spurs, for that they used more their Spurs in running away, than their Launces in fighting. In this Battel, the Duke of Longueville, the Lord of Clermont, Captain Bayard, and others to the number of twelve score were taken prisoners, and all brought to the Kings prifence; with six Standards that were likewise taken. After the Battel, the King made Sir John Pecheys Banneret, and John Carre Knight, who had both of them done great service in this encounter. King Henry having obtained this Victory against the French, he comand him to burn and remove the Town from relief of Victuals, and without plying his Battel more fiercely than before; made the Townsmen soon fall to deposite composition, and upon condition, that the Souldiers may depart with Horse and Armour, they yielded up the Town into the Kings hands. This was done on the eighteenth of August, and the Earl of Shrewsbury entered the Town the same night, and set up the Banner of Saint George in the highest place of it, in sign of Victory, and swore all the Townsmen to be true Subjects to the King of England. The four and twentith of August, the King himself entred the Town, and dined in the Bishops Palace, where it was resolved, that the Walls and Fortifications of Tournay should be razed, and the Town burnt all but the Cathedral Church and the Bishops Palace were set on fire, to be kept there to the Kings use.

After this it was concluded, that the King should lay siege to the City of Tournay; whereupon he set forward in three Battels: the Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperor, the Battel; and the Lord Chamberlain the Rearward. In this order the Kings Army marched forwards towards Tournay; by the way, he went and vifited the young Prince of Casilfe, and the Lady Margaret, Governors of the Prince, in the Town of Lijle, where with all Magnificence, or rather indeed Reverence, he was entertained; and after he had stayed there three days, he took his leave, and being gone a mile and somewhat more out of the Town, he asked where his Capt lay, and no man there could tell the way, and guide they had none; the night was so dark and muddy; by chance at last they met with a Vissueller coming from the Camp, who was their guide, and conducted them to it. By which we may see, to what diffref the great Prince might be brought by a little over-light.

On the one and twenty day of September, the King removed his Camp towards Tournay; and being come within three miles of the Town, he few Garter King of Arms to common the Town; but they, though they had but few men of War amongst them, yet stood upon their Gard, whereupon the King begirt it on all sides, and made such batterie upon it, that though it were written on the Gares of the Town, graven in stone, James to us perdon ton Pecellege; thou hast never loit thy Maidenhead; yet now they were glad to lose it: and in conclusion they sent a Trumpet to require a Parley, and then sued for mercy and yielded it up, and paid ten thousand pound's Sterling besides for redemption of their liberties; and then Master Thomas Woffley, the Kings Almoner, calling before him all the Citizens young and old, swore them to the King of England; the number of whom was fourscore thousand. This done, the King entered into Tournay, and calling into his presence Edward Guilfard, William Fizwilliam, John Delone, William Tyler, John Sharp, William Higffy, John Steege, Christopher Gournf, and some other valiant Gentlemen; he gave to them the Order of Knighthood. And then remembering the great entertainment the Prince of Castile and the Lady Margaret had given him at Lijs, he would not be behinde them in such Courtefie; and thereupon invited them solemnly to his City of Tournay, whom at their coming he brought into the Town in great triumph: during their abode in Tournay, amongst other complements of entertainment, there was had a Juffs, where the King and the Lord Lijs answered all comers: after the Juffs, was a sumptuous Banquet; after the Banquet, the Ladies danced, and then came in the King, and eleven other in a Mask, all richly apparelled with Bonnets of Gold: and when they had passed the time at their pleasures, the Garments of the Maskers were cut off amongst the Ladies, take them that could. This was King Henry's disposition, that he could not forbear Revelving himself and his Arms; and Ladies must be entertained as well as Souldiers. And here Maximilian the Emperor finding the French Forces to be but weak, persuaded King Henry to proceed on and pursue his Victories: but he being young and of a quiet disposition, and considering with himself that he had not entred the War for any cause of his own, but to revenge the injuries done to the Pope: and thinking by this already done the French sufficiently lefton'd to acknowledge their error, and the rather, for that Winter was now drawing on; he resolved to put this end to the War: and for taking his leave of the Emperor; and leaving Sir Edward Poynings Governor of Tournay, he returned to Calier; and from thence into England, and then rode in Poit to the Queen at Richmond.

Whilest King Henry was thus busied in his War with France, the King of Scots, though his Brother in law, yet intrigued by the French King, and taking advantage of King Henry's absence, assembled his people to invade England; but before his whole power could come together, the Lord Hume his Chamberlain with seven or eight thousand men entered the Borders; but as he was returning with a great bovey of

The Lieutenant on whom all power in Scotland was devolved, was called the Earl of Roxham, so called in favour of his Countrey, faith, not the fifth part of that number.

Battel, unless his Son followed after him the Lord Admiral, with the Admiral himself came and joined: and now having many great Lords and Knights in his Army, he appointed to every one their station; and then was informed, that King James being removed six miles from Roxham, lay embatteling upon a great Mountain called Fledaden, where it was impossible to come near him, but with great disadvantage; for at the foot of the hill, on the left hand, was a great marsh ground full of reeds and water; on the right hand was a River called Till, so swift and deep that it was not passable; on the backside were such craggy Rocks and thick Woods, that there was no affailing him on that part; the forepart of his Camp he had fenced with his great Ordinance. Being in such a hold, the Earl of Roxham found there was no possibility of a Battel, unless he could draw him from the Hill: without the which a Cornry by which Scotland was determined to send the Scots Purfuitant at Arms with a Trumpet to the King of Scots, to let him know that he was ready on Friday following to give him Battel, if he would abide it; whereunto the King of Scots by his Purfuitant Holi made answer, that at the day prefixed he should finde him ready for Battel as he defined, that he would willingly have come to such a match as if he had been at Edinburgh; but though he made this answer, yet he would not leave the strong hold he was in, but kept himself still upon the Hill; at last, Thomas Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Roxham, having viewed the Countrey round about, declared to his Father, that if he would fetch but a small compass, and come with his Army on the back of his Enemies, he should enforce the Scots King to come down out of his strength, or else flip him from receiving of victuals. This counsel of the Lord Howard his Father followed, and King James perceiving what their meaning was, thought it flipt not with his honour to be fore-falled out of his own Realm: and thereupon immediately raised his Camp, and got to another Hill, but not so steep as the other: which the Earl of Roxham perceiving, he determined to mount it; and to fight with the Scots, before they should have leisure to fortifie their Camp: and herewith making a short Speech, for encouragement of his Soul- diers, he divided his Army into Battles; the Vanguard was led by the Lord Howard, to whom was joyned as a Wing, Sir Edward Howard; the middle-ward was led by the Earl himself; and the Rear-ward was by Sir Edward Stanley; the Lord Dacre with a number of Aber- men was set apart by himself, to succour where need should be; the Ordinance was placed in the Front, and in other places, as was thought most convenient: and in this order they march forward towards the Scots. On the other side King James reckoning upon the benefit of the Hill, thought the English half mad, to venture a Battel upon such disadvantage; and thereupon making a Speech to encourage his Souldiers, who were of themselves fo forward, that they needed no encouraging, he divided the Battels in this manner; the main Battel he led himself to, to which he ascribed the two Wings; the right led by the Earl of Hume, Crawford, and Montefo; the left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, together with the Lord Howard, L. Chamberlain: so that they were of Victory, that the King first, and after all the Lords and meaner men, put away their Horses, as thinking they should not need them; which confidence was afterward their undoing: for when the Battel was joyned, Sir Edward Howard in getting up the Hill, was so assaulted by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, that he was left almost alone, and in manifest peril to be slain; in comes the Lord Dacre with his Horse- men and trod under foot the Scottish Battel of Speers on foot, which he could not have done, if they had kept their Horses. And this part of the Scottish Army being led by the Earls of Crawford and Montefo, they were both of them slain, and the whole Battel put to flight. In another place the Earl of Argyle, like upon the Battel led by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, putting it to flight, with the slaughter also of the two Earls. King James notwithstanding, maintaining the flight still with great resolution, till Sir Adam Forman his Standard-bearer was beaten down; and then not faining, though despairing of success, he rushed into the thickest of his Enemies, amongst whom he was beaten down and slain; and to make his death the more honourable, there died with him three Bishops (whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the Kings bafe Son) two Abbots, twelve Earls, and twelve Lords, of Knights and Gentlemen very many, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners (as Paulus早点信仰 faith) amongst whom was Sir William Scott Chancellour to the said King, and Sir George Fountaine, his Serjeant Porter; the Lord Hume, and the Earl of Hume; got hord down and escaped. Neither was the Battel without blood to the English; for there were slain at least a thousand, and that which in a Defeat was strange many also taken prisoners; for many in pursuing the Scots, went rashly so far, that they knew not which way to return, and by bands of Scots, that had not fought that day, were set upon and taken. When the field was done, the Lord General called to him certain Lords Lords and Gentlemen, and made them Knights, as Sir Edward Howard his Son, the Lord Scroop, Sir William Percy, Sir Edward George, and others.

This Bartel was fought on Friday the ninth of Sept, in the year 1543, called by some Bramston, by some Eldon field. King James here slain was the fame that had married the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of King Henry the Seventh, and Sisler to the present King Henry; and might have enjoyed many happy days, if he had kept himself firm to his alliance; but being carried away with the inveterate spleen between the two Nations, and propension to France, he ended his life, though honourably, yet miserably under many wounds. It is a very memorable, but scarce credible thing; which (from the mouth of a very credible person who saw it) George Buchanan relates concerning this King; that intending to make a War with England, a certain old man of venerable aspect, and clad in a long blue Garment, came unto him, and leaning familiarly upon the Chair where the King sat, said, I am Sir John of Laughar Tower, and thereupon bawled, that thou proceed not in the War thou art about; for if thou do, it will be thy ruine: and having so said, he pressed through the company, and vanished out of sight; for by no inquiry it could be known what became of him. But the King was too resolute to be frighted with Phantasm, and no warning could divert his Delinity, which had not been Delinity if it could have been diverted. The day after this Bartel, his Body, though disfigured with wounds, was known by the Lord Duke and others to be his; and thereupon bowedell, embalmèd, and wrapped in lead, was brought to the Monastery of Sheen in Surrey, and there interred; but at the dissolution of that House was taken up and thrown into a walle roome amongst timber and stone; which John Stow faith, he fo few, and farther relacje, that the feme of Laughar Tower, Glafier, Queen Elizabeth, being at Sheen, in new Glazing the Windows, either upon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the feet; but smelling the sweet perfumes of the Balms, gave it to their Matter; who opening the lead, found therein the head of a man, retaining fancy, though the moisture were clean dryed up, whose hair both of head and beard was red: which afterward he caufed to be buried at St. Michaelis Church in Woodstreet, where he dwelled. But notwithstanding this relation of Stow, John Lefley Bishop of Rofi affirmed, that it was held for certain. The Body thus found, was the Body of the Lord Buchanan slain in that Bartel, Buchanan faith, of Alexander Elfloton, who in countenance and feature was like the King; and that King James was seen alive the fame night at Kelis, whence he passed to Jerfalem, and there spent the rest of his days in holy contemplation: but however it was, he was never seen any more in Scotland.

King Henry being now returned from Tourney into England, and finding the great express done in his absence against the Scots; on the day of the Purification of our Lady, at Lambeth he created the Earl of Surrey Duke of Norfolk, with an augmentation of the Arms of Scotland; Sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lifes, he created Duke of Suffolk; the Lord Howard high Admiral, he made Earl of Surrey, Sir Charles Somerset Lord Herbert his chief Chamberlain Earl of Worescer, and shortly after Sir Edward Stanley he made Lord Montegle; and in March following, Master Thomas Wolsey his Almoner, was made Bishop of Lincoln. Here before we go further, it will be fit to say something of this man, that he be not a lub afterward in the way of the Story: He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher; proceeding in learning, he was made Fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford, and afterward Schoolmaster of the School there, in which time the Marques Dorset committed three of his Sons to be instructed by him; and having a Benefice fallen in his Gift, lent for them one Christmas, and belowed it upon him; whereas Wolsey going to take possession of it, at his being there, so that when his manner is not delivered, he was by Sir Amyas Paulet let by the heels, which afterward he remembered to Sir James his no small trouble, for he made him attend his pleasantries for six or seven years; all which time he lay in the Middle-Temple, where he re-edified the Gate-house next the street very Humphrons, setting the Cardinals Arms upon it, to appease him. After this disgrace he went over-Sea, where he fell in acquaintance with Sir John Naphat Treasurer of Calis, and by him was preferred to be King Henry the Seventh's Chaplain: and now being by this means in the King's eye, he so diligently carried himself, that he soon got into the Kings heart. One time it happened, the King had occasion to send a Melissaer to the Emperour Maximilian, about a businesse that required haste; for which purpose the man was thought more fit than Wolsey; whereupon, when the King called him, gave him his Pendant, and bade him make all speed he could: Wolsey departed from the King at Richmond about noon, and by the next morning was got to Dover, and from thence by noon that day was come to Calis, and by night was with the Emperour; to whom declaring his Message; and having a present dispatch, he rode that night back to Calis, and the night following came to the Court at Richmond. The next morning he presented himself before the King, who blamed him for not being yet gone, the matter requiring haste; to whom Wolsey answered, that he had been with the Emperour, and had dispatched the business, and for proof showed the Emperours letters the King wondered much at his speed, but then asked him if he met not with his Pursuivant, whom he sent after to advertise him of a special matter he had forgot; whereupon, Wolsey answered, May it please your Grace, I met him yesterday upon the way, but that businesse I had dispatched before, taking the boldnesse so to do without commissione, as knowing it to be of special consequence; for which boldnesse I humbly intreat your Grace's Patience. The King not only pardoned him, but bestowed presently upon him the Deanship of Lincoln, and soon after made... made his Almoner. In this state King Henry the eighth found him, with whom also he grew into such favor, that he made him Bishop of Spain-city; and having won Towney, made him Bishop of that City, and returning into England, the Bishopric of Lincoln falling void by the death of Doctor Smith, made him Bishop of that Diocese. And thus far the Story hath now brought him; but soon after he was raised higher; for Doctor Bawmbridge Archbishop of York dying, he was translated from Lincoln to that See: and that he might not be inferior to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he procured of the Pope to be made Cardinal, and Legat a Latere; and after by the King was made Lord Chancellor of England: and being come to his height of Dignity, he fo carried himself in Expendence of Honth, in number of Rentme, and in all Circumstances of State, that no Subject before or since hath in any degree come near him: and if we may say it, he was the first debarker of King Henry for, to the end, where he had been himself, he perjured the King that he should not need trouble himself with frequenting the Council Table as he did, but take his pleasure, and leave those things to his Council, whereof himself would always give him true Information. This was plausible Counsel, and no mar-vail if it were embraced of a young King, coming from the mouth of so great a Prelate.

In this fifth year of the King, the Citizens of London finding themselves grieved with the Inclosures of the common fields about Shiftington, Hogsdon, and Shorditch, and other places adjoining, went one morning, and threw down all the Hedges, and filled up all the Ditches; whereas though the Kings Council were at first offended, yet the Mayor and City shewed them such reasons, that they reiled satisfied, and the Fields were never since hedged.

In the same month of May this year, Pope Julius the Second sent to King Henry a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being angry with the King of France, transferred, by Authority of the Lateran Council, the title of Christianismo from him upon King Henry, which with great solemnity was published the Sunday following, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul; but this solemnity must not pass without Reveiling, Masques, and Jults; wherein the King and the Duke of Suffolk were defendants against all comers; who having the Duke of Longueville, and the Lord of Clarmont to be espectators, spread the fame of their Chivalry into Foreign Nations.

And now the great love, that had been long between King Henry and the Flemings, began to abate upon this occasion; King Henry the Seventh had concluded a match between his Daughter and Charles Prince of Spain, but, by reason of her young years, and for want of assurance of Joynture, the match was deferred during his time; but now King Henry the Eighth seeing his Sister of convenient years, began to call upon it, and signified so much to the Council of Flanders; but they, whether having other ends, or out of Spanish delays, put him off with excuses, and at last sent him word plainly, they could do nothing in it that year. The King of France had soon Intelligence how much King Henry disliked these Spanish dealings, and meant to make some good use of it, for the ends he began to propose to himself, which were to get the Lady Mary for himself, and thereby procure Peace with England, being now old, and weary of the War. And for this purpose he got the new Pope Leo the tenth to be his Mediator, and of both them sent Am-

Crown over her head as too massive for her to wear; and the day following she was received into Parliament, with magnificent ceremonies. In honour of whole marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin had caused a solemn Juits to be proclaimed, which should be kept in Paris the seventh of November. Upon report of this Proclamation in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueses Dorset, and his four Brothers, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Nevil, Sir Giles Capel, Thomas Cheyne, and others obtained leave of the King to be at the Challenge, where they all behaved themselves with great value, but specially the Duke of Suffolk, whose glory the Dauphin took much emu'd, so that he got a Dutch man, the tallfet and strongest man in all the Court of France secretly as another person to encounter him, with a purpose to have the Duke foiled; but indeed it turned to his greater honour: for he foiled the Dutch man in such fort, that when they came to the Barrier, the Duke by main strength took him about the neck, and fo pommelled him about the head, that he made the Blood fliue out at his nofe: many other Princes and Lords did bravely and all at three times the Juits ended.

King Henry was not long behind to solemnize it in England also; for at Greenwich the Christmas following, on New years night, and Twelfth night, he preferred such strange and magnificent devices, as had seldom been seen; and the third of February following, he held a solemn Juits, where he and the Marqueses Dorset answered all comers, at which time the King brake three and twenty Spears, and threw to the ground one that encountered him both man and horfe.

At this time preparation was making for King Henry in perfon to go to Callice, there to meet with the French King and Queen, but death hindered the design; for before the next Spring, the first of January the French King died at the City of Paris, fourscore and two days after his marriage; teaching others by his example, what it is for any man to marry a young lady. King Henry hearing of the French Kings death, sent the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Richard Wimpfield, and Doctor Weft, to bring over the Queen Dowager, according to the Covenants of the Marriage. Whereupon the Queen was delivered to the Duke by Intendence, who obtaining her good will to be his Husband, (which was no hard matter, that had been her first love;) wrote to the King her Brother for his consent; whereas the King seemed to flick a while, but at last consented, so as he brought her into England unmarried, and then married at his return; but the Duke for more surety married her secretly in Paris, and after having received her Downer, Apparel, and Jewels, came with her to Callice, and there openly married her with great solemnity. At their coming into England, King Henry to shew his contentment with the marriage, in the company of the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueses Dorset, and the Earl of Essex, all richly appalled, held a new page of Juits, and running courts on Horseback in manner Vesti, as fast as one could follow another, to the great delight of the beholders.

This year the King being at his Manour of Okeing; Wolsey Archbishop of York came and showed him Letters that he was elected Cardinal; for which Dignity he disabled himself, till the King willing him to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him Lord Cardinal, but his Hat and Bull were not yet come: after which Doctor Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor of England, finding Wolsey, being now Cardinal, to meddle more in his office of Chancellourship, than he could well suffer, resigned up the Seal, which the King pretently gave to Wolsey. About this time, Cardinal Campeius was sent by Pope Leo to King Henry, to sollicitate him to a War against the Turk, with whom Cardinal Wolsey was joyned in Commination; who hearing of the ragged retire of his fellow Cardinal, sent store of red Cloth to Callice to make them fit followers of so great a Lord: and when Campeius was landed at Dover, Cardinal Wolsey caused the Gentry of Kent to wait upon him to Blackheath; where he was met and received by the Duke of Norfolk and many Prelates, and there in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, shifted himself into his Cardinals Robes. Eight Miles had he been laden with necessaries; but Wolsey not thinking them enough for his honour, sent him twelve more. But now see the flame of pride; for in Cheapdike his Mules by some mishance overthrew their Carriages and Coffers on the ground, whose lids flying open, shewed the world what treasure it was they carried, old Breeches, Boots, and broken Shoes, broken meal, Marrow-bones, and Crutches of Bread; exposing him to the laughter of all the people: yet the Cardinal went jogging on shore with his Croffes, guilt Axe and Mice, unto Pauls Church; and by the way had an Oration made him by Sir Thomas More, in the name of the City; and then waited on with many Bishops, was conducted to Bath place, where he was lodged for his own particular: he got well by the Journey, for the King gave him the Bishopric of Salisbury: but the errand he came about, which was to sollicit the King for a War against the Turk, he could not obtain; it was well known to be a bur device to get money, without any intention of what was pretended.

In his seventh year King Henry kept his Christmas at his Manour of Eltham, where on Twelfth night according to his custom, was a stately mask of Knights and Ladies, with solemn Dancing, and a most magnificent Banquet.

It was now the eighth year of King Henry's Reign, when the new League between him and the French King was proclaimed in the City of London: and this year Margaret Queen of Scots eldest Sifter to King Henry, having before married Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus; by reason of diversion amongst the Lords of Scotland, was glad with her Husband to fly into England, and to seek succour at her Brothers hands, who affigued to her the Castle of Linlithgow in Northumberland to reside in: where she was delivered of a Daughter named Margaret. From thence the King sent for her and her Husband to come to his Court, and thereupon...
The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

This year the King kept his Christmas at his Manor of Greenwich; where on Twelfth night according to his custom, rare devices with great magnificence were performed; after which time the King exercised himself much in Hawking, which was like to have proved no good sport to him; for one time following his Hawk and leaping over a Ditch with a Pole, the Pole brake, so that if one Edmund Mody, a footman had not leapt into the water, and left up his head which was fast in the clay, he had been drowned.

Twelve hundred Carpenters and Masons sent to build a Cattle in Suffolk.

Cardinal Wolsey crept divers new Courts.

In this year also there happened in the City of London an Insurrection against strangers, especially of Artificers, complained that Strangers were permitted to resettle firher with their Wares, and to exercise hand-crafts, to the great hinderance and impoverishing the Kings own Subjects; and not only so, but that they were borne out in many great In- lences, and wrongs they offered to the Eng- lish, as one time it happened, a Carpenter in London, called Williamson, had bought two Pigeons in Cheapside, and was about to pay for them, when a French man took them out of his hand. They were brought before a Carpenter: Well (said Williamson) I had bought them; and I will have them; Nay (said the French man) I will have them for my Lord Ambaf- sadour! hereupon they grew to words, and complaint was made to the French Ambassadour, who fo aggravated the matter to the Mayor, that the Carpenter was sent to prison, and when Sir John Bakers sued to the Ambassadour for him, he answered, By the Body of God, the English Knave was worthy to lose his life for denying any thing to a French man; and other an- swer he could have none. Many like and worse insolencies were offered by strangers, which one John Lincoln a Broker drew into a Bill, and prevailed with Doctor SDS, Preach- er on Easter Tuesday at the Spittle, to read it openly in the Pulpit, which so stirred up many, that strangers could hardly pass the streets, but were stricken, and sometimes beaten down. At last, the King, seeing many of the Pretences and other af- semblings, rid some strangers houfe to house, and much mischief was like to be done: but by the care of the Mayor and Aldermen, and by the industry of Robert Brak Recorder, and Sir Thomas More that had been under-Sheriffe of London, they were gotten to be quiet, and many of the disturbers were sent to prison, whereof Lincoln and twelve other were hanged, four hundred more in their shirts; bound in ropes and halters about their necks (and thereupon called the black Wagon) were brought to Woff- minster, where the King himfelf fed that day; and when the Cardinal had charged them with the greatnes of their offence; they all cried, Mercy, Mercy: and then the King by the mouth of the Cardinal, pardoned them all; which clemency purchased the King no small love amongst the people.

In the ninth year, in June, King Henry had many Ambassadors at his Court; for whose entertainment he prepared a costly Juff; himself and twelve more against the Duke of Suffolk and other twelve. The King had on his head a Ladies fleev full of Diamonds; and perhaps Cardinal Woffley makes Dukes and Earls to serve him of Wine, and to hold the Ban on at the Lavatory: and when the Archbishop of Canterbury, writing a Letter to him, subscribed, Your Brother William of Canterbury, he took it in great dudgeon to be termed his Brother.

It was now the tenth year of King Henry's Reign, when the King of France, longning much to have Tourney refrained to him, by great gifts and greater promises won the Cardinal Woffley, to move the King in it; who upon his perussions, was contented to be treated with all about it; so to which the King of France sent the Lord Banquet High Admiral of France, and the Bishop of Paris, who in their attendance, having above fourtore Gentlemen, and with their servants and all, above twelve hundred, arrived in England; and on Monday the seven and twentieth of September, at Blackheath by the Earl of Surrey, High Admiral of England, attended likewise with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodg'd at Merchant-Taylors Hall: The last of September, the Ambassador went to the King at Greenwich, where after long communication, an Agreement was last concluded under pretence of a marriage to be had between the Dauphin of France and the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England; that in name of her marriage money, Tourney should be delivered to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Castle he had made in that City, six hundred thousand Crowns in twelve years, but fifty thousand Crowns yearly: and if the Marriage should chance not to take effect, then that Tourney should be again referred to the King of England; for perfonal没 how much of his Chattents. Hostages should be delivered; namely, Mounfieur de Menouancie, Mounfieur de Mannec, Mounfieur de May, and Mounfieur Morret; and moreover, the French King should pay to the Cardinal of England a thousand Marks yearly, in recompence of his Revenues, received before of his Bithoprick of Tourney: All things thus concluded, the Cardinal made to the Ambassador a solemn Banquet, and after presented them with a flately Mummary. The eighth of October, the King feated them at Greenwich, and at eight even presented a Rare Mask of Knights and Ladies, with rare devices and great magnificence: The next day, Sir Thomas Exem Mayor of London feated them at Goldsmiths Hall, and then delivering their four Hostages, they took their leave. At whose departure the King gave to the Admiral of France, a garnish of gilt Vehfels, a pair of covered Basons gilt, twelve great gilt Bowls, four pair of great gilt Pots, a standing Cup of Gold, garn Sherd with great Pearles; and to some other he gave Plate, to some other Chains of Gold, to fome rich Apparel: to the great commendation of his liberality. Shortly after their departure, the Earl of Warenfey, Lord Chamberlain, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord of St. John, Sir Nicholas Vace, Sir John Pechy, and Sir John Sulien, as Ambassador from the King of England, accompanied with Knights, Gentlemen, and others, in the number of above four hundred armed and unarm'd, and in Carriages, and from thence went to Paris; where, after Royal entertainment by the King, with divers Masks and flately Shews, they took their leaves and rode to Tourney to see the City deliver'd to the French men, on the eighth of February, to the great grief of the English Cartífon. After the English Ambassador were returned, King Henry to clear up the four French Hostages, left here for performance of Covenants, on the feventh of May, presented a solemn and flately Mask, wherein himself, the Duke of Suffolk, and French Queen were Attors: and on the eight of March following was a Solemn Jults helden, and with great magnificence performed.

In the eleventh year of King Henry's Reign died the Emperor Maximilian, for whom, the King caused a solemn Obleque to be kept in Pauls Church. After whose death, to the French King and the King of Spain endeavours by fundry plots each of them to get the Empire; but in conclusion, Charles King of Ciffile (afterwards called Charles the fifth) was elected Emperor; for joy whereof a solemn Mafs was sung at Pauls, the feventh of July, at which were present the Cardinal Campaignis, the Cardinal of York, the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk, and Suffolk, with the Ambassadors of Spain, France, Venice, and Scotland: And this year the King kept Saint George Feast at Windsor, with great solemnity.

At this time divers young Gentlemen that had been in France, after the manner of that Country, carried themselves; so familiarly with the Kings, that the Lords of his Council thought it a disparagement to them; and thereupon, with his leave first obtained, they banished them the Court, and in their places brought in more fane and grave men, as Sir Richard Wifedge, Sir Richard Terningham, Sir Richard Woffley, and Sir William Kingdon.

In the Summer of this year, the Queen, lying at her Manour of Hawning in Essex, desired the King to bring thither the four Hostages of France, to whom she made a Royal Banquet, and in September following, the King lying at his Manour of Newholt in Essex, otherwise called M beautifull.

Beaulieu, where he had newly built a stately mansion, invited the Queen and the French Hostages thither, whereafter a sumptuous Banquet, he prevailed upon them with an extraordinary Mask; for the Masters were the Duke of Suffolk, and the Earl of Effex, the Marquis of Dorset, the Lord Mayor of London, Sir Richard Winsted, Sir Richard Wastyn, and Sir William Kingston, the youngest of whom was fifty years old at least, that the Ladies might see what force they had to make age young again.

At this time the French King was very desirous to see the King of England, with whom he had entered into such a League of alliance, and to that end made means to the Cardinal, that there might be an interview between them at some convenient place, to which the Cardinal, not so much to satisfy the French King, as to shew his own greatnes in France easily condenced; and thereupon persuaded King Henry, how necessary it was, that such an interview should be: and then were sent to Gascoyne, under the rule of Sir Edward Belknappe, some fay three thousand, but Godwin fay eleven hundred; whereas three hundred Masons, five hundred Carpenters, two hundred Painters, Glifters, and other Artificers, who spent two months erecting the Building built on the Plain before the Castle of Guignes, a magnificent Palace of Timber, expressly made without and within, wherein both the Kings in June next following, agreeing to come, and to answer all comers at the Tilt, Tourneys, and Barriers; whereas Proclamation was made in the Court of England by Orléance King of Arms of France, and in the Court of France by Clarenceus King of Arms of England: whereas these things were preparing on Condition thus, as the King and Queen were come from Even-fog to their Manour of Greenwich; suddenly there blew a Trumpet, and then entered into the Queens Chamber four Gentlemen, who brought with them a Wagon, in which sat a Lady richly apparelled; which Lady acquainted the King, that the four Gentlemen, there present, were come for the Love of their Ladies, to answer all comers at the Tilt on a day by the King to be appointed; which day was thereupon appointed on Shrovetide next ensuing, where they all behaved themselves with great valor, to the great delight of the King and Queen.

By this time King Henry was ready for his journey into France, and so removing from his Manour of Greenwich, on Friday the fifth and twentieth of May, he with his Queen arrived at Canterbury, where he meant to keep his Whit-sunday. At which time the Emperor Charlel, returning out of Spain, arrived on the Coast of Kent, where by the Vice-Admiral of England, Sir William Fitz-william he was conducted to land, and there met and received by the Lord Cardinal in greatstate. After which the King himself rode to Dover, to welcome him and on Whit-Sunday early in the morning conducted him to Canterbury, where they spent all the Whitsunday in great joy and foliage. The chief cause that moved the Emperor at this time to come on land, was to have dissuaded the King from any interview with the French King, but when he saw him so forward in that journey, he then only endeavoured to persuade him, that he should put no trust in the French King’s words, and with great gifts and promises, prevailed with the Cardinal to join with him in this persuasion. The last of May the Emperor took his leave, and the same day the King made fall from Dover and landed at Calais, together with the Queen and many Lords and Ladies. The fourth of June the King and Queen removed from Calais, to his Privately Lodging beside the Town of Guignes, the most Royal Building that ever was seen; likewise Francis the French King had his lodging prepared close to the Town of Ard, in a strange but most magnificent fashion. Both Kings had given power and authority to the Cardinal to affirm and confirm, bind or unbind whatsoever should be in difference between them; no less an honour to the Cardinal than confidence in the Kings. On Thursday the seventeenth of June, the Kings met in the vale of Adventure so magnificently attired, both themselves and all their followers, that from thence it was called the Camp of cloth of Gold. Here they spent that day in loving compliances, and at night departed, the one to Guignes, the other to Ard. On Saturday the ninth of June, were set up in a place within the English pale two Trees of Honour, with fitly rooms and stages for the Queen, and thither thither two Kings came, more Royally accompanied; where in most magnificent manner they performed acts of valour, both on foot and horseback; and after them all the great Lords both of France and England did the like: this solemnity of Judas and Masks was continued to the four and twentieth day of June; at which time the Kings and Queens took leave of each other: the French King and Queen removed to Ard, the King and Queen of England to Calais, where he remained till the tenth of July, and then riding toward graveling was by the way met by the Empereur, and by him conducted thither, and in most Royal manner entertained; whereof when the French King heard, he began from that day forward, to have King Henry in a kind of jealousy, as though to love him and the Emperor both were inconstant, and could not stand together. On Wednesday the eleventh of July, the Emperor and his Aunt the Lady Margaret Ditcheful Savoy, came with the King of England to the Town of Calais, and there continued with Feasting, Dancing, and Masking, till the fourteenth of July. In which time, all the Articles of the League of Tripartite, between the Emperor and the Kings of England and France were reviewed; to which the King of France had so fully condenced, that he had sent Monseigneur de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of credence; that in the word of a Prince he would inviolably observe and keep them all: which notwithstanding, he dispensed with his confidence afterward, in breaking them all. On Saturday July 14, the Emperor took his leave and went to graveling; the King with his Queen returned into England.

It was now the twelfth year of King Henry’s Reign, when being returned from Calais, he kept his Christmas at Greenwich with great magnificence;
The Cardinal had long borne a grudge against the Duke of Buckingham, for speaking certain words in his disgrace, and now hath made his way for revenge. It is said that the Duke once holding the Baion to the King; the Cardinal when the King had done, presently dipped his hands in the same water; which the Duke disdaining, shed the water in his Shooter; with which the Cardinal incensed, that the Duke would sit upon his throne. The Duke, to shew that he might take notice of the Cardinals malice, came the next day to Court richly apparelled, but without skirts to his Doublet. The King demanding, what he meant by that strange fashion? he answered readily, that it was done by way of prevention; for now the Cardinal should not sit upon his skirts. But this Jelt did the Duke so good, for the Earl of Surrey Lord Admiral, who had married the Dukes Daughter, the Cardinal had caused to be sent Deputy into Ireland, and the Earl of Northumberland, the Dukes special friend, he had caused upon certain suspected crimes to be imprisoned; so as the Duke having his friends sequestred from him, he lay now open to accusations, and accusations shall not be wanting; for the Duke having some time before put from him in disfavour one Charles Knott, that had been his Surveyor, and inward with him; his old Cardinal sets to him, that he would thereby get out of him against the Duke. And whether it was out of desire, or out of hope of reward; or because the matter was so offended, this Knott confessed to the Cardinal, that the Duke had once fully determined to make away the King; being brought into a hope to be King himself by a vain Prephete, which one Nicholas Hopkins (a Monk of an House of the Charter Order, besides Brixton, called Henton) sometimes his Confessor, had opened to him; and as for the Cardinal, that he had often heard the Duke swear, he would punish him soundly for his manifold mifdoings. And now had the Cardinal matter enough for Accusation, which he so aggravate to the King, that the King bade him do with him according to Law. Hereupon the Duke is apprehended, and brought to the Tower by Sir Henry Morys Captain of the Guard, the fifteenth of April, and shortly after in Guildhall before Sir John Bragg, then Lord Mayor, was indicted of divers points of high Treason; the substance whereof was, that in the second year of the Kings Reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the Kings death at London and at Thornbery in Gloucestershire; and that in the fifth year of the Kings Reign, he went in perfon to the Priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him he should be King; and that he had often said to the Lord Archbishop, who had married his Daughter, that if King Henry died without issue he would look to have the Crown himself. Upon these points he was arraigned in Westminster Hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting then as High Steward of England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marques Dorset, the Ears of Worcester, Devonshire, Eves, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford and Darby; the Lord of St. Johns de la Ware, Fitzwater, Willoughby, Brook, Cobbam, Herbert, and Morley. The Duke pleaded for himself till he sweat again, but all boosted not; for by thfe Peers he was found guilty and condemned, and so on Friday the seventeenth of May, was led by John Keynes, and John Sevession Sheriffs of London to the Scaffold on Tower Hill, there and there beheaded. The Augue Triers took his body and head, and buried them. This Edward Baman, Duke of Buckingham was the last High-Constable of England the greatest place, next the High Steward, in the Kingdom whose power extended to reftain some actions of the King. He was also Earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton; He married Eleanor the Daughter of Henry Earl of Northumberland, and had Issue Henry Lord Stafford (Father to Henry Lord Stafford late living) and three Daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, Katherine married to Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmorland, and Mary married to George Nevil Lord of Aungavory.

In this mean while, a New War was begun between the Emperor and the King of France for compelling whereof, the Cardinal of York was sent attended with the Earl of Worecest, Lord Chamberlain, the Lord of Saint John, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Humber, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, the Duke of Armagh, Sir Thomas Bollen, Sir John Pen, Sir John Hufsey, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Henry Guiffard, and many other Knights, Gentlemen, and Doctors. On the twelfth of July he arrived at Callicy, whither came to him the Chancellour of France, and the Count de Police attended with four Hundred Horfe, as Ambaffadors from the French King; and from the Emperor the like, with Commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Ambaffadors from the Pope, whom the Cardinal moved to have the Pope to be a party also in their League, but they wanting Commission, Letters were presently sent to Rome about it, and in the time till answer might be had, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to speak with the Emperor, with whom having layed thirteen daies, after most Royal Entertainment, he returned back to Callicy; and then fell presently to the Treaty of Peace with the French Princes, but was colder in the matter than he was before, as having had his edge taken off by some dealings with the Emperor, fof no thing was concluded; but that the Fishermen of both the Princes might freely Fish on the Seas without disturbance, till the end of February following; whereof he sent adverfitement to both the Princes; to the Emperor by the Lord of Saint John, and Sir Thomas Bollen; to the French King by the Earl of Worcester, and the Bishop of Ely. During all which time of the Cardinals stay in Callicy, all Writs and Patents were there by him seal'd, and no Sheriffe could be chofen for lack of preference, having the Great Seal there with him, and full power in things, as if the King had been there in perfon. Before he returned, he made a new League with the Emperor, and intimated to the French King, that he doubted the King of England would not hereafter be so much his friend, as heretofore he had been; whereas, though the King of France were much offended, yet he signified by his Letters (perhaps discomfortingly) that he would continue the King of England’s friend as much as ever: only he inveighed against the Cardinal, as a man of no truth, and withdrew many of the Pensions which he had before given to some English. Presently upon this, was Tournay beleiged by the Lord Hugh of Mancoda a Spaniard; and though the French King sent great Forces to succour it; yet it was rended up to the Emperor the 1st of November, in the thirteenth year of King Henry’s Reign.

This year Pope Leo died the first of December, suspected to be poisoned by Barnaby Mallespin his Chamberlain, whose Office was always to give him drink. After whose death, Doctor Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in the behalf of the Cardinal of York; who was brought into a hope through the Kings favour to be elected Pope: but that hope was soon quailed; for before Doctor Pace could get to Rome, Adrian the sixth was chosen Pope. This Doctor Pace was a very Learned and Religious man, yet through croffes in his employment fell mad and died; in whose place of employment succeeded Doctor Stephen Gardiner.

On the second of February, King Henry being then at Greenwich, received a Bull from the Pope, whereby he had the Title given him to be Defender of the Christian Faith, for him and his Successors for ever; which Title was ascribed to him for writing a Book against Luther, as it was given out; but thought to be written by Sir Thomas More, or by Fisher Bishop of Rochester: of which Book (faith Holinghead) I will only say thus much, that King Henry in his Book, is reported to rage against the Devil and Antichrist, to cast out his foam against Luther, to raise out the Name of the Pope, and yet to allow his Law, Which Book Luther answered with as little respect to the King, as the King had done to him.

In this mean time, many difpleasures grew between the two Kings of England and France; specially two: one, that Frenchmen feized upon English Ships as they paffed: for remedy whereof, one Christopher Cree an expert Seaman, was fent with five Ships to safeguard the Merchants. Another, that the Duke of Albany was returned into Scotland, contrary to that which was covenanted by the League; which though the King of France denied to be done with his privy, yet King Henry knew the Duke of Albany had Commiffion from the French King to return, which did the more exasperate him; and hereupon were Mutters made in England, and a note taken of what habitation all men were.

This year died the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, Sir John Peche, and Sir Edward Pelham, all valiant Captains, suspected to have been poysoned at a Banquet made at Ard, when the two Kings met last.

At this time Owen Douglass Bishop of Dasa killed out of Scotland into England, because the Duke of Albany, being come thither, had taken upon him the whole government of the King and Kingdom; whereupon Clarentia the Herauld was sent into Scotland, to command the Duke of Albany to avoid that Realm; which he refusing, the Herauld was commanded to defie him. Thereupon the French King feized all English mens goods in Bondurancie, and imprisoned their perfons; and retained not only the money to be paid for the restitution of Tournay, but also withheld the French Queens Dowr: whereof, when King Henry underftood, he called the French Ambassador refraining in England, to give account thereof; who thought he gave the bare reasons he could to excuse it, yet was commanded to keep his house; and the French Hoftages remaining here, for the money to be paid for the delivery of Tour- naye, were restrained of their liberty, and com- mitted to the custody of the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Andrew Windja, and Sir Thomas Nevyle; each of them to keep one; and withall, all French men in London were committed to prison, and put to their Fines; and all Scotch men much more. There were then also sent to Sea under the conduct of Sir William Fitz-William Vice-Admiral, eight and twenty great Ships, and seven more towards Scotland; who set fire on many Scotch Ships in the Haven, and at length took many prifoners and returned.

King Henry hearing, that the Emperor would come to Callicre, to pass into England, as he went into Spain; appointed the Lord Marques Doffet, to go to Callicre, there to receive him, and the Cardinal to receive him at Dover. The Cardinal taking his journey thither on the tenth of May, rode through London, accompanied with two Earls, six and thirty Knights, and a hundred Gentlemen, eight Bis- hophs, ten Abbots, thirty Chaplains, all in Velvet and Sattin; and Yeomen seven hun- dred. The five and twentieth of May being Sunday, the Marques Doffet with the Bishop of Chichefor, the Lord de la Warre, and divers others, at the water of Graveling, received the Emperor, and with all honour brought him to Callicre, where he was received with Procelenion, by the Lord Bernre Lieutenant of the Town, On Monday he took Shipping at Callicre, and landed at Dover; where the Cardinal with three hundred Lords, Knights and Gentleman received him, and in great state brought him to the Castle, where he was lodged. On Wednesday being Ascension even, the King came to Dover, and there with great joy and gladness the Emperor and he met. On Friday in the afternoon they departed from Dover, and came that night to Canterbury, and from thence the next day to Greenwich, where the Queen received her Nephew with all the joy that might be. Here to honour the Emperours presence, Royal Jufts and Turneys were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonshire, and ten Aids, kept the place against the Duke of Suffolk, the Marques Doffet, and other ten Aids, on their part. On Friday the fifth of June, the Emperor and the King with all their Companies went to London, where the City City received them with Pageants, and other as rare devices, as at a Coronation, and the Emperor was lodged at the Black-friers, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whitsunday the King and the Emperor rode to the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauli, where the Cardinal sung Mass, and had his Traveller and his Cup-board. Before Mass, two Barons gave him water, and after the Gospel, two Earls, and the next day, the Duke of York, which pride the Spaniards much disdained. After many Festivals in other places, at last they rode to Windsor, where they stayed a whole week; and there, on Corpus Christi day, the Emperor wore the Mantle of the Garter, and sat in his own Stall. On the same day both the Princes received the Sacrament, and took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them. On the morrow after, they came to Winchester; before whom coming thither there was come to Hampton, the Earl of Surrey Admiral of England, with all the Kings Navy, and with him the Lord Fitzwater, the Baron Carvel, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, Sir William Barettine, Sir Adrian Furse, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlin, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Anthony Poynt, Sir Henry Sherburn, and the Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-williams, Sir Edward John Cornwall, Sir John Wallop, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir William Sidney, Anthony Brown, Giles Hussy, Thomas Moor, John Raffell, Edward Bray, Henry Owen, George Cibbem, Thomas Oldhall, Thomas Level, Robert Ichingham, Anthony Kvet, Sir John Trenaille, Sir William Skivington Master of the Ordinance, and John Fabian Serjeant at Arms, by whom chiefly a design was moved, though now noised only that it was butto scour the Seas for thesafe conducting of the Emperor. For the Earl of Surrey, having wafted the Emperor over to the Coast of Bukey, upon his return, made to the Coast of Britain; and there landing seven thousand of his men, marched to the Town of Marley, and by assault took it: having won this Town the Earl called to him certain Gentlemen and made them Knights; as Sir Francis Brian, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas Moor, Sir Giles Hussy, Sir William Ichingham, Sir John Rainford, Sir George Cobham, Sir John Cornwall, Sir Edward Edgley, and some others; and after the Earl had lain a while on the Coast of Britain, he was commanded home by the Kings Letters: who thereupon brought back his whole Fleet to a place called the Cow under the Isle of Wight, and then went on land, leaving divers of his Ships under the Government of the Vice Admiral Sir William Fitz-williams.

In this mean time divers exploitst were achieved between them of the Giron in the Marches of Callic, and the French men of Buflage; where the French commonly had the worst: but being of no great moment, may well be passed over without relating. Likewise at the same time the Lord Risf, and the Lord Dukes of the North, appointed to keep the Borders against Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelfie, and fourcure Villages, and overthrow eighteen Towers of stone, with all their Bulwarks.

King Henry intending now to go seriously on with his Wars in France, levied an Army, which under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey, he went over to Callic; whether the Earl being come, he divided his Army into three Battals: the first was led by Sir Robert Raleigh; Lord Fitzwater, the middleward by himself; and his Brother the Lord Edmund Howard, the Rearward by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Winkfield, both of them Knights of the Garter: and Sir Edmund Gualdeford was Captain of the Horsemen. In this Order the Earl entered the French ground the second of September, and took his Journey towards Hedring. By the way there came to him a great power of Burgoguins, sent by the Lady Margaret, according to the Articles of the League. All the Towns, Villages, and Castles in the Country, through which they passed, they burnt and sacked; as the Town and Castle of Selles, the Town of Brunbridge, Stenker, Basington, and Mansfield, with divers others. On the 15. of September, they came before the Castle of Hedring, and laid siege unto it; but the Castle being well fortified, and the Earl having not battering Ordinance, which by reason of the foul weather, he could not bring with him, after eleven days he raised his siege; and published to the Town of Dorset, that the Town and raised the Callic, as also the Town of Dorset, and then the year being far spent, came back to Callic the sixteenth of October.

At this time the Duke of Albay, being established Governor of Scotland, raised an Army of fourcure thousand men, with which he approached the Borders, but made no Invasion, as thinking perhaps that the only report of his great Army would fright the English; but yet this stayed not the Lord Marguls Dorset, Warren of the East and middle Marches, to enter into Tividale, and fo forward ten Miles into Galloway, burning all Towns and Villages on every side as he passed. All that night he carried within the Scottish ground, and the next day being Good-Friday, withdrew back into England, with a head of four thousand Cartel; having burned Grimley, Monmouth, Dunford, Myles, Askew, Cramling, and many other Towns and Villages.

In King Henry's fourteenth year, on the fifteenth of April began a Parliament, which was holden at the Black-friers, whether the King came, and there set down in his Royal Seat; at his feet on the right side sat the Cardinal of York, and the Archbishop of Canterbury; and at the Rail behind stood Doctor Twisde Bishop of London, who making an Oration, told there the causes of calling this Parliament; which were (as he said) for remedying of mischiefs by the Common Law, as Recoveries, Foreign Vouchers, and corrupt Trials; and for making new Laws for the good of the Commonwealth; whereof notwithstanding, no one word was spoken all the time of the Parliament, nor any other thing done, but a Subsidy granted; but howsoever, being commanded to chuse their Speaker, they chose Sir Thomas More, who at first disdaining himself, at last made two Petiti-
The Speaker makes two Petitions to the King.

A subsidy with much ado granted.

The Cardinal to move them to it, bore them in hand, that the Lords had agreed to four shillings of the pound; which was untrue, for the Lords had granted nothing, but stayed to see what the Commons would do, whereof when the King heard, he reproved the Cardinal for it; saying withal, that ere it were long, he would look to things himself, without any Substitution. Which speech of the Kings, thought it danted the Cardinal for a while, yet he soon recovered his spirits, and was as paremptory afterward as he had been before. After this the Parliament was Prorogued till the tenth of June; during which Prorogation, the Commons people laid to the Burgess. We hear say, you will grant four shillings of the pound, we advise you not to do so, that you may go home, with many like threarings. At this time, the Cardinal, by his power Legantine, dissolved his Convocation at Paul, convoked by the Archbishop of Canterbury, calling him and all the Clergy to the Convocation at Westminster: which was never seen before in England (De Hal. 465.) and thirtieth of July, the Parliament was adjourned to Westminster; and there continuing till the thirtieth of August, was that day nine of the clock at night finished.

About this time the Bishop of Durham died, and the King gave that Bishoprick to the Doctor; who resigned the Bishoprick of Bath to Doctor John Clerk, Master of the Rolls; and Sir Henry Marnet, who was Vice-Chamberlain, was made Lord Privy Seal, and shortly after was created Lord Marnet: Also during this Parliament, Sir Arthur Plantagenet, Ballard, son to King Edward the fourth, at Bridewell, was created Vicount Lisle, in the right of his Wife, who was Wife before to Edmund Dudley, beheaded.

The fifteenth of June, in the fifteenth year of the Kings Reign, Christian King of Denmark with his Queen, driven out of his Country, came into England, and was lodged at Bath; and after he had been feated by the King and the Queen of England, and received great gifts of both, returned again into Flender, where he remained as a banished man: some years after, King Henry sent Doctor Henry Standish, Bishop of St. Asaph, and Sir John Baker Knight, into Denmark, to perwade the people to receive him again into his Kingdom; but they could not prevail, he was so much hated for his cruelty.

About this time the Earl of Kildare, having recovered again the favour of the Cardinal, was sent Deputy into Ireland, as he had been before, where he reduced the wild Irish to indifferent conformity. All this while had England Wars both with the French and with the Scots. In Scotland the Marquess of Dorset threw down the Castles of Wodborough, of Nef, gate, of Blackettar, of Mackail, and burnt to the number of seven and thirty Villages, yet never came to skirmish. In France the Lords Sands, Treasurer of Calais, with twelve hundred armed men went before Bullogne, where he skirmished with the Enemy; and after taking divers Churches and Castles in the Enemies Countrey, returned back to Calais, with the 106

The Duke of Suffolk, in feft with an Army in France.

Joys only of a dozen men. King Henry being advertised that the Duke of Albany was providing of Forces in France, with which to return into Scotland, sent forth his Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-williams with 200 beat for thousand French.

The Duke of Suffolk, in feft with an Army in France.

All this while King Henry had plaid with the French, but now he means to be in earnest, and therefore sends over the Duke of Suffolk with an Army, the four and twentieth of August; attended with the Lord Monteacute and his Brother Sir Arthur Pool, the Lord Hertford, Son to the Earl of Worcester, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Morney, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkley, the Lord Powis, and the Baron Carlows, Sir Richard Wingfield, Chancellour of the Duchy of Lancaster, Sir John Vere, Sir Edward Neville, Sir William Kingfime, Sir Richard Wofen, Sir Andrew Wifne, Sir Robert Wingfield, Sir Anthony Wingfield, Sir Edward Guiffor, Sir Edward Greville, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir Everard Digby, Sir Adriam Fyfle, Sir Richard Cowfield, Sir William Garrett, Sir William Sidney, Sir Henry Osa, and many other Knights and Gentlemen. In the whole Army were six hundred Demi-lances, two hundred Archers on Horfeback, three thousand Archers on foot, and five thousand Bill-men. Also seventeen hundred taken out of the Garrisons of Hamfomes, Guiffor, and Collices, in all ten thousand and five hundred, besides two thousand fix hundred Labourers and Pioneers. With this Army the Duke of Suffolk took the field, his Vanguard was led by the Lord Sand, the Captain of the right Wing was Sir William Kingfime, and of the left Sir Everard Digby: the Captain of all the Horfemen was Sir Edward Guiffor, Marfhal of Collices; the Duke himself led the Battel, and Sir Richard Wingfield the Rearward. The Dukes enterprize was the winning of Bell Castle, which the Lord Sands and the Lord Ferrers attempted, and had it yielded to them; and then Sir William Wingfime was placed Captain in it. At this time the Dutch of Bourbon, high Confiable of France, began to have his minde alienated from the King of France, and to draw him the more on, the Duke of Suffolk sent Sir John Keffel (afterward created Duke of Bedford) to him, who paffing in disguised Apparel, so prevailed with him, that he profeffed to take part with the Emperour, and the King of England; who having ten thousand Almains in his pay, it was thought fit (for encouragement of the English) to proclaim in the Army the access of so powerful an affiainant: and thereupon the Duke of Suffolk, removed to Asl and go forward into Picardy. At Corders between Terrin and St. Omer, there came to him the Lord of Jiflivein, and with him of Spaniards, Almains, and others, three thousand foartmen, and five hundred Horfe. With these Forces, the Duke marching on, took forth the rich Town of Ancor, then the Castle of Beanguard, and then by an fault the Town of Bray, though two thousand good men of War were in it: After this, the Towns of Cappe, and Roy, Lihons and Duncker. And then came before the Town of Montedidier, in which were a thousand foot and five hundred horfe; yet upon Sir William Seyguing, Batteries was yielded to him. From hence he removed to Roy, where he joined with his whole Army; and there on Abockland day, in the chief Church of Roy, made Knigifs, the Lord Herlet, the Lord Powis, Oliver Mavors, Arthur Pool, Richard Sands, Robert Jorningham, Robert Saluyry, Edward Benningfield, Rich-ard Corlett, Thomas Wentworth, William Star-ten, Walter Mavis, George Warram, and Edward Seynor (that was after Duke of Somerset.) The day after, the Army removed to a place called Nicle, from thence to Penva, and then to Eminford, where the Duke made John Dudley, and Robert Ulryght Knights, and from thence on the eighth of November, to a place called Mum Saint Martin; here the Wiffmen began to murmure, that they might not return home, the Winter being so far spent; but there was to the number of a thousand persons, under the leading of Sir John Wihfampe, who having no wages but what they could get by booties, and were therefore called Armes; these, and others, and the Wiffmen, had more desire to stay, than the Wiffmen had to be gone; for the great gains they made by the poifs of so many Towns that were taken. The thirteenth of November the Duke removed to a place within two miles of Begnain Castle, defended by great Marifhes, that lay before it, but the Froit being at that time so great that many lost their Fingers and Toes with cold, and some died; Sir Edward Guiffor acquainted the Duke, that he thought the Marifhes were hard enough frozen to bear great Ordinance; whereupon the Duke bid him venture it then and go on, which he resolutely did, and had the Castle prettily delivered up to him. In this mean time, the King hearing in what state the Army was, had prepared his thousand men to be sent to the Duke for a relief, under the leading of the Lord Mowsey; but before they could be put in order to pafs the Sea, the Duke, partly by the extremity of the weather, and partly by the murmuring of the Souldiers, was constrained to break up his Army, and return to Collices.

In this mean time, the Scots knowing that the strength of England was gone into France, took boldeñefs to invade the Marches; but then the Earl of Surrey, Treasurer and High Admiral of England, with fix thousand men, being fent againŠthem, took divers of their Caftles and Holds; and at Tewdrich, skirmishing with a great Garrison of Scots, overthrew them, and took and burned both the Town and Castle. And now the French King finding that the Scots did not work any great trouble to the English, whereby to keep them from molesting of France, and thinking it to be for want of the Duke of Albynnes præsence, whom they accounted their Gouvernor, he therefore prepared a Navy of Ships to reinforce him in to Scotland; but when the Duke of Albyn heard that Sir William Fitz-williams was sent with a great Fleeter to stop his passage, he brought his Ships into the Haven of Brest, and gave it out that he would not go into Scotland that year; which being told to the King of England, he commanded that his Ships also should be laid up in Havens till the next Spring, and now he left the curing of the Scur; for when he saw the Kings Ships discharged, he then boldy took Shipping himself, and failed into Scotland; whether being come he presently levied a great Army, and approached the English Borders; but when he heard the Earl of Surrey was coming against him with a mighty power, he then sent a Herald to him, promising of his Honour, to give him Barrat; and if he took him prisoner, to give him good quarter. To whom the Earl answered, that he would not fail to abide his Battel; but if he took him prisoner, the quarter, he would give him, should he be cut off his head, and send it for a Prentis to his Master the King of England. At this time, the Earl of Surrey being at Auerweck, came the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, the Lords Clifford, Dacre, Lanier, Ogle, and Dare, with many Knights, Gentlemen, and other Souldiers, to the number of forty thousand; and from the Court came the Master of the Horse, Sir Nicholau Carr, the Earl of Westmorland, and others. The lad of October, the Duke of Albien sent two or three thousand men over the water to besiege the Castle of Warke; who by battery of their Ordinances won the outermost Ward, called the Barnekin; and continuing their battery, won the second Ward; but then Sir William Lisfe, that was Captain of the Castle, in his forth with those few he had left, drove the French men from the place, and slew of them to the number of three hundred: a memorable service, and for which the Earl of Surrey afterwards gave him great thanks. The Earl would gladly have followed his Enemies into their own Borders, but that his Commision was only to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after the Queen of Scots, Mother to the King, sent to her Brother the King of England, for an intollence from War, till a further communication might be had; which being granted, the English Army brake up, and the Earl of Surrey returned to the Court.

And now for a while we must be content to hear of petty occurrences, because greater did not happen; which if it make us like the story of the worfe, it may make us like the times the better; seeing they are over the best times that afford least matter to be talked of: but this time will last but a while; for shortly we shall come to hear Occurrences, that have been matter of talk to this day, whereof the like have never scarce been seen, and will hardly be believed, when they are heard; a Marriage dissolved after twenty years consummation; Houses built in Piety, under pretence of Piety demolished; a King made a Captive; a Pope held a Prisoner; Queens taken out of love, put to death out of loathing; and the Church stile shaken, that it hath stood in dissonance ever since.

At this time the Emperor Charles sent to the King of England two Mules trapped in Crimdon Velvet, richly embroidered; also eleven goodly Jennets trapped with Ruffler Velvet, richly wrought; four Spears, and two Javelins of strange Timber, and work richly garnished; and five Brace of Grey-hounds. To the Queen he sent two Mules richly trapped, and high Chairs after the Spanish fashion; which Presents were thankfully received both of the King and Queen.

At this time in the month of October the Cardinal sent our Commissions, that every man, being worth forty pounds, should pay the whole Subbidy before granted, out of hand; which he called an Anticipation: which fine new word, he thought, would make them pay their money the more willingly; but they loved their money better than any words he could devise.

In this year the King sent the Lord Morley, Sir William Hulffy Knight, and Doctor Lee his Almoner, to Ferdinand Archduke of Auffria, with the Order of the Garter; which he received in the Town of Nuremberg, to his great contentment.

In this year, through Books of Prognostications, foreseeing much hurt to come by wars and floods, many persons withdrew themselves to high grounds, for securing themselves specially one Bolon, Prior of Saint Barthelemy in Smithfield, builded him an House upon Harrow on the Hill, and thither went and made provision for two months. These great waters should have fallen in February, but no such thing happening, the Albatrosses excused themselves, by saying, that in the computation they had misconceived in their number an hundred years.

In this mean time, many enterprizes were attempted, between the English men of Callice and Guystage, and the French men of Bulilign and the Frontiers of Picardie; and till Sir Williams Fitz-williams Captain of Guystage; Sir Robert Jenningham, Captain of Newham Bridge, Sir John Walsop, and Sir John Gage, were the men that did the French most hurt.

This year, the first of September, was Doctor Thomas Hambledain, Master of the Rolls received into London, by Earls, Bishops, and divers Lords and Gentlemen, as Ambassadour from Pope Clement; who brought with him a Rofe of Gold for a prentis to the King; and on the day of the Nativity of our Lady, after a solemn Mass sung by the Cardinal of York, the said Prentis was delivered to the King, which was a Tree forged of fine Gold, and with Branches, Leaves, and Flowers refembling Roses.

About the beginning of Winter, the Adventurers called Kreegers being not above two hundred, and of them five and twenty Horlomans, made an attempt to fetch some booby from a Village not far from Mussell; whereas the Earl of Dammartin having notice, set upon them with a far greater number, and flew most of them; and this was the end of the Kreegers, as brave men as ever served any Prince.

In the next year, there came to London divers Ambassadours out of Scotland, about a Peace to be had; and a marriage to be concluded, between the King of Scots, and the the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England.

At this time the Lord Leonard Gray, and the Lord John Gray, Brothers to the Lord Marchepis Daflets, Sir George Cobham Son to the Lord Cobham, William Cary, Sir John Dudley, Thomas Wyatt, Francis Points, Francis Sidney, Sr Anthony Brown, Sir Edward Seymour, Oliver Maunser, Percival Hart, Sebation Newdigate, and Thomas Calen, Esquires of the Kings Household, made a challenge of Arms against the Feast of Christmats, which was proclaimed by Winder the Herald, and performed at the time appointed very nobly, as Tills, Turneys, Barriers, and the assault of a CAffe erected for that purpose; in the Tile-yard at Greenwich, where the King held his Christmats that year with great state and magnificence.

About this time, John Jokin Steward of the Household to the French Kings Mother, came into England, and was received in secret manner, into the house of one Doctor Lark, a Prebendary of Saint Stephens; who oftentimes talked with the Cardinal, about a Peace to be concluded between the two Kings of England and France: of whose often Meetings Mounfieur de Prate the Emperours Ambaffador grew very jealous. The four and twentieth of January, Mounfieur Brinyon, President of Roum, came to London as Ambaffador from the French King, and was lodged with the said John Jokin; which small things should not be related; but that they were preparatives to great matters afterward.

On Sunday the fifth of March, were receiv'd into London Mounfieur de Beav Lord of Comber, Marshal of Flanders, Mounfieur John de la Cohe President of Maixies, and Mafter John de la Gheche, as Ambaffadors from the Lady Margaret in the name of the Emperour, who required three things. First they demanded the Lady Mary the Kings only Daughter to be presently delivered, and she to be named Emperour, and as Governes take possession of all the Low-Countries. Secondly, that all such summes of money as the King should give with her in Marriage should be paid incontinent. Thirdly, that the King of England should pay the Sea in person, and make War in France the next Summer. The first two demands were not agreed to for certain causes; and as to the third, the King said he would take time to advise. On Thursday the ninth of March a Gentleman came in Pult from the Lady Margaret, with Letters signifying, that whereas the King of France had lien long at the Siege of Paris, he had now ordered to raise his siege, and was himself taken prisoner by the Imperialists; for joy whereof, Bonfires and great Triumph was made in London, and on the twelfth of March being Sunday, the King himselfe came to Pauls, and there heard a solenn Mafi. But for all this shew of joy, it was thought, if the King of France had not now taken prisoner, that the King of England would have joyed in amity with him, as being angry with the Flemings; for Inhauling his Coyn in Flanders, which caufed much money to be conveyed out of England thither. The King of France being taken prisoner, was after some time conveyed into Spain, and at last brought to Medril, where he fell so fick, that the Physicains had little hope of his life, unless the Emperour would be pleased speedily to visit him; upon whose visitation he recovered his health, though not presently his strength: In which time many propositions were made for his delivery, but the Emperour would accept of none; without restitution of the Duchy of Burgauge. At last, the French King weary of imprisonement, and longing for liberty, was content to agree to any conditions: the chief whereof were, that the French King by a certain day should be set at liberty, and within six weeks after should resign to the Emperour the Duchy of Burgauge; with all Members pertaining to it; and at the same instant, should put into the Emperours hands the Dauphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleans his second Son, or else twelve principal Lords of France, whom the Emperour should name; and that there should be between them a League, and perpetual confederacy for defence of their estates: Of whose atonement when King Henry heard, as before he had exprefted plainehess that he was taken prisoner; so now he sent Sir Thomas Chirney to him, to express his joy for being set at liberty; to sudden the interchange of love and hate amongst great Princes. The French King being thus delivered, the Emperour married the Lady Iofelet, Daughter to Emanuel King of Portugal, and had with her in Dower eleven hundred thousand Duckets; though three years before, being at Windfor he had consented to give the Wife the Lady Mary the Kings Daughter.

At this time Cardinal Wolsey obtained Licenofe of the King to erect a Colledge at Oxford, and another at Ipswich; and towards the charge of them got leave also to suppress certain small Monaileries, to the number of forty; and after got a Confirmation of the Pope, that he might employ the Goods and Lands belonging to those House, to the maineance of those two Colleges: a pernicious Precedent; and that which made the King a way afterward, to make a general suppression of all Reiligions Houfes; though indeed there be great difference betweene converting of Monaileries into Colledges, and utter subverting them.

In March King Henry lent Cobert Tranfal Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Winkes field Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lowafters, into Spain, to confer with the Emperour about matters of great importance, and particularly about War to be made in France; and yet were these two Princes to this time in League; but he thought he obferved the carriage of these two Princes towards one another, and how convertible their Leagues were into War, and their War into Peace, shall finde it a strange Riddle of Regim di festo; and their Leagues to have been one fomple complements, where the fcale was turned with the leaft grain of a circumstance; and though they were bound by Oath, yet that Oath made the Leagues but little the firmer, seeing the League might be broken, and yet the Oath kept; for while one gave the occasion, and the other took it; though they were both accretaories, yet neither was principal; and where there

The Cardi- nal of Rome, Cardinal Wolsey, towards the erection of two Col- ledges.
At this time the French Kings Mother, as then Regent of France, procured by her Ambassadors, at first a Truce, and afterward a Peace with England, which was proclaimed in London, the eighth of September. By the Covenants of which Peace, the King of England should receive at certain days twenty thousand hundred Crowns, which in sterling money amounted to the summe of four hundred thousand pounds; whereas fifty was to be paid in hand. Sir William Fitz-williams, and Doctor Taylor; was sent to the Lady Regents, to take her corporal Oath, and likewise King Henry the four and twentieth of April, at Greenwich, in presence of the Ambassadors of France, Rome, and Venice, took his corporal Oath, to observe the Peace between him, and his loving Brother the French King, during his life, and one year after.

In this Winter was a great mortality in London, for the Term was adjourned, and the King kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with a small number, and was therefore called the still Christmas. At which time, the Cardinal coming to the Court, took order for altering the face of the Kings House: many Officers and other servants were discharged, and put to their penions, in which number were four-score and four Yeomen of the Guard: who before having had twelve pence the day with check, were now allowed but six pence the day without check, and commanded to go into their Countreys.

On Shrovetuesday this year, a solemn Juifs was held at Greenwich; the King and eleven other on the one part, the Marquefs of Exeter, and eleven other of the other part.

In his nineteenth year King Henry kept a solemn Christmas at Greenwich, with Revels, Masks, Disguisings, and Banquets, and the thirtieth of December and third of January were solemn Juifs held, when at length the King and fourteen other with him came to Greenwich, and there putting on masking Apparel, took his Barge, and rowed to the Cardinale place, where were at supper many Lords and Ladies, who danced with the Maskers, and after the Dancing was made a great Banquet. This Christmas was a Play at Graves-Inne, made by one Master Roe a Sergeant at Law; the effect whereof was, that Lord Government was ruled by Distraction and Negligence, by whose evil order Lady Publick Weal was put from Governance. This the Cardinal took to be meant by him; and thereupon sent the said Master Roe to the Fleece, though the Play were made long before the Cardinal had any authority; by which we may see how inurbable companion supficion is to a guilty conscience.

The fourteenth of January came to the Court Don Hugo de Arandoa, a Grandee of Spain, as Ambassadour from the Emperor to the King, with a large Commission, to make King Henry Judge, how just the conditions were, which the Emperor required of the King of France: and about this negotiation there were two years in England: so defirous the Emperor was to continue good correspondence with the King of England.

attire came to the Tilt, and ran many courses were broken; and then disarming them, they went into the Queen's Chamber, where a spacious Banquet was provided. But this Banquet was one of the last of the Queens preparing; for bitherto there had been no exception taken to the lawfulness of her marriage, but now came over Ambassador's from the King of France, requiring to have the Kings Daughter the Lady Mary, to be given in marriage to the Duke of Orleans, second Son to their Master the French King, wherein they that were the suitors for it, were the hinderers of it; for amongst it was the President of Paris, who made a doubt whether the marriage between King Henry and the Lady Katherine of Spain, having been his Brothers Wife, were lawful or no: but howsoever the French Ambassador's at Greenwich on Sunday the fifth of May, in the Name of their Master the French King, took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them during the Absence of the King shortly after we were forewarned Sir Thomas Bulmer, Vicount Rockward, and Sir Anthony Brown Knight, as Ambassador's to the King of France, to take his Oath in person for performance of the League.

But enough of small Occurrence; and indeed there will be Occurrences now more worthy to be related, but more lamentable to be heard; for now the Duke of Bourbon General of the Emperor's Army in Italy, was slain by a shot from the Walls of Rome, as he was passing by; upon whose death the Army entred and sacked the City, made the Pope flee to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and there coopered him up; abated the Cardinals, and put them to grievous ranonmes, spared neither Sacred Places, nor Religious Persons, but commeted all manner of barbarous and inhuman cruelty. These infolencies of the Emperor committed against the Pope; together with the hard conditions the Emperor had imposed upon the King of France for setting him at liberty: and the Emperours breach of promise in not marrying the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter, were the apparent caues of King Henry's breaking the League with the Emperor Charles: but more enforcing though concealed caue, perhaps was the growing greenness of the Emperor, by his acquitts in Italy and other places; enough to breed a jealousy in all neibhouring Princes; and indeed King Henry had some caue to think the Emperours spirits were grown higher with his Victories, seeing where before he was wont always to write Letters to King Henry with his own hand, and subscribe them, Your Son and Faithful Friend; now after his Victories in Italy, he causid his Secretaries to write them, subscribing only Charles; And yet a more preffing caue, though perhaps when the Cardinals spleen against the Emperor, for denying him the Bishopric of Toledo in Spain. But whichever of these was the predominant caue, all of them together made a caue sufficient for King Henry to fall off from amity with the Emperor; and his falling off from the Emperor, caue sufficient to fall in with the King of France: and thereupon the two Kings send their several Heraulds to the Emperor: King Henry's Herauld, the French King his Herauld Guyen, to expostulate their grievances with the Emperor, and the refusal to return a satisfactory Answer, to defe his as their Enemy. The Emperor heard the Heraulds with great temper, and answered Claevity very mildly; that he knew his Matters grievance was grounded upon misinformation, wherein he spake shortly reftifie him by his Letters, as defining nothing more than to continue his friend; but Guyen he answered roughly, bidding him tell his Master that he had broken his faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his liberty; and with these answers diffimated them; only Guyen not thinking it fit to deliver his answer, being in such terms, by word of mouth, obtained to have it sent in writing. The Heraulds being returned home, and delivering the answers; the King of France was so satisfied, to be charged with breach of faith, that he soon after sent an other defiance to the Emperor, telling him plain terms, that he lyed in his threat, and thereupon challenged him to the Combat, requiring him to appoint the field, and himself would the Weapons. The Emperor accetted the challenge, but other occurrences intervening hindered the performance.

In this mean time, the Cardinal was appoinind to go Ambassador to the King of France, carrying with him twelve score thousand pounds, to be employed by the French King, and other the Confederates, in a War against the Emperor, who the eleventh of July took shipping at Dover, and landed that day at Calais; with whom was Catthor Thonful Bishop of London, the Lord Sands Chamberlain to the King, the Earl of Dorly, Sir Henry Gutfard, Sir Thomas More, with other Knights and Gentlemen, in all to the number of twelve hundred Horse. At Anytime he was assisted by the French King himself, and by his Mother, and by all the chief Peers of France; By whom it was agreed, that Articles of Accord should be offered to the Emperor; which if refused then the French King should marry the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter, and they both to be Enemies to the Emperor. These things concluded, the Cardinal returned, and on the last of September came to the King of Richmond: In October following, there came Ambassador's from the French King, to take King Henry's Oath, for observing the League with the King of France: and on Sunday the tenth of November, King Henry at Greenwich received the Order of Saint Michael by the hands of the Lord Anna's de Membrance, great Master of the Kings Household, and Mountaine Humberies; as likewise the same day at Paris the French King received the Order of the Garter by the hands of the Lord Lisle, Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls, Sir Nicholas Carew Master of the Kings Horse, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Thomas Wratlaby Knight otherwise called Garen King of Arms, who were sent thereth with the whole Habit, Collar, and other Habilities of the Order.

The King of France gives the Emperor the Arts, and challenges him to a Combat.
Upon King Henry's defiance of the Emperor in the French Kings quarrel English Merchants their Ships and Goods were attacked in Spain, and in the Low-Countries, as likewise all Spaniards and Flemings Merchants were attacked here; which being very detrimental to both Nations; at last, by mediation of Hugo de Mendax, the Emperors Ambassadors to the Court, a reconciliation was made, and free traffic between the Nations was revived.

In his twentith year, on the two and twentith of February, Sir Piets Butler of Ireland, was created Earl of Ogery. And now King Henry began to be troubled in mind about his marriage.

1159. King Henry begins to be troubled in mind about his marriage.

The Queen is allowed her Council to debate the lawful-ness of her marriage. The Pope sends his Legate to hear the cause.

In his twentith year, on the two and twentith of February, Sir Piets Butler of Ireland, was created Earl of Ogery. And now King Henry began to be troubled in mind about his marriage with Queen Katherine; but whether his trouble of mind grew for scruple of Conscience, or from defire of change, was by many men doubted; some thought he had felt his affection upon the Lady Anne Boleyn, whom afterward he married; and to make way for that marriage, moved this scruple, that he might be divorced; but this is not likely, for he married not the said Lady, till above three years after this doubt had been moved; and three years was a long time to have affection be delayed, which commonly is impatient of delay: if King Henry's own propitiousness may be taken, it was very like, that in his mind he partly knew what his friends in Spain would give him; but if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled: and having told, it is the rofe up, and making a low curteisy, departed. The King being advertised that she was going out of the House, commanded the Crier to call her again; who thereupon called her, saying, Katherine Queen of England, come into the Court; which her Gentleman-Usher Master Grifiths bearing, told her, Madam, you are called: Well (said he) it makes no matter, I will not tarry, go your way, and thus he departed, and never after would appear in any Court, but appealed from the Cardinals to the Pope himself. The Queen being gone, the King said, I confess she hath been to me the most dutiful and loving Wife that ever Prince had; and if it were not for this scruple of my Conscience, I would not leave her for any womean living; and having now referred the Judgment of the cause to the Pope, he is chiefly to be blamed that he had not, in the beginning, a juster opinion about her marriage; for he might have known that his scruple was not likely to be answered, and that he might begin the beginning of a just error.

The Quee...
The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

The truth; it was strange, Prince Arthur and she having lain five months together, and he no less then almost 16 years old.) But whilst arguments were thus urged on both sides, and no certainty could appear, the King sent the two Cardinals to the Queen, lying then in Bridewell, to persuade her, she should submit her self to the Kings pleasure, and not to stand so peremptorily to her Appeal. The Cardinals coming to her, found her at work amongst her Maids, with a skin of white thread about her neck; who having heard her message, answered, That in all other things she would willingly submit her self to the Kings will, but in this, which concerned her honesty, and the legitimacy of her Children, the dart not, but would rely upon the wisdom and piety of both their Fathers, who (she knew) would never have attended to the marriage, if there had been the least disturbance of unlawful sort; and another answer she would not give. Upon their return to the King, when he perceived the could not be removed from her opinion; he commanded the Court to go on; so that at last it came to judgement; which every man expected should be the next day. At which day the King came thither (but in so secret a manner that he might hear and not be seen) where the Kings Council at the Bar calling for Judgement; Cardinal Campanius, as being chief Commissioner, stood up and said; I find the case very doubtful, and the party defendant standing to her Appeal, I will therefore give no Judgement, till I have conferred with the Pope; and therefore I adjourn the Court for this time, according to the Order of the Court of Rome, which hears no causes judicially from the last of July till the fourth of October; at which termination of time, King Henry was not a little angry, and the Duke of Suffolk, being present in the Court gave an exclamation which was the means of expediting the proceeding, to begin to think it necessary to remove him, and to take him off from that great object which had made him so pressing; and indeed he made short work with him; for soon after he sent the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to him for the Seal, which yet he would not deliver to them, till they brought him a Warrant under the Kings own hand. When the Seal was brought to the King, he delivered it to Sir Thomas More, Speaker then of the Parliament (the first Layman that bore that Office in any memory) and in his room was chosen Speaker Thomas Audley, Attorney of the Duthy. Wolsey now removed from his Chancellourship, was in the Parliament then holden charged with points of Treason; but that charge was to clearly taken off by his servent Thomas Cromwel, who was then of the House, that the Cardinal was acquitted, to the great commendation of Cromwel, both for abilities in himself, and faithfulness to his Master.

After this, the King being informed, that all those things, which the Cardinal had done by his power Legantine, were within the cafe of Pramunire; he caused his Attorney Christopher Hales to lay out a Pramunire against him; and thereafter the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent unto him, to let him know that the King's pleasure was, he should go to Ather, a House near to Hampton-Court, belonging to his Bishoprocks of Winchester, and there to reside whereupon the Cardinal, having first deliberated up all his Moveables to the Kings use (the greatest store and richest that was ever known of any Subject) went presently to Putney by water, and from thence rode to Ather, where he and his family continued three or four weeks, without either Bed, Sheets, Table-cloaths, or Dishes to eat their meat in, or money whereby to buy any, but what he was forced to borrow of the Bishop of Carlile. After this, his matter for the Pramunire being called upon in the Kings Bench, his two Attorneys confessed the Action, and thereupon had Judgment to forfeit all his Lands and Goods, and to be out of the Kings Protection; but the King of his clemency sent him a sufficient Protection, and left him the Bishoprocks of York and Winchefter, with Plate and Stuffe convenient for his Dignity. His Bishoprocks of Duresme was given to Doctor Tunful, Bishop of London; his Abbey of Saint Albans to the Prior of Norwich; and the Bishoprocks of London to Doctor Stokesly, Ambassadour then beyond the Seas.

In this mean while, Margaret Dutcches of Suffolk, Aunt to the Emperor, and the Lady Luys Dutcche, of Angouleme, Mother to the French King, met at Combray to treat of a Peace between the Emperor, the Pope, and the Kings of England and France, where were present Doctor Tunful Bishop of London, and Sir Thomas More then Chancellour of the Duthy of Lancaster, Commissioners for the King of England; after long debating, through the diligence of the said Ladies, a Peace was concluded; and was thereof called, The Womans Peace, and was indeed as fickle as women, for it was soon broken, and neither of the Princes trusted the other e'er the more for it. Previous to this Peace before this time there had been wholly disputed by the Cardinal and by the Clergy, but now, growing sensible of that error, he called his High Court of Parliament; in which the Commons complained harply of their grievances against the Clergy, specially in fix things. The first, for that they excelled unreasonable sums of money, as due Fees, for the purchase of men's lives, as Wills and Testamentes: infomuch that Sir Henry Guildford

Guilford, Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings House, declared openly, that he and others being Executors to Sir William Compton paid for the Probate of his Will to the Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury a thousand marks.

The second, the extreme exactions, which spiritual men used in taking of Corps or Mortuaries.

The third, that Spiritual men became Farmers of great Graves and Farms to the prejudice of Husbandmen and Grackers.

The fourth, because many Abbeys, Priors, and other spiritual men, kept Tan houses, and bought and sold Wool, Cloth, and other Wares, as temperal Merchants.

The fifth, because such Clergy-men as had the left livings would take the utmost of their right, and yet live in the Court, or in Nekkerman or in Bishop house, where they spent nothing.

The sixth, because divers ignorant men amongst them held ten or twelve Benefices to themselves, severally, and yet lived not upon any one of them, but kept great Scholars at small pension.

These things before this time might not be touched, because the Bishops were Chancellors, and had all the rule about the King; but now the King looking better into the matter, gave way to these complaints: whereupon the Burgesses drew up three Bills; one of the probate of Teltaments; another for Mortuaries; and the third for Non-reliance, Plurality, and taking of Farms by spiritual men. The Bill of Mortuaries passed first the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords; when two days after, was sent up the Bill of probate of Teltaments, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Bishops much frowned, but especially John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, who rose up and said: My Lords, you see what Bills come daily from the Commons house, and all is the destruction of the Church; for Gods sake, consider what a Realm Robbery was, and when the Church went down, then fell the Glory of that Kingdom: Now with our Commons is nothing but down with the Church; and all this meemeth, is for lack of Faith only. When these words were reported to the House of Commons, they took the matter very hunounly; and thereupon sent their Speaker Thomas Audley, with thirty of the House to the King, complaining what a dishonour to the King and the whole Realm it was to say, that they which were elected for the wifet men of all Shires, should be charged to lack faith, which was all one as to say, they were Infidels and no Christians; so as what Act or Laws ever they made should be taken as Laws made by Pagans and Heathens, and not worthy to be kept by Christian men: And therefore humbly besought his Majesty to call the said Bishop of Rochester before him, to give an account of the words he had spoken. Whereupon within few days after, the King sent for the Bishop, and acquainted him with the Commons complaint against him, who excused himself, by saying he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lack of Faith, and not the doings of the House of Commons; of which excuse, the King sent word to the Houfe by Sir William Fitz-william Treasurer of his Houfhold; but it pleased the Commons nothing at all. After divers meetings between the Lords and Commons, about the Bills of probate of Teltaments and Mortuaries, the Temporality laid to the Spirituality their own laws, and constitution, and the Spiritualty defended them, by prejudice, and ufage; to whom a Gentleman of Greyer-Inne made this answer. The ufga bath ever been of Thieves to rob on Shoouters-hill; is it therefore lawful? Whiltele these Bills were in debate, an Act was passed, which releaved to the King all such sums of money as he had borrowed at the Loan, in the fift feth of his Reign; which Bill at firft was much opposed, but the most part of the Houfe being the Kings Servants, it was at laft affented to: which once known in the Country abroad, made much murmuring, and the Parliament to be ill spoken of; for every man courted a fure debtor, as fome made their Wills of the money, and fome turned it over in fatisfaction to their creditors. To quality which grievance, the King granted a general pardon for all offences (certain excepted) and was a means also to have the three Bills passed; one for a probate of Teltaments, another for Mortuaries, and the third against plurality of Benefices, Non-reliance, buying and taking of Farms by spiritual persons, though this laft with some qualifying.

During this Parliament, the King created Vicount Rochford, Earl of Willshire, the Vicount Fitzwater Earl of Essex, and the Lord Hasting's Earl of Huntingdon.

This time, the Lords of the upper Houfe had drawn certain Articles against the Cardinal, and sent them down to the Houfe of Commons, the chief whereof were these:

First, that without the Kings ottent, he hath procurred himself to be made a Legate, by reason whereof he took away the right of all Bishops and spiritual persons.

Secondly, That in all his Writings which he wrote to Rome, or to any Foreign Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my King; so preferring himself before the King.

Thirdly, That without the Kings ottent, he carried the great Seal of England with him into Plantations.

Fourthly, That having the French Pes, he presumed to come and breath upon the King.

Fifthly, That he confufed the Cardinals Hat to be put upon the Kings Cain.

Sixthly, That he would not suffer the Kings Clerk of the Markes to sit at Saint Albans.

Seventhly, That he had lent infinit numbers of treasu res to Rome for purchasing of his Dignity.

These Articles were read in the House, and if not otherwise proved, yet confedted afterward under the Cardinals owne hand, which added to the former prammure; all his Lands and Goods were feized on to the Kings use.

This Parliament being ended, the King removed to Greenwich, and there kept his Christians with his Queen Katherine in great state; for though this matter, of making void the marriage between them, was hotly pursued by the King; yet abating onl only from her bed, he con-

After, and his Affairs dying, left lying to near the King, he might one time or other get access to the King's presence, and come again into favour; they said means to have him sent further off, and therupon the King sent him to go to his Dioces of York, and not to go Southward without special Licence; whereupon in Lent he made great preparation for his Journey, and having in his train to the number of an hundred and three-score perfons, bycastle journeys came to Peterborough, and there kept his Easter; the week after he went to Stamford, then to Newark, and so to Southwark, where he continued most part of all that Summer: and then rode to Scroby, where he stayed till Michaelmas, and then came to Canowd Castle, within seven miles of York, where he kept a plentiful house for all comers: and repaired the Castle, being greatly in decay, having above three hundred Artificers in daily wages. At last, he determined to be installled at York, the next Monday after Allhollan-day; against which time great preparation was made, and the Cardinal went to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, with which he used to wear at any great Solemny. At which pretension the King marvelled no little; saying to the Cardinal, whether it were about him, what a thing is that pride should this reign in a man that is quite underfoot? but before the day of Installation came, he was arrested in this manner; Sir Walter Walshe one of the Kings Privy-Chamber was sent down to the Earl of Northumberland, with whom he was joyned in Commission to arrest the Cardinal; whereupon they go together to Canowd, where the Cardinal lay: and being entred into the house, it was told the Cardinal, that the Earl of Northumberland was come, and in the Hall; then (quoth the Cardinal) I am sorry we have dined, for I doubt our Officers are not provided of any good cheer. With that he went and brought the Earl up, welcoming him in a complememental manner, as if he had come but only to visit him; but being come into the Chamber, the Earl with a soft voice, laying his hand upon the Cardinal's arm, said, My Lord, I arrest you of high Treason: the Cardinal somewhat astounded; asked to see his Commission, which the Earl denying to shew, then (quoth the Cardinal) I will not obey your arrest; at that instant Walter Walshe came in, and kneeled down to the Cardinal; who asked him if he were joyned in Commission with the Earl; who answered, he was: well then, said the Cardinal, I trow you are one of the Kings Privy-Chamber, your name is Walshe: I am content to yield to you, but not to my Lord of Northumberland, unless I see his Commission: the meanest of the Kings Privy-Chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest Peer of the Realm, by the Kings Commandement, without any Commission. Then the Earl took the Cardinals Keys from him, and put him in custody of his Gentlemen: some few days after he was conveyed from Canowd to Pomfret, and after to Sheffield Park, where he had kinde entertainment, and laid with the Earl of

In this year the New Testament having been translated into English, by Tindal, Joy, and others, and which no command for reading it, were sharply punished by command of the Bishops and Sir Thomas More then Lord Chancellour: but none was more violent in the matter than the Bishop of London, who caufed all the Books to be brought into Paul's Church-yard, and there burned.

King Henry having heard by good information, that when Cæsarea was sent Legate into England, he had brought with him a Bull of Divorce; but was afterward upon change of the Popes mind, commanded to burn it; saw plainly by this, that the Pope had no meaning of proceeding really in the matter, but to keep it aloof for his own ends; neither to displease the Emperor by granting it; nor King Henry by not granting it, but promising expedition to keep him in expence; yet using delays to keep him in dependance: and therefore resolved now to take such a course, that he should not need to care whether the Pope granted it or no; and thereupon caused a Proclamation to be published, that no person of what estate or condition forever, should purchase, or attempt to purchase from the Court of Rome, any thing prejudicial to the Justification, or Prerogative of this his Realm, upon pain of imprisonment, and other punishments at his Grace's pleasure; and shortly after an Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annates, or money for Bulls to the Pope; for as much as it was proved, there had been paid for Bulls of Bishops, since the fourth year of King Henry the seventh, an hundred and three-score thousand pounds, besides what had been paid for Parons and other Dispensions. Another Act was also then made, that no person should appeal for any cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Committie to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Arch.

dation of the King's judgment, so deny it at first when it was demanded as a right, and to grant it afterward, when it was refused as of grace.

In this Parliament time, on the 30 of March, Sir Tho. More Lord Chancellor with twelve of the Lords, came into the Lower House, acquainting them, that through the matter of the King's Divorce, he might sufficiently rest upon the judgment of learned men in his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, yet to avoid all suspicion of partiality, he had sent into France, Italy, the Popes Dominions, and the Venetians, to have their opinions; and then causing them to be read, Sir Bryan Tuke took out of a box certain writings sealed, which were the determinations of the Universities of Orleans, of Paris, of Anjou, of Burges, of Bolonia, of Padua, and of Tholos: all which were peremptory in these two Points; That the Brother, by the Law of God, might not marry the Relief of his Brother; and then being against the Law of God, that it is not in the power of the Pope to dispence with that Law, after the divorce, the King hath not sought this Divorce for his pleasure, but for discharge of his Conscience: and this, they departed. The King himself, when he heard of these determinations, was so far from rejoicing at it, that he rather mourned, as for the loss of so good a Wife; yet converted with her as he had done before, in nothing altered but abstaining from her bed. But being willing the Queen should know these determinations; in Whitsun week after, he sent divers Lords to acquaint her with them, requiring her thereupon to recall her Appeal, and to refer the matter to eight indifferent Lords; which the utterly refused, giving her usual Answer, that she was his lawful Wife, and would abide the Determination of the Court, of Rome, but of no other. After Whitsun, the King and Queen removed to Windsor, and there continued the Council, of the King removed to Woodstock and left the Queen at Windsor, where she remained a while, and after removed to Esherhurst, whither the King sent to her divers Lords, first to persuade her to be conformable to the Law of God; which if they could not do, then to let her know, that his pleasure was, she should be either at one of these three places, his Manor of Oking, or of Esherhurst, or the Monastery of Bilham, and there to continue without further molesting her with his suits.

And now Cranmer is to play his part. It chanced that Dr. Stephen, Dr. Fox, and he met at Waltham one day at dinner; where falling into discourse about the case then in agitation of the King's Marriage with Queen Katharine: the other Doctors thought the Marriage might be proved unlawful by the Civil Law; but (said Cranmer) it may better be proved by the Law of God; and it is my manner to do it: which words of his being made known to the King, Cranmer is sent for, and commanded to set his reasons down in writing: which he did write, and showed them to the King; and he was asked whether he would hand to that which he had written? who answered, he would, even before the Pope himself; his Majesty pleased; marry (said the King) and to the Pope you shall go: and thereupon sent him to the Court of Rome; and with him Thomas Bulen Earl of Wiltshire, Doctor Stukeley, Earl of Lincoln, Dr. Let the King Almoner, and others: where awaiting to Bolon to where the Pope was, had a day of Audience appointed, but was hindered by a ridiculous accident; for the Pope holding out his foot for them to kiss his Toe, as the manner is, a Dog of the Earls by chance in the room, ran and caught the Pope foot in his mouth, and made it for that time unfit to kiss. After this, when Cranmer had made his Proposition, he was told it should be answered when the Pope came to Rome: so the Ambassadors were dismissed, and Cranmer went to the Empourers Court, where in private Conference he satisfied Cornelia Agrrippa, the most learned at that time about the Emperor, and brought him to be of his opinion. Cranmer returning home, and giving the King this satisfaction, the King's Marriage with Queen Katharine was soon after dissolved by Parliament, and the Bishop of Canterbury accompanied with Dr. Stukeley Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winche钢厂, Sir Edward Wingfield, and other learned men, rode to Doutable where Queen Katharine then lay; where being cited to appear, and making default fifteen days together, for lack of appearance, she was divorced from the King, and the Marriage declared to be void and of none effect; and from thenceforth it was decreed, she should no more be called Queen, but Princes Dowager: after which time, the King never saw her more.

At this time, being the four and twentieth year of King Henry's reign, Sir Thomas More, after long suit, delivered up the great Seal, which was then delivered to Tho. Anderley Speaker of the Parliament, which Parliament began at the Blackfriers, was adjourned to Westminster, and there at nine a clock at night dissolved, and was therefore called the Black Parliament. This Tho. Anderley first made Lord Keeper, and shortly after inserted in the whole room of Speaker, Humfrey Wingfield of Graye's Inn was chosen. On the first of September this year, the King being at Windsor, created Anne Bulen Marichon of Pembroke, giving her 1000 pounds land a year: and then being diligent to talk with the King of France in person on the 10 of October, taking the said Lady with him, and divers Lords, as the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the Marquess of Dorset and Exeter, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Surrey, Essex, Derby, Rutland, Suffolk and Huntingdon, with divers Vicounts, Barons, and Knights, he failed over to Calais; and on the 20 of October met with the King of France at Bailleul, with whom he stayed four days; in which time he did him honour, the King of France honoured the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk with the Order of Saint Michael; and then both Kings went to Calais, where the French King stayed certain days, in which time to do him honour, the King of France honored two of his great Lords with the Order of the Garter; and then after great magnificence in revelling and feasting, on the 20 of October the French King departed from Calais, and King Henry returned into England; where on the 14 of November following, he married secretly the Lady Anne Bulen, which marriage was not openly known till Batler after, when it was perceived.

The Holy Maid of Mantua is delivered of a daughter named Elizabeth, whose abettors were Richard Master a Priest Parson of Aldington in Kent; Ed. Egging, Dr. of Divinity a Monk of Canterbury; Richard Ribby and Thomas Gold, Gentlemen, This Maid had learned to counterfeit falling into Trances; in which she would deliver many strange things, and amongst others, said, that by Revelation from God and his Saints, she was informed, that if King Henry proceeded to the Divorce, and married another, he should not be King of England one month after. And here we may see how credulous oftentimes great Scholars are in believing Impostures, when Warham Archibishop of Canterbury, and Epper Bishop of Rochester were thought to give credit to this Counterfeites, that we need not wonder at St. Ambrose, who though he gave credit to many lying miracles, yet were such as had more probability in them than this, which consisit in nothing but making of faces, as upon Examination of the said Maid and her attendants, Abbettes were confeded; and thereupon the said woman and all of them were condemned, drawn to Tyburn and there hanged.

In this mean time the Scots had been troublesome, and made incursions upon the Borders; till at last, Commissioners being sent to treat of agreement, a Peace was concluded, to continue both the Kings lives; which on the twentieth of May this year, was openly Proclaimed.

About this time at the suit of the Lady Katherine Dowager, a Bull was sent from the Pope, which curbed both the King and the Realm; which Bull was set up in the Town of Dunkirk in Flanders, the Messenger not daring to come nearer; and because it was known that the Lady Dowager had procured this Curfe to be fent, the Duke of Suffolk was fent to her, lying then at Bungen besides Huntingdon, to discharge a great part of her household servants; yet leaving her a convenient number like a Prince.

It was not the first time that King Henry's reign, when in a Parliament holden, an Act was made for establishing the succession in the Crown, upon the Queen Elizabeth; to which, till the Lords, Knights, and Burgesses were sworn; and after Commissioners were sent into all parts of the Realm, to take the oath of all men and women to the said Act. Another Act was also made, which authorized the King to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Popes Authority to be utterly abolished. But Doctor John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, Sir Thomas More Knight, and Doctor Willson Parson of Saint Thomas Apfiftes in London, expressly declared at Lambeth, before the Archibishop of Canterbury, to take the Oaths; of whom Doctor Willson recanted, but the other two, persisting in their opinion, were both of them beheaded. Of these two Bishops Fisher was heard to foretell the great, that if he thought the King would set forth the Scripture in English, rather than he would live to fee that day, he would cut his own throat; which I therefore relate, that the judgment of God may be seen upon such unhallowed Oaths.

A little before this time one Elizabeth Barton, named the Holy Maid of Kent, came to be difthe Tower, being demanded his upper Garment (meaning his Gown) you shall have it, said he, and gave them his Cap; spying it was the uppermost Garment he had: also, when being upon the Scaffold, the Hangman kneeled down and asked him forgiveness; I forgive thee (said he) but I promise thee, thou wilt never have credit by cutting off my head, my neck is firm, and when he was put to the Stake, he had a gray beard, he stroked it out, and said to the Hangman, I pray you let me lay my head over the blocks, left you should cut it; for though you have Warrant to cut off my head, you have none to cut my beard. But his Devotion was noジェeting matter. For he used to wear a shirt of hair next his skin for a perpetual penance; and oftentimes in the Church he would put on a Surplice, and help the Priest to say Mass; which he forbore not to do, even when he was Lord Chancellor of England, as one time the Duke of Norfolk coming to the Church tound him doing it. Two memorable things are recorded of him; one, which shews his great integrity, and the small reckoning he made of riches; that having paved through so many great employments, and born so many great Offices; yet in all his life he never Purchased above one hundred pounds a year, not left any great res- t of their, when he died. The other, which shews his filial piety, that being Lord Chancellor of England, at the same time that his Father was Judge of the Kings Bench, he would always at his going to Westminster, go first to the Kings Bench and ask his Father bleeing before he went to fit in the Chancery.

The tenth of July this year the Lord Deere of the North was arraigned at Westminster, of high treason, before the Duke of Norfolk, as high Steward of England; his Indictment being read, he fo answered every part and matter therein contained, that by his Peers he was found not guilty; a rare thing to stop a current that ran with such violence. The one and twentieth of September Doctor Taylour Master of the Rolls was discharged of that Office: and the nineteenth of October following, Sir Thomas Cromwell was sworn in his place.

This year the King of the Scots was inhaled Knight of the Garter, by his Deputy the Lord Ermin; and Stephen Gardiner, who after the Cardinals death, was made Bishop of Winchester, was sent Ambassadour Legier into France, where he remained three years. Also in January of this year, Katherine Prince Dowager, fell into her last Sickness; to whom the King sent the Emperours Ambas- sodaur Legier, desiring her to be of good comfort; but she finding her approach, caught only one of her Gentlewomen to write a Letter to the King; commending to him her Daughter and his, and befieching him to be a good Father to her: and then delivering her further, to have some consideration of her Servants, on the eight of January, at Kimbolton, she departed this life, and was buried at Peterborough. A Woman of notorious and virtuous life, and of so great oblique- nousness to her Husband, that from her only merit, is grown a reputation to all Spanish writers. Also the nine and twentieth of January this year, Queen Anne was delivered of a child before her time, which was born dead.

And now King Henry began to fall into those great disorders, which have been the blemish of his life, and have made him to be blotted out of the Catalogue of our bel Princes; for first in October of this year, he sent Doctor Lee and others to visit the Priories, and Nunneries in England, who let at Liberty all those Religious persons that would forsake their habit, and all that were under the age of four and twenty years; and in December following a survey was taken of all Chantry, and the names of such as had the gift of them. After which, in a Parliament holden the fourth of February, an Act was made, which gave the King all Religious houses, with all their Lands and Goods, that were of the value of three hundred marks a year and under; the number of which houses were three hundred and seventy and fix; the value of their Lands yearly, above two and thirty thousand pounds, their moveable Goods one hundred thousand, the Religious persons put out of the same houses above ten thousand. This year William Tindal was burnt at a Town in Flander, between Bruges and Mechlin, called Plakew, for translating Elyfegns, the seven Testaments, and divine parts of the Old; who having been for a long time imprisoned, was upon the Lord Cromwell's writ ing for his Deliverance, in all haste brought to the fire, and burnt.

It was now the eight and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Monday there were solemn Julis holden at Greenwich, from whence the King suddenly departed and came to Westminster, whose sudden departure struck great amazement into many, but to the Queen especially, and not without cause; for the next day the Lord Rochford her Brother, and Henry Norris were brought to the Tower of London, prisoners, whether also the same day at five a clock in the afternoon, was brought Queen Anne her self, by Sir Thomas Adeley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, and Sir William Kingston Lieutenant of the Tower, who at the Towe r gate fell on her knees before the said Lords, beseeching God to help her, for she was innocent of that whereof she was accused: On the fifteenth of May she was arraigned in the Tower before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting as High Steward of England. When her Indictment was read, she made unto it wife and disiret answers, that she seemed fully to clear herself of all matters laid to her charges; but being tried by her Peers, whereof the Duke of Suffolk was chief, she was by them found guilty, and had Judgment pronounced by the Duke of Norfolk: immediately the Lord Roch ford her Brother, was likewise arraigned and condemned: who on the seventeenth of May, together with Henry Norris, Mark Stenson, William Brereton, and Francis Walford, all of the King's Privy Chamber, about matters touching the Queen, were beheaded on the Tower Hill. Queen Anne her self on the mienthe of May, on a Scaffold upon the Green within the Tower, was beheaded with the Sword of Justice by the the Hangman of that Town; her body with the head was buried in the Quire of the Chappell there. This Queen Anne was the Daughter of Thomas Bulen Earl of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk; the Earl Father was the Son of Sir William Bulen, whose Wife was Margaret the Second Daughter and Co-heir of Thomas Butler Earl of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the Son of Sir Geoffrey Bulen, Lord Mayor of London, who lieth buried in Saint Leondard Church in the Isury, whose Wife was Anne eldest Daughter and Co-heir to Thomas Lord Hoo and Hisings: and his descent was out of the House of the Bulen in the Country of Norfolk: Thus much for her Parentage.

For her Religion, she was an earnest Protet\(\)for, and one of the first Countenancers of the Gospel: in Alms-deeds so liberal, that in nine months space, it is said the distributed among the poor, to the value of fifteen thousand pounds: Now for the Crimes for which she died, (Adultery and Incest;) proofs of her guiltiness there are none recorded; of her innocence many: and first, her own clearing of all objections, at the time of her Arrangement, then Cromwell's Writing to the King, after full examination of the matter; that many things have been objected, but none confessed, only some Circumstances had been acknowledged by Mark Smit\(\)ton: (and what was Mark Smi\(\)ton, but a mean fellow, one that upon promise of life, would say any thing; and having said something, which they took hold of, was soon after executed left he should retract it;) lastly, they that were accused with her, they all denied to the death: even Henry Norris; whom the King specially favoured, and promised him pardon if he would but confess it. It was a poor proof of Incest with her Brother, that coming one morning into her Chamber before she was up, he leaned down upon her Bed, to say something in her ear; yet this was taken hold for a proof: and need be no marvel, if we consider the many adversaries he had, as being a Protestant, and perhaps that in Incest, the King himself, not greatly his friend: (for though he had excluded the Pope, yet he continued a Papist still) and then who knows not, that Nature is not more able of an Accomp to make an Oak, than Authority is able of the least furmin to make a certainty. But howsoever it was, that her death was contrived; certain it is, that it ca\(\)t upon King Henry a dishonourable Imputation; insomuch that where the Protestant Princes of Germany had resolved to choose him for head of their League; after they heard of this Queens death, in such a manner, they utterly refused him as unworthy of the honour, and it is memorable what conceit Queen Anne her self had of her Death; for at the time when she was led to be beheaded in the Tower, she called one of the Kings Privy Chamber to her, and said unto him, Command me to the King, and tell him, he is content in his course of advancing me: for from a private Gentleman, he made me Marquess, from a Marquess a Queen; and now that he had lost no higher degree of worldly honour for me, he hath made me a Martyr.

Immediately after her death, in the week before Whitsuntide, the King Married Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, who at Whitsuntide was openly shewed as Queen: and on Tuesday in Whitsun-week his Brother Sir Edmund Seymour was created Vicount Beauchamp, and Sir Walter Hungerford was made Lord Hungerford.

The eighth of June the Parliament began; during the which, the Lord Thomas Howard, without the Kings assent, had affianced the Lady Margaret Douglas, Daughter to the Queen of Scots, and Niece to the King: for which he was attainted of Treson, and an Act was made for like offenders hereafter; and so he died in the Tower, and the long time remained there a Prisoner: yet afterward was let at liberty, and married Matthew Earl of Lenox, who by him had Henry, Father of James the first King of Great Britan.

In the time of this Parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy had a solemn Convocation at Paul's Church in London; where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a Book of Religion; intituled, Articles devised by the King, wherein the Book are specially mentioned but three Sacraments: namely, Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance; also certain Injunctions were set forth, whereby many of the old Holidays were abrogated, specially those that fell in Harvest time.

The two and twentieth of July, Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerset, base Son of King Henry by Elizabeth Blunt, died at St James, and was buried at Thetstone in Norfolk.

The nine and twentieth of June the King held a great Julls and Triumph at Westminster, but a disastrous Sea-fight was on the water, where one Gates a Gentleman was drowned in his Harref, and by the breaking of a Gun two Mariners were fore maimed: in July following Thomas Cromwell, Secretary to the King, and Master of the Rolls, was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal: and the nineteenth of July the Lord Fitz-Warren was created Earl of Balb, and the day following, Lord Cromwell was made Lord Cromwell; and on the eighteenth of July, Vice-\(\)General under the King over the Spirituality, who late divers times in the Convocation of Houfe, amongst the Bishops as head over them, and now was the flate of Religion in England come to a strange pas: because always in passing, and had no confidence; for at first, the Authority of the Pope was excluded in some cases only, a while after in all; but yet his Doctrine was wholly retained. Afterward his Doctrine came to be impugned, but in some few points only: a while after, in many more; that the Fable of Proteus might no longer be Fable, when the Religion in England might be his true Moral; and indeed, it could be no otherwise; the distance between the two Religion being not possible to be passed per saltum, but must be done by degrees, which degrees may be observed in the progress of the story; for when at first it was permitted only to read the Bible in English, now it came to be permitted to pray in English; for now in September the Lord Cromwell set forth Injunctions to have the Lords Prayer, the Ave, the Creed, the

The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

An insurrection in Lincolnshire for innovation of religion. The King goes in person, and supersedes it.

Another insurrection in the North; for suppressing the Earl of Shrewsbury called army for suppressing done in without Commission was glad to ask the King pardon.

the ten Commandments, and all Articles of the Christian Faith translated into English, and to be taught by all Persons and Curates to their Parishioners; which innovation did stir up the People, and in Lincolnshire they assembled to the number of twenty thousand, against whom the King himself went in person, who, winning by peroration their chief Leaders, brought the rest upon pardon to submit themselves: but when he had himself done the work of Mercy, he afterward sent the Duke of Suffolk, with Sir Francis Brian, and Sir John Ruffell, to do the Work of Justice, who caused Nicholas Adelton, and a Monk naming himself Captain Cobler, and thirteen other (Ringleaders of the Sedition) to be apprehended, and most of them to be executed. But this Commission was scarce appeased, when presently there arose another in the North-parts, where forty thousand were assembled, giving themselves out for an Holy Pilgrimage, where on some side of their Ensigns they had Christ hanging on the Cross, on the other side the Cup and Bread of the Sacrament, as taking Arms only for maintenance of the Faith of Christ; and were so bold as the Earl of Hertford, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Balmer, and his Wife, Sir Thomas Perry Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest Esquire, and others began to conspire, although each of them before had been pardoned by the King: but this as being but the fig end of the Commission, was soon suppressed, the Lord Darcy was beheaded on the Tower-hill, the Lord Hussy at Lincoln, Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains at Hull, Sir John Balmer: Paramount was burnt in Smithfield, and most of the other were executed at Tyburn. Tanta multi sunt, fo great a matter it was, to make the Realm be quiet, in so great innovations of Religion.

This year on Saint George's Feast, the Lord Cromwell was made Knight of the Garter, and on the twelfth of October, which is Saint Edward's even, at Hampton-court, the Queen was delivered of a Prince; (but with so hard a labour, that she was fam to be ripe) and the Child was named Edward, whose Godfather was the Duke of Buckingham, the Child being the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Suffolk, his Godmother was his sister the Lady Mary: At his Bishops, his Godfather was the Duke of Suffolk; on the eighteenth of October, he was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Chester; but the Birth of his Son brought not so much joy to the King, as the Death of his Queen brought him sorrow; for within two days after the died, and was buried at Windsor, and so much was the Kings grief for her death, that he continued a Widow more years after.

It is not unworthy the relating, what a miserable dissolution befell the Family of the Geraldines, or Fitz-Garretts (Earl of Kildare in Ireland) about this time; for Gerald Fitz-Garret, who had been ten years Deputy in Ireland, up on the complaint of some fault, was sent for over into England, where not making a satisfying answer, he was committed to the Tower; but before his coming over, had with the Kings leave, left Deputy there his own Son, a young man of no above twenty years of age, but yet ripe of under-understanding, and fit for the place. This young Lord hearing, that his Father was committed Prisoner to the Tower, and soon after, as the rumour increased, that he was put to death, in rage to be revenged, rose up in Arms: and having five Uncles in the Country, (men of great estimation) drew them (though some of them unwillingly) to take his part: Amongst other outrages he committed, the Arch bishop of Dublin was slain in his presence: the Father in the Tower hearing thereof, with great grief died; the Son and his Uncles, upon the King's sending an Army, were all either taken or submitted; and being sent for over into England, those of his Uncles, that against his wills had been drawn into the action had good hopes of their lives, till entring the Ship of Passage, which was called the Cow, they then presently despaired, because of a Prophecie, that five Sons of a certain Earl should be carried into England in the belly of a Cow, and never after return; and indeed it fell out, that all this time, the King's adver saries, exasperating the King against them, and laying, there would never be quietness in Ireland, as long as any of the Geraldines were alive, they were all put to death: one only of the Son of the Family remained, a youth of thirteen years of age, who though at that time sick of the Small pox, yet made shift to save himself by flight, fled first into France, and frightened from thence, afterward into Flanders, and driven from thence, at last into Italy, where protected by Reginald Pole, at that time made Cardinal by Pope Julius the third, he was afterward, by his means, restored to his Dignity and his Patrimony.

This year Edward Seymour, Vicount Beauchamp, the Queen's Brother was created Earl of Hertford; and Sir William Fitz-Wiliam, Lord Admiral, was created Earl of Southampton, Master Penelop was made Vice Treasurer, Sir John Ruffell was made Controller of the King's House, and divers Gentlemen were made Knights. In February divers Roads were taken down by the Kings commandment, as the Road of Boxley, called the Road of Grace, which was made with vices to move the eyes and lips; also the Road called St. Saviour at Bermondsey Abbey in Southwark, and divers others. In May a Friar Observant, called Friar Forrest, who had taken the Oath of Supremacy himself, yet privately persuaded others, that the King was not Supreme head of the Church; was thereupon examined, and for his defence said, that he took the Oath with his outward man, but his inward man never confented to it: but this answer served not his turn from being condemned; and on a pair of Gills prepared for him, in Southfield, he was hanged by the middle, & arm-holes, all quick, and under the Galls was made a fire where with he was confumed: A little before his execution, a huge great Image was brought to the Galls, fetched out of the same Kent, which the King had in great reverence, called Darrel Gatheren, of which went a Prophecie, that this Image should set a whole Forrest on fire, which was thought to take effect, in setting this Friar Forrest on fire, and confuming him to nothing.

In September, by the special motion of the L. Cromwell, all the notable Images, unto which were made any special Pilgrimages & offerings, were taken down and burnt; as the Images of Wolfgang, Ipswich, Wrothferr, the Lady of Wilt- den, with many other; and forthwith by means of the said Cromwell, all the orders of the Friers and Nuns, with their Cloysters and Houses, were suppressed and put down: also the Shires of counterfeiting Saints; amongst others, the Shires of The, Becket in the Priory of Christ-Church was taken to the Kings use, and his Bones, Scull, and all which was there found, with a piece broken by the wound of his head, were all burnt in the same Church by command of the Lord Cromwell; and the one and twentieth of October, the Church of The, Becket in London, called the Hospital of St. Thomas of Acres was suppressed; the sixteenth of November, the Black-friers in London were suppressed; the next day the White-friers, the Gray-friers, and the Monks of the Charterhouse, and to all the other immediately after: only three Abotts relist, the Abbot of Colchester, the Abbot of Reading, and the Abbot of Gloucester, and two of them, all were suppressed. The four and twentieth of November the Bishop of Rochester preached at Pauls-Croft, and there shewed the blood of Bales, affirming it to be no blood, but Honey clarified and colour'd with Saffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Council. The number of Monasteries suppressed, were six hundred forty five, besides fourscore and ten Colleges, one hundred and ten Hospitals, and of Chapellies, and one hundred and free Chappells two thousand three hundred forty five. But now to make amends for the suppressing of so many Monasteries, the King intituled certain new Bishoprics, as at Wellsminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Briffon, Chelsey, and Gloucester; and assigned certain Canons and Prebends to each of them.

The third of November, Henry Crowned Marques of Exeter, and Earl of Devonshire; Henry Pole Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Care of Bridlington, the ninth of the Garter, Sir Nicholas de la Pole, the third of March; two Priests condemned with them were hanged at Tihour; Sir George Pol though condemned also, yet had his pardon. About this time one Nicholas, alias Lambert, being accused for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament, appealed to the King, and the King was content to hear him; whereupon a Throne was set up in the Hall of the Kings Palace. lase at Westminster, for the King to sit and when the Bishops had urged their Arguments & could not prevail, then the King took him in hand, hoping perhaps to have the honour of conversing in Heretick, when the Bishops could not do it. Siffed and promised him pardon if he would recant; but all would not do: Nicholas re- mained obstinate, the King mit his Honour, the Delinquent mit his pardon, and shortly after was drawn to Smithfield, and there burnt.

About this time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by instigation of Cardinal Pole, had earnestly moved divers great Princes to invade England, he as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earnestly to provide for defence; and to that end rode himself to the Sea-coasts to see them fortified, and in needful places Bulwarks to be erected: He caufed his Navy to be rigged, and to be in readiness at any short warning: He caufed Musters to be taken in all Shires; and lists of all able men in every County, in London especially; where Sir William Forman the then Major, certificated the number of fifteen thousand, not that there were more, but that so many were ready prepared; and of Aday, the King himself saw Mustered in St. James Park; where the Citizens strove in such fort to exceed each other in bravery of arms, and forwardness of service, as if the City had been a Camp, and they not men of the Gown, but all profent Souldiers, which they performed to their great cost, but greater commendation.

It was now the one and thirtieth year of King Henry's reign, and the nine and fortieth of his age: when having continued a widower two years, he began to think of marrying again; and he needed not to be a suitor for a Wife, for he was fued unto to take one. The Emperor solicited him to marry the Dutchess of Amidan; but to marry her he must first obtain a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was resolved rather to have no Wife, than to have any more to do with the Pope. Then the Duke of Clewe made suit unto him for the Lady, and he was a Protestant Prince; and so, though differing in points of Doctrine, yet in the main point of excluding the Pope, both of one mind. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell especially; and indeed it concerned him more than any other, that the King should take a Protestant Wife, seeing his actions had been such, as none but a Protestant Queen would ever like; and if the Queen should not like them, the King, though done by his leave would not like them long. Hereupon much means was used, that Ambaffadours came from the Duke of Clewe to conclude the Match; and then the 11 of December the Lady her felt in great fate was brought to Collyce, and then over to Dovers; and being come to Richceter, the King secretly came to see her, afterward she was conducted to London,met by the way in several places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdom. The third of January she was received into London by Sir William Holty, Knight, then Lord Mayor, with Orations, Pageants, and all complements of State, the greatest that ever had been seen. On Twelfth-day the Marriage was solemnized: the Archbishop of Canterbury did the Office, the Earl of Overstein a German Lord gave her. In April following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the Kings heart for ever by making this match, was made Earl of Effsc; for in March before, Henry Bowerich Earl of Effsc; and the antient Earl of England had broke his neck, by seeking to break a young Horfe, leaving only one Daughter, and the dying without issue, the Earldom came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the honour, till after this time, in Queen Elizabeth's time, and then made, but not restored.

The ninth of March, the King created Sir William Paulet Treasurer of his Haufe, Lord Saint-John; Sir John Raffel Comptroller, Lord Raffel; and shortly after Sir William Par was created Lord Par. The eighth and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margaret Countess of Salisbury, Gertrude Wife to the Marquets of Exeter, Reynold Pole Cardinal, Brother to the Lord Montes- cuit, Sir Adrian Puken, Thomas Dingle Knight of Saint John, and divers others were attainted of high Treafon; of whom Puken and Dingle, if the tenth of August, were beheld, the Countes- tels of Salisbury two yeares after: and in this Parliament the Act of the fix Articles was eftab- lished, and Sir Nicholas Hare was returned to his place of Speaker in the Parliament.

It was now five months after the Kings Mar- riage with the Lady Anne of Clewe; and though the King, at the fift night of the Lady, did not like her Person; yet, whether as respecting the honour of Ladies, he would not disgrace her at the firit meeting; or whether he meant to try how time might work him to a better lik- ing; or indeed, that he would not give diffidence to the German Princes at that time, for some ends he had a working, he disfembled the matter, and all things went on in a fiew of contentment on all hands. But for all thes fheows, the crafty Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner, find- ing how the world went with the King, affection towards the Queene, and for her fake with Cromwell; to the fitter of iftains and cares, af- fected (not to the Queen, as milking her Religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his greatnes;) he fo brought upon the Kings inclination, what by fuggesting, and what by aggravat- ing, that the Lord Cromwell, the ninth of July, sitting in the Council Chamber, was suddenly apprehended and committed to the Tower; and the nineteenth of the fame month was at- tainted by Parliament, and never came to his Anfwer; by a Law, (which as some reported) he himselfe had caufed to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-hill; for crimes (as appears in Re- cord) of Heretie and Treafon. This Lord Cromwell was born at Putney, a Village in Surrey education: near the Thames side, Son to a Smith, after whose deceas his Mother was married to a Sheever; for the prophaney of his Wife he was firft entertained by Cardinal Wolsey, and by him employed in many great Affairs: The Cardinal falling, the King took him into his service; and finding his great abilities, firft ad- vanced him for his worth, and then for his pleafure overthrew him. But the greatt part of Stephen Gardiners practione had been done before: for at Midsummer before, the King caused the Queen to remove to Richmond, as for her health and pleasure; and in the time of her absence, on the sixth of July, four certain Lords to the Lower House of Parliament, who there declared certain causers, for which the King married with the Lady Anne of Cleve, was not to be conned lawful; and so carried the matter, that the Convocation clearly determined, the King might marry any other; and so might the Being thus Divorced, it was further Enacted, she should no more be called Queen, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expressly delivered; some say a precontract of the said Lady with a Lord of Germany was pretended: but it seems to have been for some womanish defect in her body; as she feared not to affirm, that she had never been carnally known by the King in all the time of their living together: and as it is said, when her Ladies one time faid unto her, that they looked now every day to hear of her great belly; she stood up, and said, she was long enough, unless saying, How doth thou sweet heart? Good morrow sweet heart, and such like words, could make a great belly; for (said she) more than this there never passed between the King and me. However it was, the willingly submitted to the Decree, whether out of fear, or perhaps as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private life here in England, well respected of the King, and dying sixteen years after, in the fourth year of Queen Mary, was buried at Westminster.

About this time Leonard Grey, Deputy of Ireland, was on the Tower-hill beheaded, for suffering his nephew Gerald Fitz-Gerard to escape, who had been declared an enemy to the State; and then also was Thomas Fynes, Lord Deere, a young man of four and twenty years of age, hanged at Tilbury, for killing a mean person upon a fud, to ferve all the fourth of August, Thomas Epton a Monk of Westminster, for denying to take his Oath, to be true to the King, had his Monks Garment plucked from his back, the last that was seen in such habit in England till Queen Mary's days.

The sixth of July in the second and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Henry had been divorced from the Lady Anne of Cleve, and now the eighth of August following, the Lady Katharine Howard, Niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and Daughter to the Lord Edward Howard, was shewed openly as Queen at Hampton-Court.

On the tenth of June the following year, Sir Edmund Knott of Norfolk, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-cloth, for striking one Master Cleer of Norfolk, within the Tennis-court of the Kings House; being found guilty, he had judgment to lose his right hand, and to forfeit all his Lands, Goods, whereupon there was called to do execution, first the Serjeant Surgeon, with his Instruments pertaining to his Office, then the Serjeant of the Woodyard, with a mallet and a block to lay the hand upon, then the Kings Master Cook with a knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the Larder to cut the knife right on the joynts, then the Serjeant Ferrier with fearing Irons to tear the veins, then the Serjeant of the Poultrey with a Cock, which Cock should have his head smitten off upon the same block, and with the same knife; then the Yeoman of the Chantry with bare cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heat the Irons, a chafer of water to cool the ends of the Irons, and two forms for all Officers to set their fluff on, then the Serjeant of the Cellar with Wine, Ale, and Bever, and then the Serjeant of the Ewy, with Bacon, Ewe, and Towels: all things being thus prepared, Sir William Pickering Knight Marshal was commanded to bring in his prisoner, Sir Edmund Knott, to whom the Chief Justice declared his offence, which the said Knott confessed, and humbly submitted himself to the Kings mercy; only he declared, that the King would spare his right hand and take his left, because (said he) if my right hand be spared, I may live to do the King good service of world sublimination, and reason of his fault, when the King was informed, he granted him to lose neither of his hands, and pardoned all his of his Lands and Goods. The Summed up thirty and thirteen years near, King Henry, with his Queen Katharine, made progress into the North parts, and returning at Allhollantide to Hampton-Court, he was there informed of the Queens dissolute life, first before her marriage with one Francis Deereham, a Gentleman of Norfolk, whom employed afterward in Ireland, she had lately again at Penfret received into her Service; and so since her marriage with one Thomas Colepeper, of the Kings Privy-chamber; whereupon the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothesly Knight, Secretary to the King, was sent to the Queen at Hampton-Court, to charge her with that Crime, and discharging her household, to cause her to be conveyed to the Tower, there to remain, till the Kings pleasure should be further known: The Delinquents being examined, Deereham confessed, that before the Kings marriage with the Lady Katharine Howard, had bett him a pre-contract between himself and her; but when he once understood the Kings liking towards her, he then waved and concealed it for her preference: so the first of December these Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guildhall, they confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment to die, as in cases of Treason: the tenth of December, they were drawn from the Tower to Tilbury, where Colepeper was beheaded, and Deereham was hanged and disembowed: Colepeper's body was buried in Sepulchres Church in London, but both their heads were set on London bridge: the two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the Kings Bench, the Lords William Howard and the Lady Margaret his Wife, Katherine Tyme, and Alice Westwyck Gentlewoman, Joan Blamer, Wife to Anthony Blamer Gentleman, Anne Howard Wife to Henry Howard Esquire, and Brother to the Queen, Edward Howard Esquire, who were all condemned for misprision of Treason, for concealing the Queens midemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their lands and goods during life, and to remain in perpetual prison. The sixteenth of January the Parliament began at Westminster, where the Lords and Commons Petitioned the King, that he would not vex himself with the Queens offence, and that both she and the Lady Richford might be attained by Parliament and and that to avoid procrastinating of time, he would give his Royal assent unto it, under the great Seal, without staying for the end of the Parliament. Also that Durham and Colpepper having been attained before by the Common Law, might be attained likewise by Parliament: all which was attented to by the King; and after, on the thirtieth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochester were beheld on the Green within the Tower, where they confessed their offences, and died penitently: yet something to take off the offences of this Queen; it is certainly said, that after her condemnation, she protested to Doctor White, Bishop of Winchester, her last Confessor, that as for the act for which she was condemned, she took God and his Holy Angels to witness, upon her soul's salvation, that she died guiltless.

Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland, whereas before Edmund Dudley, the Kings Gentlemen, without any attained Lords of Ireland; and this title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland, before Sir Anthony Stanglers Knight, the Kings Deputy there.

About this time Arthur Plantagenet, Vicount Lisle, the King's Son to King Edward the fourth, having been imprisoned upon supplication of a practice, for betraying of Calixte to the French, while he was the King's Lieutenant there, was now found to be innocent of the fact; and thereupon the King to make him some reparation for his disgrace, sent him a King, and a very gracious message, by Sir Thomas Wriothesly his Secretary; whereat the said Vicount took great joy, that the day following, of that very joy he died: so deadly a thing is any passion, even joy it self, if it be extreme. After his death Sir John Dudley, his wife's son, was created Vicount Lisle. This Sir John Dudley was son to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the thirty-seventh year of this Kings Reign, and was made Vicount Lisle in right of his Mother.

During this Parliament, one George Ferrers, Gentleman, servant to the King and Burgesses for the Towne of Plymout in Devonshire, in going to the Parliament House, was arrested in London by a processe out of the Kings Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as surety for one Welden, at the suit of one White, which arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Myl Knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgesses there; order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint John, should be sent to the Counter in Britt Street (whither the said Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered: but the Officers of the Counter not only refused to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant such language, that they fell at last to an affray, and at what time the Sheriffs coming, they also took their Officers part; for that the Serjeant was fain to return without the Prisoner; which being signified to the Speaker and the Burgesses; they took the matter in so ill part, that they would sit no more without their Burgesses: and thereupon rising up, repaired to the upper House, where the whole Case was declared by the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, and the Lords and Judges there assembled, who judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the House of Commons it self: whereupon returning to their places again, upon new debate of the Case, they took order that their Serjeant should once more repair to the Sheriffs of London, and demand the prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellour offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it: being of a clear opinion, that all commandements from the neather House were to be executed by their Serjeants without Writ, only by shewing their Mace, which is his Warrant: but before the Serjeants return into London, the Sheriffs better advised became more mild, and upon the second demand, delivered the prisoner without any denial; but then the Serjeant had further in charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerks of the Counter, to appear and desire the next morning before the House of Commons, there where any commandement of theirs were charged by the Speaker with their contempt, and compelled to make immediate answer, without being admitted to any counsel. Sir Roger Cholmeley Recorder of London offered to speak in the cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the parties themselves: in conclusion, the Sheriffs and White who had caused the Assrett, were committed to the Tower; the Officer that did the assrett, with four other Officers, to Newgate; but after two or three days, upon the humble suit of the Mayor, were set at liberty; and because the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by privilege of Parliament, was not by Law to be brought again into execution; and fo the Creditor without remedy for his Debt, against him as his principal debtor, thence after long debate, by the space of nine or ten days together, they at last resolved to make an Act for the purpose, for the discharge of the said debt, against Welden who was principal debtor, and to discharge Ferrers that was but surety: wherein notwithstanding, the House was divided, and the Act passed but by fourteen voices: the King being advertized of this proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancellour and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the Lower House, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect: first commending their wisdom, in maintaining the privileges of their House (which he would not have to be infringed in any point) he alledged, that he being the head of the Parliament, and attending in his own person upon the business thereof, ought in reason, to have privilege for himself and all his Servants attending upon him; so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burgess, but only his servant; yet in that respect, he was to have the privilege as well any other: for it understandeth not, nor shall it be any blemish to your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your Cooks and Horse keepers, enjoy the same privilege; infomuch, as my Lord Chancellour here present hath informed us, that whilest he was Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a Statue of the Staple, and for so much, as the said Cook during all the Parliament served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by Privy-ledge of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court, (as our learned Council informeth us,) is so great, that all Acts and Processes coming out of any other Court, must for a time ceafe and give place to it; and touching the party himself, though for his prefumption he was worthy to have loft his debt, yet I command your equity, that have restored him to his debt againft him that was the principal: When the King had faid this, Sir Edward Mein-tacte Lord Chief Justice, rofe up and confirmned by many reafons, all that the King had faid, as likewise did all the other Lords, none speaking any thing to the contrary.

It was now the four and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when in May he took a loan of money of all fuch as were valued at fifty pounds and upwards in the Subfidy Book; the Lord Privy-Seat, the Bishop of Wincheffer, Sir Thomas Boky, and Sir Thomas Wrihifley were Commissioners for the loan in London, who fo handled the matter, that none of the Chief Citizen and Merchants obtained a thousand marks imprefl' in the Kings ufe; for which Privy-Seals were delivered to repay it again within two years.

At this time were many complaints made by the Englifh againft the Scots, partly for receiving and maintaining divers Englifh Rebels, fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the Englifh Borders: but fill when the King of England was preparing to oppofe them, the English Kings would fend Ambaffeftors to treat of reconcile-ment, till at laft, after many defultory pranks of the Scots, the King of England, no longer enduring fuch abufe, fent the Duke of Norfolk his Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earl of Shrewbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hartford, Augus, Rutland, the Lords of the North parts, Sir Anthony Brown Mafter of the Kings Horse, and Sir John Grege, Comptrolier of the Kings Houfe, with others to the number of twenty thousand men; who on the one and twentieth of October entred Scotland; where laying but eighteen miles from Stirling, they leaped into Albany, and Cafifes, and then, with no more pref-ence offered, for want of volunteers returned to Barwick: as foon as he returned, comes abroad with their air, raifeth a power of fifteen thousand men, and uflng great threatnings what he would do, invaded the Weft Borders: but the ege of his threatnings was foon taken off; for the Baffard Davis, with Jack of Musgrave, fetting upon them with only an hundred Light-Horfe, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to flight; upon a conceit, that the Duke of Norfolk with all his Army had been come into thofe parts; where were taken prisoners of the Scots, the Earl of Caffile and Glencarn, the Lord Maxwel Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Flemmifg, the Lord Seperwel, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sinclair, the Lords Minion, John Ross Lord of Gray, Roger Erksin Son to the Lord Er-kill, Sir Lord of Gordon, the Lord Maxwel's two Brothers, John Leyfi Eifon Son to the Earl of Rathus, George Hans Lord of Hemilton, with divers other men of account, to the number of above two hundred, and more than eight hun-
Cattle shot so fiercely upon them, that having burnt only a part of the Town, they returned to Leith; but whilst they lay there, they so waited the Country, that within seven miles every way of Edinburgh, there was not a Town, nor Village, nor house that was left unburnt; at Leith the eleventh day of May, the Lord General made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Cavers, Sir William Wrangtont, Sir Thomas Halcroft, Sir Edward Dord, Sir Francis Heth, 1544.

In this year Proclamation was made, whereby the people were licenced to eat white meats in Lent; but strictly forbidden the eating of flesh; whereupon shortly after, the Earl of Surryst with divers other Lords and Knights were imprisoned for eating of flesh contrary to the Proclamation.

The third of June this year, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Obrine was here created Earl of Thomond, (which honour his posterity enjoyeth to this day) Mack William a Bary, was created Earl of clashick Forth, and Mack Gilp argick was made Baron of Erieke.

King Henry had already had five Wives, all of them Maids, and of the good life at them; he will now therefore try his fortune with a Widow, and thereupon the twelfth of June, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign he took to Wife the Lady Katharine Frer, Widow of the Lord Latimer, late deceased, who was then proclaimed Queen; but how lucky would this match have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knows, seeing in a short time of three years they lived together, it was no small danger she escaped: which though it happened not till a year or two after this time, yet will not unfly be spoken of in this place, that so her story may come together; this Queen as being an earnest Protestant had many great adversities, by whom she was accust to the King, to have Heretical Books found in her closet; and this was so much aggravated against her, that they prevailed with the King, to sign a Warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a purpose to have her burne for Herelie; this Warrant was delivered to Writheley Lord Chancellour, and he by chance, or rather indeed by Gods Providence, letting it fall from him, it was taken up and carried to the Queen: who having read it, went foon after to visit the King, at the same time keeping his Chamber, by reason of a fore Leg; being come to the King, he presently fell into talk with her, about some points of Religion, demanding her resolution therein; but he knowing that his nature was not to be cropt, specially considering the case she was in, made him answer, that she was a woman accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty was wife and judicious, of whom the must learn as of her Lord and Head: Not so by Saint Mary (said the King) for you are a Doctor Kate to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often we have seen hertofore: Indeed Sir (said he) if your Majesty have to conceive, I have been mistaken; for if hertofore I have held talk with you touching Religion, it hath been to learn of your Majesty some point, whereof I stood in doubt, and sometimes that with my talk I might make you forget your present infirmity: And is it even to sweet heart? (quoth the King) why then we are friends, and to kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But soon after, was the day appointed by the King's Warrant for apprehending her; on which day, the King dispised to walk in the Garden, had the Queen the Queen with the French, and suddenly the Lord Chancellour with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden with a purpose to apprehend her: whom as soon as the King saw, he leapt to him, and calling him knave and fool, bid him avast out of his presence: the Queen seeing him to angry with him, began to intrest for him, to whom the King said: Ah poor foul, thou little knowest what it is he came about; of my word sweet heart he hath been to thee a very knave. And thus by Gods Providence was this Queen preferred, who else had tasted of as bitter a cup, as any of his former Wives had done.

About this time King Henry and the Empe- rour sent Garnet and Tofjon dars, Kings at Arms, to demand performance of certain Articles of the French King: which if he denied, they were then commanded to deifie him: but the French King would not suffer them to come within his land, and so they returned; whereupon King Henry caused the said demands to be declared to the French Ambaffadoure at Wesminster; and in July fent over six thousand men, under the leading of Sir John Walsiphe accompanied with divers Knights and Gentlemen; Sir Thomas Seymour was Marshall of the Army, Sir Robert Bowes Treasurer, Sir Richard Cornwal Captain of the Horfe, and Sir George Carew his Lieutenant.

There were likewise Sir Tho. Palmer, Sir John Rainford, Sir John Saint-John, and Sir John Gaffignhe Knights, that were Captains of the Foor. Their Commissio was to join with the Emperor, and together to make War upon France. The third of August open War was proclaimed in London, between the Emperor and the King of England on the one part, and the French King on the other, as mortal enemy to them both; and to all other Christian Princes besides, as he that had confessed. himself with the Turk, Sir John Walsopp marching forth of Calais with his Army, joined with the Emperours Forces, who together went and besieged Landresly, a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the Borders of the Emperours Dominions: to raise this siege the French King had raised a mighty Army; with which he came on if he meant to give the Emperour Battel; and therupon the Emperour raising his siege, with a purpose to encounter him, the French King took the opportunity to put men and multitudes into the Town, which was the thing he intended; and having done this, the night following departed with his Army; and then the Emperour seeing him gone, and finding the Winter coming on, and no hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplied, he also broke up his Army, and returned home.

This year the Sunday before Christmas, the Lord Wriothesly, Brother to the Queen, who had married the Daughter and Heir of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, was at Hampton-Court created Earl of Essex; and Sir William Page Knight, Uncle to them both, was made Lord Parr of Horton, and Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and on New-years day Sir Thomas Wriothesly, the King's Secretary, was made Lord Wriothesly of Tichfield.

In June this year, Matthew Earl of Lenox fled out of Scotland, and came into England, whom King Henry received kindly, and gave him in marriage the Lady Margaret his Sisters Daughter, by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed memory:

Thames Addeley Lord Chancellor, being latterly dead, Thomas Lord Wriothesly succeeded him in the place; and now was an Army levied to go for France: the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Privy Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey the Duke's Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chorley, and his Son Sir Ralph Devereux; Sir Thomas Chesterly Lord Warden of the Channel Ports, the Lord Mayor, the Lord Bryan, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Thomas Payn, Captains of Gaffeters, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitfastide passed over to Calais, and marched toward M uitre, joined with the Emperours Forces, under the leading of the Comte de Boron; which two Armies laid siege to Muitre, whereof Mounfieur de Bies, one of the Marshalls of France was Captaine, but being then at Bullogne, and hearing of the siege of Muitre, he left Bullogne, and with his Forces came thither, which was the thing that was desired, to draw him from Bullogne; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolk appointed to pass over with the Kings Army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundel Marshal of the Field, the Lord Saint-John, the Bishop of Wincheste, Sir John Gage, Comptroller of the Kings House, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horfe, with divers others, who the nineteenth of July came and encamped before Bullogne; the four and twentieth of July the King in person, accompanied with the other forces of the Nobility, came to Calais; and the six and twentieth encamped before Bullogne on the North-side, many batteries and assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town upon composition yielded, and the Duke of Suffolk entered and took possession, suffered six thousand French, as was agreed, with bag and baggage to depart. The eight of September King Henry entered the Town himself, and then leaving the Lord Lifte Lord Admiral his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many enterprises after this were made by the Dauphin of France and by Monsieur de Bies for recovery of Bullogne, but they were still repelled, and the English kept the Town in plight of all they could do; although at one time there came an Army of eighteen thousand foot, at another time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelvethousand Launce Knights, twelve thousand French Footmen, six thousand Italian, four thousand of Legionary Soulers of France, a thousand men of Arms; besides eight thousand light Horfe; great Forces certainly to come and do nothing.

Whilest these things were doing about Bullogne, the Ships of the Wett Country and other places were laden aboard on the Sea, and took above three hundred French Ships; so that the Gray-fryers Church in London was laid full of Wine, the Affin fryers, and Black-fryers full of Herrings and other Fish, which should have been conveyed into France.

About this time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjefts, towards his Wars in France and Scotland; to which purpose, the Lord Chancellour, the Duke of Suffolk, and other of the Kings Council came at Baynard's-Castle, where they first called before them the Mayor and Aldermen; and because Richard Read Alderman, would not agree to pay as they saw him, he was commanded to serve the King in his Wars in Scotland, which the obligative man rather chose to do, than he would pay there: he was required; but being there, he was taken prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater damage, than if he had agreed to the Benevolence required: for at this time Sir Ralph Evers Lord Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roads into Scotland, assembled four thousand men, and entering Scotland now again, was encountered by the Earl of Arran, by whom he and the Lord Ogilvye, and many other Gentlemen were slain, and divers were taken prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

It was now the seven and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Saint Georges day Sir Thomas Wriothesly Lord Chancellour was made Knight of the Garter: also Trinity Terri was adjourned by reason of the Wars, but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tents were open.

At this time the English Fleet went before New-haven, but being there encountered by a far greater Fleet of French, they returned; with whose retreat, the French Admiral, emboldened, came upon the Coast of Sussex, where he landed Souliers; but upon firing of the Beacons was driven back, after which he landed two thousand men in the Isle of Wight, but there was repelled, though reported to have in his Ships thricethree hundred men.

In August this year, died the valiant Captaine the Lord Paynys, the Kings Lieutenant of his Town of Bullogne; and the same month also died
The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk.

Henry who by the way were met by the young Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton Court:

- In his seventh and twelfth year, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the King a Subsidy both of Spirituall and Temporall, and all Colleges, Charteries, and Hospitalts were given to him to dispose of: the four and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued, on which day the King coming to the Parliament Houfe, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellor was used to answer; but at this time the King would answer himself: the effect whereof was that where Master Speaker had commended him for many excellent qualities that were in him, he thanked him for it, not that he had them, but for putting him in mind how necessary it was he should have them: then he thanked the whole House for their Subsidy, and for giving him the Colleges and Charteries, which he promised he should apply to the Peace of the Realm: lastly, he acknowledged their love to himself, but found fault with want of love to one another; for what love, where there is not concord? what concord when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptist? and he again calleth him Papist and Hypocrite? and this not only amongst those of the Temporal, but even the Clergy-men themselves preach one against another, inveigh one against another, without Charity or Discretion; come to be filetype in their old Mumpsonus, and others so curious in their new Sumpsonus, that few or none Preacheth truly and sincerely the word of God: now therefore let this be amended, fear and serve God, be in charity amongst your selves, to the which, as your Supreme Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you: and this said, the Acts were openly read, to some he gave his Royal Assent, to some divers silenced not.

While the Oath for the Peace was thus taken by both Kings, Bulloigne remaining still in King Henry's possession, Mounfieur de Chaillons Captain of Mont-plague began to make a new BastilIon at the very mouth of the Haven of Bulloigne, naming it Chalions Garden: hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton as then Deputy of Bulloigne advertised the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his pleasure whether he should raie it, as a thing very incommodious to the Town, or let it stand; the King asked advice of his Council, who all agree, that the Conditions of the Peace ought in no wise to be infringed, and therefore to let the BastilIon stand; whereupon the King caufed his Secretary the Lord Paget, to write a Letter to the Lord Gray, to that purpose, but then called Sir Thomas Palmour secretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatsoever he had written in his Letter, yet with all speed possible, he should raie the Fortification to the ground; Sir Thomas Palmour replying, that a message by word of mouth being contrary to his Letter, would never be believed; well (said the King) do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his choice: upon the coming back of Sir Tho. Palmour, the Lord Gray called a Council, shewing them the Kings Letters, and withal Sir Thomas Palmour's Missal; and then asked their advice, what in this case he should do? who all agreed without any question that the Letter was to be followed, and not the Missal: to which the Lord Gray himself said nothing, but caused the Missal to be written Verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmour's mouth, and therewith the Council to set their hands to it; this done, the night following he sallied forth with a company of armed men and Pioneers, and overthrew the Fortification to the ground, and then sent Sir Thomas Palmour with Letters to the King, who, as soon as he saw them, asked aloud, What, will he do it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his Letter, said, Your Majesty shall know by these; and then the King half angry, Nay tell me (faith he) will he do it or no? being then told it was done, and the Fortifications clean razed, he turned to his Lord's and said, What say you my Lords to this, Chatsillo Garden is razed to the floor: Whereof one presently answered, he that had done it was worthy to lose his head; to which the King straightforwardly replied, That he would rather lose a dozen such heads as his was that so judged, than one such servant as had done it: and therewith commanded the Lord Gray's Pardon should presently be drawn; the which he sent with Letters of great thanks, and promise of reward; the cause why the King took this course withal, lest if he had written the razing of the Fortification in his Letter, it might have come to the French mens knowledge, before it could have been done, and so have been prevented; and this may be taken as a scenery of King Henry's great capacity.

It is now the eighth and thirtieth year of his Reign, when about Michaelmas, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Earl of Surrey, committed to the Tower, and why.

The Duke of Norfolk, and his Son the Earl of Surrey committed to the Tower, and why.

The Earl is beheld.

King Henry died.

1547.

Of his Taxes.

In his fourth year, in a Parliament at Westminster, was granted to the King, two Fifteenths of the Temporality, and two Tenths of the Clergy, and Head-money; of every Duke ten Marks, an Earl five pounds, a Baron four pounds, a Knight four Marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in Goods, to pay four Marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence, and every man and woman of fifteen years and upward four pence. In his fifth year, a Parliament was holden, where in divers Subsidies were granted to the King, towards the charges of his Wars in France: in his fourteenth year, order was taken by the Cardinal, that the true value of all men's subsidence might be known, and he would have had every man sworn, to tell what they were worth, and and required a tench part thereof, towards the Kings charges in the present wars, as the Spirituality had granted a fourth part; this the Laydemes thought very hard, and therupon were execuced for taking Oath, and were allowed to bring in their Bills upon their honneties; but when all was done, after much labouring by the Cardinal, the Clergy granted one half of all their yearly Spiritual Revenues, for five years, and the Temporality two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upwards, and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head of sixteen years, and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years. In his sixteenth year, the Cardinal of his own head attempted by Commission, to draw the people to pay the sixth part of every mans substance in Plate or Money; but this was generally opposed, and the people in many Countreys rife upon it, so as coming to the Kings knowledge, he utterly disallowed it, and blamed the Cardinal exceedingly for attempting it. In his four and twentieth year, a Parliament was held, and amongst the Charges towards his charges of making fortifications against Scotland. In his one and thirtieth year, a Subsidy of two shillings in the pound of Lands, and twelve of Goods, with four fifteens were granted to the King, towards his charges of making Bulwarks. In his five and thirtieth year a Subsidy was granted to be paid in three years, every English man being worth in goods twenty shillings and upwards to five poundes, to pay four pence of every pound, and from five poundes to ten pounds, eight pence, and from ten poundes to twenty pounds, six pence; from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings: Strangers as well Denizens as others, being Inhabitants, to pay double; and for Lands, every English man paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds, and from five pounds to ten pounds eleven pence, and from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two shillings, and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings, strangers double; the Clergy fix shillings in the pound of Benefices, and every Priest having no Benefice, but an Annual stipend, six shillings eight pence yearly, during three years.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

In a Parliament held in his sixteenth year, divers Laws were made, but two most spok'd of; one for Apparel, another for Labourers. In his twelveth year, he caus'd the Statues against Incloures to be reviv'd, and commanded that decayed houses should be built up again; and that Incloued grounds should be laid open; which though it did some good, yet not so much as it might have done, if the Cardinal for his own benefit had not procur'd liberty for great men, to keep up such Incloures, to the oppreッション of poor men. In his seventeenth year, the King lying at Eltham, divers Ordinances were made by the Cardinal touching the Governance of the Kings House, and were long after called the Statues of Eltham. In his eighteenth year, in the month of May, Proclamation was made against all unlawful Games, so that in all places, Tables, Dice, Cards, and Bowls were taken and burnt; but this order continued not long, for young men being restrained from these Games, fell home to drinking, some to sealing of Conies and Deer, and such other misdemeanours: Also in this year, was an inchanting of Coin, for the preventing the carrying it over to places where it went at a higher rate; so that the angel that went before but for seven shillings, should now go for seven and six pence, and every ounce of Gold should be five and forty shillings, which was before but forty, and other Coins accordingly. In his twentieth year, Sir James Spencer being Mayor of London, the Watch used on Midsummer night was laid down. In his three and thirtieth year, in a Parliament then held, an Act was made, that whosoever should pay any person should be boyled to death, by which Statute, one Richard Kaye, who had provoked divers persons in the Bishop of Rochester's place, was boyled in the bowful at Southwark, to the terrible example of all other. In his two and twentieth year, three Acts were made, one for probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, the third against plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by spiritual persons. In his thirtieth year it was ordained by Cranmer the Kings Vicar General, that in all Churches a Register should be kept of every Wedding, Christening, and Burial within the same Parith for ever. In his one and thirtieth year, the King first instituted and appointed fifty Gentlemen called Pensioners, to wait upon his person, assigning to each of them fifty pounds a year, for the maintenance of themselves and two Horses. In his six and thirtieth year, Proclamation was made for the inhancing of Gold to eight and forty shillings, and Silver to four shillings the ounce; also he caus'd to be coined bafe money, minting it with Brass, which was for some time called the fifth year of Edward the sixth, and called in the second year of Queen Elizabeth. In his fifteen and thirtieth year, the Brothel-houses called the Stews on the Bankside in Southwark, were put down by the Kings Commandement, and it was done by Proclamation and sound of Trumpet. In his three and twentieth year, it was enacted, that Bucharers should sell their meat by weight, Beef for a half-penny the pound, and Mutton for three farthings: also at this time foreign Bucharers were permitted to sell their flesh in London-hall Market, which before was not allowed; in his time also the Government of the President in the North was first instituted, and the first President there was Thomas Bishop of Durham.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

In the year 1517, the eighth year of this Kings reign, Martin Luther in Wittenberg in Germany, a Frier of the Order of the Hermite, taking occasion from the abuse of Indulgences, began to preach against the Authority of the Pope, and to bring in a Reformation of Religion; for repressing of whom, the Council of Diet and Cards forborne. of Trent was called by Pope Paul the third, in the year 1543, which continued above forty years, but was never received in the Kingdom of France; which Council, by decreeing many things to be points of faith, which were not so accounted before, hath made no small distraction among Papists themselves: against this Luther, King Henry wrote a Book with great bitterness, and with as great bitterness was answered. At the same time with Luther, there arose also in the same Country other Reformers of Religion, as Zwinglius, Oecolampadius, Melancthon, who differing from Luther in some few points, made the difference which is at this day of Lutherans and Protestants, so called at first at Augsburg, for making a Proclamation in defence of their Doctrine, which soon after spread all Christendom over. King Henry in the six and twentieth year of his Reign, had excluded the Popes Authority out of his Realm; but thinking the work not sufficiently done, as long as Abbeyes and Priories kept their statton, which were, as it were, his Fortresses and Pillars; there was not long after means found to have them suppressed; for apprehensions being laid upon them (and perhaps no more than truth) of Adulteresses and Murthers, they by Act of Parliament in his eight and twentieth year, at least near four hundred of them were suppressed, and all their Lands and Goods conferred upon the King. In his one and thirtieth year, and all in his five and thirtieth year, all Colledges; Chantries, and Hopitales, so as the Hives being now all removed, there have never since any Bees or Drones been seen in the Country. In this Kings time the City of Rome was taken and sacked by the Imperial Army, forcing the Pope to fly to his Cattle Saint Angel, and there kept a Prifoner, till he agreed to such conditions as his Adverteryies propounded. In the two and twentyith year of this Kings Reign, a Proclamnation was set forth, that no perfon should purchase any thing from the Court of Rome; and this was the first blow given to the Pope in England. In his three and twentieth year, the Clergy submitting themselves to the King, for being found guilty of a Presumtibus, were the first that called him Supreme Head of the Church. In his four and twentyith year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annuities or money for their Bells to the Pope, and another that no perfon should appeal for any cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commisary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all causes of the King to be tried in the upper House of the Convocation. In his six and twentieth year, in July, John Frith was burnt in Smithfield, and with him at the same flame one Andrew Howet a Tailor, both for denying the Real presence in the Sacrament; and in a Parliament holden this year, an Act was made which Authorizd the Kings Highness, to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Authority of the Pope to be abolished, and then also was given to the King the first Fruits and Tenth of all Spiritual Livings:

and this year were many put to death, Papists for denying the Kings Supremacy, Protestants for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament; and it is incredible what number for these two caufes were put to death in the last ten years of the Kings Reign, of whom if we should make particular mention, it would reach a great way in the Book of Martyrs. In his eight and twentieth year, the Lord Cromwell was made Vicar General under the King, over the Spiritualities, and rate divers times in the Convocation House among the Bishops as head over them; and in September this year, he set forth Injunctions, commanding all Parfons and Curates to teach their Parishioners the Pater-noster, the Ave, and Creed, with the ten Commandements and the Articles of the Christian Faith in the English tongue. In his one and thirtieth year, was set forth by the Bishops the Book of the six Articles, condemning all for Hereticks, and to be burnt, that should hold,

1. That the Bod of Christ was not really present in the Sacrament after Confection.
2. That the Sacrament might not truly be administered under one kind.
3. That Priests entred into holy Orders might marry.
4. That vow of Chastity entered into upon mature deliberation, were not to be kept.
5. That private Masses were not to be used.
6. That Annual Confession was not necessary in the Church.

This year also the Religion of Saint John in England, commonly called the Order of Knights of the Rhodes, was disfolved; and on Ascension-day, Sir William Welsford Knight, Prior of Saint John departed this life, for thought (as was reported) after he heard of the disfollution of his Order; for the King took all the Lands that belonged to that Order into his own hands: in his six and thirtieth year, the Letany or Procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the King, to be generally used in Parish Churches.

Works of Pity done by him or others in his time.

Upon the supprission of Abbeyes, King Henry instituted six new Bishopricks and six Cathedral Churches, endowing them with convenient maintenance; he also gave competent Penitents during their lives, to such Religious persons as were turned out of their Cloyfters; he also instituted in both the Universities Professors of the Hebrew and Greek Tongues, of Divinity, Civil-Law, and Phyfick, allowing to each of them forty pound a year; he also founded a College at Cambridge; he gave at his death a thousand Marks to the poor; and to twelve poor Knights of Windsor, each of them twelve pence a day for ever, and every year a long Gown of White Cloth: but his greatest work of Pity was his putting down the Stews in Southwark: Margarets Counsell of Rich mond, the Kings Grandmother, founded two Colleges at Cambridge, Christ-Church and Saint Johns. In the fifth year of this Kings Reign George Minor Mayor of
of London, re-edified the decayed Seecle of the Church of Waltham-flow in Eeef, adding thereto a fiefe bell with a Chappel where he lieth bored; on the North side of the Church-yard there he founded a fair Almshouse, for a Prieft and thirteen poor men and women, giving them a weekly maintenance; he also for the commodity of Travellers made a Canfey of Timber over the Marshes, from Waltham-flow to Lock-bridge towards London. In this Kings eighth year Richard Fte Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi College in Oxford, minding to have made it a house for Monks; but Hugh Oldham Bishop of Exeter, persuaded him to make it rather a College for Scholars, and joyning with him in it, contributed great sums of Money towards it, containing himself only with the name of a Benefactor. In his seventheen year King Henry built the Tower of Greenwich. In this Kings time Cardinal Wolffe founded two Colleges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich; to this College at Oxford he had given four thousand pounds a year. But in the later part of his Life, being all concerned in the King, the King took the Lands, but yet gave the College a competent maintenance for a Dean, eight Prebends, and a hundred Fellows; which College is now called Christ-Church, and accounts King Henry for their Founder. His College at Ipswich was demolished. This Cardinal also built Hampton Court, the chiefest at this day of all the Kings Houses; and built or enlarged White-hall called then York-Place. King Henry in his four and twentieth year, built also his Minion House of Saint James, where also he made a fair Park. This place before had been an Hospitall of Sifters, with whom the King compounded, giving them Penions during their lives. In his thirtieth year, Nicholas Gilfen Grocer, then Sheriff of London, built a Free-School at Raisiffe near London, with maintenance for a Master and an Under; he also built an Almshouse there for an hundred poor Men, Women, and Children. In his one and thirtieth year, Thomas Haufton, the then Sheriff of London, gave certain Tenements to Haberdashers, for finding of ten Almshofer of the same Company. In his six and thirtieth year, Sir John Allen who had been twice Mayor of London, and at the Kings Council, gave at his death to the City of London, a rich Coller of Gold, to be worn by the Mayor; which Coller was first worn by Sir William Laxton on Saint Edwards day, at the election of the new Mayor, who gave to every Ward in London twenty pounds, to be distributed amongst poor Householders; besides to richest persons, whereof three thousand, to every one a Gown of broadcloth, and a black Cap; and thirty women, to every one a Gown of the like Cloth, and a white Kercif. In the eight and thirtieth year, King Henry gave to the City of London, for relief of poor people in St. Bartholomew Spittle, the Church of the Gray fivers, and two Parish Churches, the one at St. Nicholas in the Shambles, the other St. Eunis in Kingste-market, all to be made one Parish Church of the Grayfriers; and in Lands he gave for the maintenance of the same five hundred Marks a year for ever.

and this Church to be named Christ-Church, founded by King Henry the eighteighth. The Lady Elizabeth Holly (the Widow of Sir William Holly Knight, late Lord Mayor of the City of London) by her late Will and Testament, dated the 17 of February 1543, and in the thirty fifth year of the Reign of King Henry the eighth, and proved at London in the Prerogative Courts of Canterbury the 28 of March 1544, did will her Executors, her Cousin Mr. Andrew Jak Alderman (afterwards Knight and Lord Mayor of London) and her Brother Thomas Scopham, that they should provide a place or plot of ground, whereon should be erected six Almshouses for fixed aged men, Women, or others both, to inhabit and dwell in, for the maintenance of which, the willed that her said Executors should purchase such much Land or Tenements within the City of London, or Liberties of the same, as would amount de claro above all charges to the yearly value of ten pound sterling, to be distributed in this manner: that is to say, to every of the said six Almshouses seven pence by the Week, to be paid on every Saturday or Sabbath-day weekly, and the remainder of the said yearly ten pound to be distributed in Coals yearly, in the Winter season, and amongst the said six Almshouses, and this to continue for ever whiles the World shall endure, as by the said Will may appear, which was afterwards accordingly effected by her said Executors; which said Lady Elizabeth Holly and Sir William Holly, were great Grandfather and great Grandmother unto John Holly Knight, Earl of Clare, &c. deceased.

Deaths of his time.

In his ninth year happened a Sweating-sickness, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England died, especially in London; and so violent, that in three, and sometimes two hours, it took away men's lives, and scared neither rich nor poor; for in the King's Court the Lord Clinton, the Lord Grey of Wilton, and many Knights, Gentlemen, and Officers died of it. It began in July, and continued to the midst of December. In his thirteenth year was a great Mortality in London, and other places of the Realm, and many men of Honour and Worship died; amongst others; Doctor Fox-James Bishop of London, in whose place Doctor Tenfant succeeded. In his fifteenth year, after great rains and winds there followed to fore a Frott, that many died for cold; and some left Fingers, some Toes, and many their Nails. In his nineteenth year, by extremity of rain in feed-time, there followed an agreat dearth of Corn, which would have caused great calamity; but that it was relieved in London by Merchants of the Steel-yard out of Germany, and a thousand quarters supplied out of the Kings own provision. In his twentieeth year, in the end of May, began in London another Sweating-sickness, which afterwards spreaded all places of the Realm by reason whereof of the Term was adjourned, and the Circuit of the Assizes also; many died in the Court, as Sir Francis Poynter, Sir William Compton Knights, and
The Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

William Cary. Esquire of the Kings Privy Chamber; the King himself for a space, removed almost every day, till he came to Tithinghanger, a place of the Abbot of St. Alban, where he with the Queen and a small number remained, till the flicknels was past. In his thirtieth year, the manner of casting Pipes of Lead for conveyance of water underground, without using of Soder, was first invented by Robert Brooke Clerk, one of the Kings Chaplains: a profitable Invention; for thereby, two men and a boy will do more in one day, than could have been done before by many men in many days: Robert Cooper Goldsmith, was the first that made the Instruments, and put this Invention in practice. In a Rebellion in the North, in this Kings time, when the Duke of Norfolk was sent with an Army against the lands, and their day of battle between them was appointed, it happened, that the night before a small Brook called Dam, running between the two armies, upon the fall of a small rain, swelled to such a height, that it was not passable by either foot or horse; a thing which had never happened before upon a greater rain, and was then accounted (as indeed it was) no less than a Miracle. In his third and thirtieth year, was a great Mortality in the Realm, by reason of hot Ages and Fluxes, and withal so great a drought, that small Rivers were clean dried, much Carrel died for lack of water, and the Thomas was grown so shallow, that the Salt-water flowed above London Bridge, till the rain had encreased the fresh waters. In his fifth and thirtieth year, the first cast Pieces of Iron that ever were made in England, were made at Buckfchord in Suffex by Ralph Hage and Peter Bearde. In his fixt and thirtieth year, was a great Plague in London, so as Michaelmas Term was adjourned to Saint Albans, and there kept. In his seventh and thirtieth year, on Tuesday in Easenweek, William Foxley Pot-maker for the Mint of the Tower of London, fell asleep, and could not be waked with pinching, or burning, till the first day of the next Term, which was full fourteen days; and when he awaked, was found in all points, as if he had slept but one night, and lived forty years after. About his fifteenth year, it happened that divers things were newly brought into England, whereupon this Rhyme was made:

Divers things neath brought into Englaund.

The first cast Pieces of Iron made.

One that first four tens days together without wakings.

Katherine, Daughter of Ferdinand King of Spain, the Relic of his Brother Arthur, she lived his Wife above twenty years, and then was divorced from him; after which she lived three years by the name of Katherine Dewergy, the deceased at Kimbolton in the County of Huntingdon, the eighth of January in the year 1535, and lieth interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, under a Hearse of black Say, having a white Crofs in the midst. His second Wife was Anna, second Daughter of Sir Thomas Bulien Earl of Wilts鲱re and Ormond; she was married to him the five and twentieth day of January, in the year 1533. He lived his Wife three years, three months, and five and twenty days, and then was beheaded, and her body buried in the Choir of the Chappell in the Tower. His third Wife was Jane, Daughter of Sir John Seymour, and Sister to the Lord Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, and Duke of Somerset, she was married to him the next day after the bearing of Queen Anne, lived his Wife one year, five months, and four and twenty days, and then died in Child-bed; and was buried in the midst of the Choir of the Church within the Chapel of Windor. His fourth Wife was Anne, Sister to the Duke of Cleve, she lived his Wife six months, and then was divorced; she remained in England long after the Kings death, and accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London, at the solemnizing of Queen Marias Coronation. His fifth Wife was Katherine, Daughter of Edmund, and Neece of Thomas Howard his Brother Duke of Norfolk; she was married to him in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign; lived his Wife one year, six months, and four days, and then was beheaded in the Tower of London, and buried in the Chancel of the Chappell by Queen Anne Bulien. His sixth Wife was Katharina, Daughter of Sir Thomas Parr of Kendal, and Sister to the Lord William Parr, Marquess of Northampton; she was first married to John Nevil Lord Latimer, and after his death to the King at Hampton Court, in the fifth and thirtieth year of his Reign: she was his Wife three years, six months, and five days; and then surviving him, was again married to Thomas Seymour Lord Admiral of England, unto whom she bore a daughter, but died in her Child-bed, in the year 1548. He had Children by his first Wife Queen Katherine, Henry born at Richmond, who lived not full two months, and was buried at Westmister; also another Son, whose name is not mentioned, lived but a short time neither: then a Daughter named Mary, born at Greenwich, in the eighth year of his Reign, and came afterward to be Queen of England. By his second Wife, Queen Anne Bulien, he had a Daughter named Elizabeth, born at Greenwich, in the fifth and twentieth year of his Reign; who succeeded her Sister Mary in the Crown: he had also by her a Son, but born dead. By his third Wife, Queen Jane, he had a Son named Edward, born at Hamton-Crom in the nine and twentieth year of his Reign, who succeeded him in the Kingdom. Besides these, he had a bafe Son, named Henry Fitz-Foy, begotten of the Lady Tobeyes, called Elizabeth Blant, born at Blackmore in Essex, in the tenth year of his Reign; who was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset; married Mary Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, with whom he lived not long, but died at St. James by Westminter, and was buried at Ermingham in Suffolf.

Of his Perownage and Conditions.

He was exceeding tall of stature, and very strong; fair of complexion, in his later days corpulent and burly: concerning his condition, ditions, he was a Prince of so many good parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill; and indeed he had not many ill, till flattery and ill counsel in his latter time got the upper hand of him. His cruelty to his Wives may not only be excused, but defended; for if they were intemperate, he did but justice; if they were not so, yet it was sufficient to satisfy his conscience, that he thought he had caufe to think them so; and if the marriage Bed be honourable in all, in Princes it is sacrilegious. In supprefling of Abbeys he shewed not little Piet, but great Providence; for though they were excellent things being rightly used, yet most pestilential, being abufed; and then may the ufe be justly sup- prefled, when the abuse fcarce poifibly can be restrained. To think he supprefled Abbeys out of covetoufnefs and defire of gain, is to make him extremely deceived in his reckoning; for if we compare the profit with the charge that followed, we fhall find him certainly a great forer by the bargain. He was so far from pride, that he was rather too humble, at leaft he convened with his Subjects in a more tillifian manner than was usual with Princes. So valiant, that in his whole life almost, was nothing but exercises of valour; and though performed among his friends in jeft, yet they prepared him against his Enemies in earnest, and they that durft be his Enemies found it. It may be faid, the complication of his Government for the first twenty years was fanguine and jovial; for the reft, choleric and bloody: and it may be doubted. whether in the former, he was more prodigal of his own treasure, or in the latter of his Subjects blood: for as he spent more in Fictions, than any other King did in Realities; fo in any defterminer of his people, he had no other Phyllick, but to open a vein: but we fhall do him extreme wrong, to think that all the blood he fed in his time, was of his shedding; they were the Bishops that were the Duke to make the bloody Laws; the Bishops that were the Pharaohs, to put them in execution: the King oftentimes fcarce knew what was done. Certain it is, when a great Lord gets a Gentlewoman the fecond time on the Rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemned him for fuch extreme cruelty. As for Religion, though he brought it not to a full Reformation, yet he gave it to a great a beginning, that we may truly fay of that he did, _Diunitum pluris set_. They who charge him with the vice of luft, let them fhow fuch another example of continence as was feen in him, to lie fix months by a young La- dy, and not to touch her; for fo did he with the Lady Anne of Cleve: but this is to make _Nofigyres_; I like better to leave every voyage growing upon its falk, that it be gathered treeth; which will be done by reading the story of his Life.

Of his Death and Burial.

It is recorded of him, that in his latter time he grew to far and flothful, that engines were made to lift and remove him up and down; but howformerly in the fix and fifteenth year of his age, whether by a Drapecle, or by reason of an Ulcer in his Leg, he fell into a languishing Fever, which brought him into fuch extremity, that his Physicians utterly defpaired of his life, whereof yet none durft speak a word to him, till Master Deny one of his Privy Chambre took the boldnefs to go to him, telling him of the danger he was in, and withal putting him in mind to think of his fouls health; to which he answered, that he confedd his fins to be exceeding great, yet had fuch confidence in the mercy of God through Chrift, that he doubted not of forgivenefs though they had been much greater; and being then asked by Master Deny, if he would have any Divine brought to him with whom to confer, he answered he would willingly have the Archbishop Cranmer, but not yet a while, till he had taken a little ref: whereupon the Archbishop being then at Cranfords was pretty fent for; but before he could come, the King was grown speechlefs, only leeming to retain a little memory, fo as putting out his hand, and the Archbishop deliring him to fhew some sign of his faith in Chrift, he then wrung the Archbishop hard by the hand, and immediately gave up the ghoft, the eight and twentieth of January, in the year 1547, the fix and fifteenth of his age, and in the reign of his eight and thirtieth: By his body with great solemnity was buried at Windfe under a moft coldly and darely Tomb, begun in copper and gilt, but never finished.

The Reign of

KING EDWARD

THE SIXTH.

T was now in the year 1547, when on the eighth and twentieth of January King Henry dying, Prince Edward his Son, the third Wife, the Lady Jane Seymour, and the only Son he left behind him, as well by right of Inheritance, as by his last Will, succeeded him in the Kingdom; to whom as being but nine years old, and therefore unripe for Government, he had assigned eight and twenty Counsellours; a fit number, if agreeing amongst themselves; too many if at variance: and at variance they would soon fall, if there were not a Moderator to keep them in concord; the first work therefore necessary to be done in this new world, was to make choice of such a man as might be to the Counsellours a Moderator, a Protector to the King, and in his minority, to the Kingdom. To this place by common consent of the King and Council: Edward Seymour Earl of Hartsford, the King's Uncle was chosen to hold the place, until the King should accomplish the age of eighteen years. In which Office the first thing he did, was to make the young King Knight, who presently thereupon, made Henry Hobbethorn Mayor of London Knight; and then King Henry's Obsequies being solemnly performed, on the seventeenth of February, were raised in honour the Earl of Hartsford Protector, to be Duke of Somerset, William Earl of Essex, to be Marques of Northampton, Dudley Vicount Lisle, to be Earl of Warwick, Wrothley Lord Chancellor, to be Earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Seymour the Protectors Brother was made Lord Sudeley, and Admiral of England, Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich, Sir William Willingly was made Lord Willoughby, and Sir Edmund Sheffield was made Lord Sheffield of Butterwick: On the nineteenth of February the King in great state rode from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster, where the day following, he was Crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all rites accustomed, in great solemnity. At which time a general Pardon was proclaimed for all offenders, excepted, namely the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pole, Edward Courteny, elder Son to the Marques of Essex, Master Fortescue, Master Throgmorton, and Doctor Peter Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid taking the Oath of Supremacy, all which six continued unpardoned, till the first year of Queen Mary, and then were restored. A few days after the Earl of Southampton Lord Chancellor, for being contumacious to the rest of the Lords in matters of counsel, was removed both from his Office of being Chancellor, and from his place in Council, and the great Seal was delivered Sir William Paulet, Lord Saint-John, and Lord great Master of the Kings Housethold.

Within two months after the death of King Henry, died Francis King of France also, for whom solemn Obsequies were kept in Paris Church, as he likewise had kept before at Paris for King Henry; these two Kings were of so consenting natures, that they had certainly been great friends while they lived, if they had not been Kings, and that jealousy of state had not made them oftentimes not to be themselves.

King Henry before his death had left in charge with the Lords of his Council, by all means possible, to procure a proceeding in the marriage with the young Queen of Scots; and now in discharge thereof the Lord Protector himself, with an Army of twelve thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse, besides Labourers and Pioneers, had set out to the Realm of Scots, in the third of September: at which time all Edward Lord Clinton with a Fleet of three score Sail assisted by Sea; but before he would do any hostile Act, he caused Proclamation to be made, that his coming was only to have performance of the Articles heretofore agreed on for the marriage, tending to the good of both Kingdoms, if they would yield unto, he would then return in peaceable manner, and the more to draw them on, where before it was demanded to have the Queen brought into England, and there to be brought up, he the Protector was content, she should remain in Scotland till years of content; this demand, the more moderate, of the Scots accorded very reasonable, but those of the French and Papal Faction, who were the greatest persons, and the greatest number, strongly opposed: whereupon the Lord Protector presently put his Army into Array; the Lord Grey and Sir Francis Bryan, with eight hundred Light-Horse, were sent before to provide Lodging for the Army, and to give advertisement of the enemies approaches; then followed the Avant-guard, in number between three and four thousand Foot, one hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Light-Horse, led by the Earl of Warwick; then followed the main Battel, consisting of above six thousand Foot, six hundred
The Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

Laid with numbers, they were put to flight, and chased almost to the edge of their Camp. In this fight the chiefest Force of the Scottish Horse-men was defeated, the Lord Hames by a fall from his Horse lost his life, his Son and Heir, with two Priests, and six Gentlemen were taken prisoners, and about fifteen hundred slain: the next day, the Protector and the Earl of Warwick rode towards the place where the Scottish Army lay, to view the manner of incamping. As they returned, an Herald and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them, who having obtained Audience, the Trumpeter said, that the Lord Hauke his Master, to spare effusion of Christian blood, would fight upon the whole quarter, either with twenty against twenty, or with ten against ten, or else try it between the Lord General and himself: the Protector answered, that for number of Combatants, it was not in his power to conclude any bargaining; and as for himself, that being in Pucklick charge, it was not fit he should hazard himself against a man of Private Conditions, which otherwise he would most willingly accept there. The Earl of Warwick desired the Lord General that he might accept the Challenge; and, Trumpeter (faith he) bring me word, that his Master will perform the Combat with me, and thou shalt have an hundred Crowns for thy pains; nay, rather (faith the Lord General) bring me word, that thy Master will abide and give us battle, and thou shalt have a thousand Crowns for thy pains: and thereafter, when no other agreement could be made, a general battle was resolved on; in the Army of the Scots were five or six and thirty thousand men; in the Avant-guard, commanded by the Earl of Angus, about fifteen thousand; in the Battel, over whom was the Lord Governor, about ten thousand; and the Arrears, as many, led by the vaillant Gowdean, Earl of Hauntey, Hackbutters they had none, nor men at Arms, but about two thousand Horse-men (Pickers as they term them) the rest were all on foot, well furnished with Jacks and Sculls, Pikes, Daggers, Breaches and Hackbutters, and the Scottish Horse-men began to hove about the English Army, and to come pricking towards them, sometimes within length of their staves, using provoking words, to draw the English from their strength; but the Protector, not moved with their provocations, maintained a close march till he came to Salt-Prefon by the Frith, where he incamped within two miles of the Scottish Army: and here the Scots having gotten the advantage of a Hill came upon the English with the number of twelve hundred Horse, besides five hundred foot that lay in ambush behind the Hill, at which time the Lord Gray and Francis Brian, impatient of such braveries, obtained leave of the General to encounter them, and so as they came scattered upon the field, within a stones cast of the English, and were beginning to wheel about, the Lord Gray with some Troops of Light-horse-men, charged them home, and was forthwith seconded by certain numbers of Demilances, and both of them backed with a thousand men at Arms; yet the Scots refolutely maintained the fight three hours and more, but in the end, over-how he flourished to the Marriage? Made this answer, That he liked the Marriage well enough, but he liked not this kind of woing. This Victory of Munglborough against the Scots, was on the tenth of December, the very same day on which thirty years before a Victory had been had against them at Flodden field; so as it seems this day was fatal to the Scots, and confirms the opinion of Astrologers, that there are days to some men fortunate, and unfortunate to others, if they could be known.

This victory struck such a terror into many of the Scots, that the Earl of Bathuel & divers chief Gentlemen of Tivendale & Miers submitted themselves to the King of England, and were received by the Protector into his protection; after this, the English Army took many Towns and Caffles, and then for want of Provision, returned into England, having now above five and twenty days in Scotland, and not loit above three hundred. After the taking of Munglborough, the Duke of Buckingham managed to take many Knights, but three especially; namely, Sir Ralph Saller Treasurer, Sir Francis Brian Captain of the Light Horse, and Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Horsemen; he made Banner, which is a dignity above a Knight, and next to a Baron; and these were the laft from that time to this, did ever receive this dignity. But notwithstanding this great overthrow at Munglborough, the Governor of Scotland would not yet be quiet; but assailing the people, made unto them an Oration, exhorting them to defend the liberty of their Country, and not to be daunted with any event of war.

In this time many distractions and troubles happened in England; partly, in matters of Religion, and partly about Incloures: and first for Incloures, the Lord Protector caufed Proclamation to be fur forth, commanding that they who had alienated any Lands accoutned or held in Lieu, should upon a certain pain, before a day assigned, lay them open again. And then in matter of Religion, certain Injunctions were fur forth, for removing of Images out of Churches; and divers Preachers were fent with Instructions to difcourage the people from praying to Saints, or for the dead; from use of Beads, Afhces and Processions; from Masfes, Diriges, praying in any unknown Tongue; and for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed publicly to be read in Churches: and many for offering to maintain those Ceremonies, were either punished, or forced to recant. Edmund Bamer, Bishop of London, was committed to the Fleet, for refusing to receive these Injunctions; Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was likewise committed first to the Fleet, and after to the Tower, for that he had preached, It was well these changes in Religion were made, until the King were of years to govern by himself; for the like caufes Tindall, Bishop of Durham, Heath, Bishop of Rochester, and Day, Bishop of Chichester, were in like manner committed to prison, and all of them dispoifled of their Bishopricks; and that which was worfe, the Bishopricks themselves were dispoifled of their Revenues, in such foment, that a very small part remained to the Bishops that came after.

And now a Parliament was held, in the first year of the King, and by Prorogation in the second; where, divers Charters, Col- ledges, free Chappells, Fraitiveuries and Guildes, with all their lands and goods, were given to the King; which being sold at a low rate, en- riched many, and enmoibled fome, and thereby made them firm in maintaining the change: also it was then ordered, that no man should speak againft receiving the Eucharist in both kinds, and that Bishops should be placed by Collation of the King under his Letters Pa- tens, without any election preceding, or confirmation ensuing; and that all Procelles Eccle- siastical should be made in the Kings name, in Writs at the Common Law; and that all perons exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, should have the Kings Arms in the Seals of their Officer; and further, the Statute of the fix Articles and other Statutes concerning punishment of Loll- taine, was repealed, and the Kings Supremacy over the whole of England, confirmed.

All this while the Wars in Scotland continued, and were managed by the Lord Gray of Window with variable success; and now about this time was sent to him in aid, the Earl of Shrewsbury, with fifteen thousand men; against him, at the time of the Scots, was sent the Rhinegrv with ten thousand French; who entering into consultation, how to remove the young Queen out of the reach of the Englfs, provided a Fleet, and failing about Scotland, notwithstanding the English Fleet lay in wait to impeach their paf- fage, yet conveyed her safely into France, being then but fix years old, accompanied in the jour- ney with James her fafe Brother, John Erskin, and William Levien; and in April following was married to France the Dauphin of France.

You heard before the alterations in Religion: how bear the troubles; for when the In- junctions were fent abroad into the Country, and Commissioners appointed to enforce them, executed: one Mafter Body a Commissioner, as he was pulling down Images in Cornwall, was suddenly by a Priest flabbed into the body with a Knife. Hereupon the people flocked together in divers parts of the Shire, taking Arms, and beginning to commit outrages; and although the chief Offender was hanged and quartered in Smithfield, and many of his Complices exe- cuted in divers parts of the Realm, and withal a Pardon proclaimed to all that would lay down Arms; yet neither could that feverity, nor this lenity refrain them from their. infelicities; but in divers Countries, as Suffolk, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucefhir, Warwickfhir, Wolfsbury, being commonly in Somersfhir and Devonfhir, great Assemblies of people gathered to a head; whose chief Leaders were Humphrey Arundel, and about three or four of inferior note, but many Priests, Some of thofe (we may infer) were Common-wealth mutineers; and some mutined for Religion; who were for the Common-wealth could agree upon nothing; some would have no Justices, none no Gentlemen, none no Lawyers, nor ordinary Courts of Justice; but above all, Incloures muft down; but whether all, or which, or how to be imployed, none could tell. The religious Mutineers were not altogether so various in their voices, as having some some few among them by whom they were guided: these in the name of the people, headed up these Articles following; upon granting of which, they professed that both their bodies and goods should be at the King's devotion.
1. That Cures should administer Baptisms at all times of necessity, as well on week-days as on holy-days.
2. That their children might be confirmed by the Bishop.
3. That the Maaj might be celebrated, no man communing with the Priest.
4. That they might have reformation of the Lords' holy in their Churches.
5. That they might have holy Bread and holy Water in remembrance of Christ's precious Body and Blood.
6. That Priests might live unmarried.
7. That the six Articles, set forth by King Henry the Eighth, might be continued, at least till the King should come to full age.

Upon these demands, the King, although he was dead, would little prevail with unreasonable men: yet to discharge the place he held, he sent them in writing Answers to them all, and withal a general Pardon, if they declined and lay down Arms. But the sedition growing the more outrageous, the fairer they were intrusted; and finding themselves unable to submit to their own estates, began to think upon the spoil of Cities; and first they came to Exeter, and demanded entrance, which the Citizens refusing, they fell to fortifying the City, but the Citizens prevented this, by casting in wood and maintaining the fire, till they had cast up a half Moon within: upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were presently hewn and cut in pieces: and after this they mined the walls, laid Powder, and rammed the mouth; but the Citizens prevented this also, by making a counter-minaire, whereinto they poured such plenty of water, that the wet Powder could not be fired. All this while, the Lord Raffles, Lord Privy Seal, who had been sent down to suppresse the Commotion, lay at Huntingdon, expecting more Forces; whilst the Citizen of Exeter for twelve days together endured to great famine, that they were fain to eat Horses, and make bread of course Brud moulded in cloaths; for that other wise it would not cleave together. At lait the Lord Gray came to the Lord Raffles with supply of Forces, who after many conflicts with the Rebels, forced them to take their siege at Exeter; and thereby freed the City from many miseries: to whom the King afterward gave the Mannor of Exondty,in reward for their loyalty.
After this, the Rebels rallying their Forces, were again sent upon by the Kings Army, and the greatest part of them slain, the rest fled; many taken and executed by Marshal Law; the chief Leaders were sent to London, and there executed. The sedition being thus suppressed, it is memorable what sport Sir William Kingston the Provost Marhial made, by vertue of his Of-Fice, upon men in misery. One Bawer, Mayor of Bodmin in Cornwall, had been amongst the Rebels, not willingly, but enforced: to him the Provost sent word he would come and dine with him; for whom the Mayor made great provision; a little before Dinner, the Provost took the Mayor aside, and whispered him in the ear, that an execution must that day be done in the Town, and therefore required to have a pair of Gallows let up against dinner should be done; the Mayor failed not of his charges presently after dinner the Provost taking the Mayor by the hand, intreated him to lead him to the place where the Gallows was, which when he beheld, he asked the Mayor if he thought them to be strong enough; yes (said the Mayor) doubtles s they are; Well then, said the Provost, get you up speedily, for they are provided for you. I hope (answered the Mayor) you mean not as you spoke: In short (said the Provost) there is no remedy, for you have been a buffer Rebel; and so without repit or defence he was hanged to death; a most uncourteous part, for a guest to offer his host. Near the said place dwelt a Miller, who had been a buffer in that Rebellion; who, fearing the approach of the Marshal, told a sturdy fellow his servant, that he had occa-This the Fellow cried out, that he was not the Miller, but the Mills man: Nog Sir (said the Provost) I will take you as your word; and if thou best the Miller, thou art a knave; and if thou best not, thou art a false lying knave: and bowsever, thou canst carly do the Mayor better service than to hang for him; and to without more ado he was dispatched.

When this Sedition in Devonshire was appeared, there arose another in Norfolk; and that specially upon a grievance for Incloures; the Rebels had got one Robert Ket, a Tanner of spindolms, to be their Leader, and were grown to a Body of twenty thousand, setting themselves at Monford near Mount-Swerry, where they carried a face as it were of Justice and Religion; for they had one Gowers an idle fellow to be their Chaplain, who morning and evening read solemn Prayers, also Sermons they had often; and as for Justice, they had a Bench under a Tree, where Ket usually sat, and with him two of every Hundred whence their Companies had been raised, to bear complaints, &c to give Judgment (and from hence were Warrants sent in the Kings name, to bring in Powder, shot, Victuals, and all things necessary: Which Tree hath ever since been called the Tree of Restoration.
And now being grown to a height, they prefented certain Complaints to the King, requiring, he would send a Herald to them, to give them satisfaction. The King, though he took it for a great indignity to have such base Fellows to capitulate with him, yet framing himself to the time, he returned this answer: That in October following he would call a Parliament, wherein their Complaints should be heard, and all their Grievances should be redressed, requiring them in the mean time, to lay down Arms, and return to their houses, and thereupon granting them a

The Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

but this was so far from satisfying the Seditionists, that hereupon first they assaulted the Town of Norwich, took it, and made the Mayor and the Town Council their Servant, and then returned again to their flight at Cowesfield. Not long after, William Parke, Mayor of Northampton, and the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wentworth, twelve Knights and fifteen hundred horse, with a small Band of Italians, were sent against them; whom the Seditionists stoutly opposed, and must mischief was done on both sides; the Lord Sheffield, falling with his Horse in a Ditch, was taken prisoner, and as he pulled off his Helmet to show who he was, he was by a Butcher strucken down with a Club and a knife. So as the Marquis with his Forces not prevailing, there was an accord of the Earl of Warenwick, with six thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, with whom were the Lords Wolfljghy, Pow'y, & Gray, his two Sons Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of Name. When the Earl was come near to the Camp of the Seditionists, he sent a Herald to them, offering them the Kings Pardon, if they would desist; but they were so far from accepting it, that a young Boy turned up his naked breast towards the Herald, and bid him kiss it. Upon this, many Sirriffes passed between the Earl and them, with lobs sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another, at last they came to a Battel: where the Rebels placed in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken prisoners, meaning they should be the first slain, of whom yet very few were hurt, but of the Rebels were slain above two thousand, and now once again the Earl offered them pardon, if they would desist; but for all their Jolies, they continued obstinate still. At last, the Earl sent to know if they would entertain their Pardon, in case he should come in Person and assure them of it: This moved them much; and then they answered, They knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and cautioning their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Weapons, with all joy and prosperity to the King. Nine of the principal Rebels were hanged upon the Tree of Reformation; kept himself flying away was taken and hanged in Chaim upon Norwich Cattle.

The day of this defeat of the Seditionists was a long time after observed for a Festive day by the Inhabitants of Norwich, and this ended the Sedition in Norfolk. When at the same time another arose in York, whereof the chief movemens were William Oliver a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clerk, and Stephenson a Poet, to whom were assembled four or five thousand, who took their encouragement from a certain Prophecy, which did foretell, Thus the time should come, when there should be no King: when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroyed; when the Reign should be ruled by four Governors elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in commotion, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England; and that time they understood to be the present, and that the Rebels of Devonshire, Norfolk, and Yorkshire, should draw together to accomplish this Prophecy. But as soon as they heard that the Tumults of Devonshire and Norfolk were quieted, they found that they were deceived in the understanding of the Prophecy; and therefore presently, upon the Kings Pardon, they fell off and dispersed, their chief Leaders, Oliver, Dale, and four others were executed at York; and with this, the Spirit of Sedition was quite laid in all places of the Kingdom.

But the King of France taking advantage of these Seditions, though he had been in Treaty before of Peace with England, yet now brake of the Treaty, proclaimed War, and denounced it by his Embassador to the King: hereupon all Frenchmen in England, not Denizens, were taken prisoners, and all their Goods seiz’d for the King; which the French King understanding, he sent a Fleet of Ships to surprize Greatsey and Jersey, but was repulsed with the loss of a thousand men. After this, he levied an Army by land, and went himself in Person against Bullogr, defended by the valiant Sir Nicholas Arnold; but being weary of the Work, he left his Lieutenant Chalif to pursue the Siege, who having made many fierce Batteries, and at last attackes, and not prevailing, he then attempted to hinder the Town from supply of Victuals, and to this end charged a Gallery with Bravel & Stones, meaning to sink it in the Haven, but the English took the Galley before it was sunk, and made use of the stones for their own defence; after this they made faggots of light matter, mixed with Pitch, Tar, Tallow, Robin, Powder, and Wild-fire, with intention to set the Ships in the Haven, but that enterprise was defeated by the Bullogarts, and the faggots taken from the French; and more than this there was little done in those parts at this time.

But in England, in the meantime, an unfortunates accident happened, which beginning upon a very light occasion, produced afterward very heavy effects; whereof, though there were many concurrent circumstances, yet the original cause was the pride of a Woman, upon a point indeed wherein the natures of Women are commonly molt tender, Precedency of Place: the Protector had married Anne Standhope, a Woman of a haughty stomack, and the Lord Admirals Brother, the Queen Dowager, a Lady of great meed; the nearness of the Husband's occasions of the Ladies often meeting, where the Dutchess would inwardly murmur, why she being the Wife of the elder Brother, & the better man, should give place to her, who was the wife of the younger Brother, and the meaner man; this envy of hers towards the Queen, bred a malice in her towards the Admiral, as thinking the mischief she did to the Husband, to be a part of revenge upon the Wife; and though the Queen shortly after died in Child-birth, yet the malice of the Dutchess towards the Admiral lived still (so hard a thing it is for malice, once settled in a Womans heart, to be removed;) out of this malice, she purs divers families into her Husband the Protectors head, against his Brother the Admiral, as though he went about to procure his death, to the end, he might aspire to the place he held; but certainly, as milking his Government being a Protestant, who was himself a Papist: In this case causes of jealousy against the Admiral were obvious enough, for it was

known that in King Henry the time, he had aimed at the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth King, Henrietta second Daughter; and now his Wife the Queen Dowager being dead (and not without suspicion of poison) he fell upon that marriage afresh, which could not but be thought to tend but to some very high aspiring end: The Protector a plain man, and one that had not the deepest insight into practices, whether too importantly provoked by his Wife, or whether out of an honest mind, not willing to patronize faults, though in a Brother, gave way to Accusations brought against him, to as in a Parliament then holden, he was accordin for attempting to get into his custody the Person of the King, and Government of the Realm, for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth the Kings Sister, for persuading the King in his tenderness and of ruling upon the business of ordering of himself; and which points (though perhaps proved, yet not sufficiently, against him, who was never called to his answer) he was by Act of Parliament condemned and within few days after condemnation, a Warrant was sent, under the hand of his Brother the Protector, to cut off his Head; wherein (as after it proved) he did as much, as if he had laid his own Head down upon the Block; for whilest these Brothers lived and held together, they were as strong Fortrefs one to the other; the Admirals courage supporting the Protectors Authority, and the Protectors Authority maintaining the Admirals stoutnes; but the Admiral once gone, the Protectors Authority, as wanting support, began to totter, and fell at last to utter ruine. Besides, there was at this time, amongst the Nobility, a kind of faction; Protectors who favoured the Protector for his own sake, and other the Papal inclination, who feared him: and for his Brothers sake, but his Brother being gone, both sides forsook him, even his own side, as thinking they could expect little assistance from him, who gave no more assistance to his own Brother; and perhaps more than all this, the Earl of Warwick, at this time, was the most powerful man both in Courage and counsel amongst all the Nobility, and none so near to watch him as the Admiral, while he lived; but he being gone, there was none left that either was able and dure, or dure and was able to hand against him: however it was not long after the Admirals death, the Protector was invaded with sundry Accusations, wherein the Earl of Warwick made not always the greatest show, but yet had always the greatest hand; one thing the Protector had done, which though a private act, yet gave a publick dislike. To make him a Mantion house in the Strand (the same which is now called Somerset-huse;) he bakned down a Church and erected Housese by the Strand Bridge; in digging the foundation whereof, the bones of many who had been there buried, were cast out and carried into the fields; and because the Stones of those Housese and the Church sufficie not for his work, the Steeple, and most part of the Church of St. John of Jerusalem near Smithfield, was mined and overthrown with Powder, and the Stones applied to this expensif Building; and more than this, the Cloyster of Pauls on the North side of the Church, in a place called Pardun Church-yard, and the dance of Death very curiously wrought about the Cloyster, and a Chappell that stood in the midst of the Church-yard; also the Chandrel House, that stood on the South side of Pauls (now a Carpenters Yard) with the Chappell, Timber, and Monuments therein, were beaten down, the bones of the dead carried into Finsbury fields, and the Stones converted into this Building. This Act of the Protectors did something alienate the peoples minds from him; which the Earl of Warwick perceived, thought it now a fit time to be fall-'ling upon him; and thereupon drew eighteen of the Privy Council to join with him, who withdrawing them selves from the Court, held secret confidations together, and walked in the City with many Servants waoneoned, and in new Liberties; whereof when the Protector heard, he sent Secretary Peter to them, to know the causes of their Assembly, requiring them to refer to him peaceably, that they might commune together as Friends; but in the mean time, he armed five hundred men, and removed the King by night from Hampton-Court to Windsor: On the other side, the Lords at London, having first taken possession of the Tower, sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of the City, to the Earl of Warwick Lodging at Elly-house in Holborn; to whom the Lord Riche, then Lord Chancellor, made a long Oration, wherein he shewed the ill Government of the Lord Protector, and the many miscarries that by it were come upon the Kingdom, and thereupon requiring them to join with the Lords there assembled to remove him; and presently that day, a Proclamation was made in divers parts of the City to that purpose, to which the Lords and Counsellors that subscribed their names were chiefly: The Lord Riche, Chancellor, the Lord Saint-John Lord great Master, the Marques of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick Lord great Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundel Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Cheynel Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Con--table of the Tower, Sir Williams Peter Secretary, Sir Edward North Knight, Sir Edward Montague chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Edward Wotton, Sir Richard Southwell Knights: and Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury. In the afternoon of the same day, the Lord Mayor assembled a Common Council in the Guild-hall, where two Letters arriv'd almost in one instant, from the King and the Lord Protector, for a thousand men to be armed for defence of the Kings Person: another from the Lords at London, for two thousand men to aide them in defense of the Kings Person also, both pretending alike, and therefore hard hard to 1 oeple them both. The Recorder set forth the complaint of the Lords against the Protector, in such sort, that he made many inable to favour that side, but one named George Stafford, better advs'd, kept up, and in a long Speech shewed what miscarries had come to the City by opposing the King; and therefore gave his opinion, to suspend giving aide to the Lords, at least for a time. His advice was hearkened unto, after his death the Protector is accurs'd. and thereupon the Court resolved only to arm an hundred Horsemens, and four hundred Foot, in defence of the City: and to the Letters returned submissively, but dilatory Answers. After some other passages between the Protector and the Lords, Sir Edw. Whitchfield, Captain of the Guard, was sent from the Lords to Windsor; who so well persuaded the King of the Lords loyal affection towards him, and of their moderate intention towards the Protector, that the King was content to have him presently removed from him, and suffered him within two days after to be carried to the Tower; in whose absence, seven Lords of the Council, and four Knights, were appointed by turns to attend the Kings Person; and for Affairs of State, the Government of them was referred to the whole Body of the Council: soon after were sent to the Protector in the Tower, certain Lords of the Council, with Articles against him, requiring his present Answer, whether he would acknowledge them to be true, or else stand upon his justification. The chief Article was this, that he took upon him the Office of Protector, with express condition, that he should do nothing in the Kings Affairs, but by means of the late Kings Executors, or the greatest part of them; and that contrary to this condition, he had hindered Justice, and subsverted Laws, of his own Authority, as well by Letters, as by other Commands; and many other Articles, but all much to this purpose.

The Protector, whether thinking to speed better by submission than by compelling; or perhaps finding himself not altogether innocent (for in deed so great a place, who can bear himself with such incorne but he will commit errors with which he may be taxed?) subscribed an acknowledgment with his own hand, humbly submitting himself to the Kings mercy, and defining their Lordships favour towards him. Upon this submission, three months after he had been imprisoned, he was released, entertained, and feated by the King, and sworn again to be a Privy Councillor, but no more Protector: At which time, between him and the Lords, a sight at least of perfect peace was made; and to make it more firm, the Duke of York, who was afterwards married to the Lord Effingham, Son and Heir to the Earl of Warwick, at which marriage the King was present; and to honour their reconcilement and this Marriage; The Earl of Warwick was made Lord Admiral of England, Sir John Mansfield, and Sir Robert Corbet, were created Earl of Bedford, the Lord Saint-John was created Earl of Wiltshire, and soon after made Lord Treasurer, Sir William Page, Controller of the Kings House, was made Lord Page; Sir Anthony Woodfield, Captain of the Garter, was made Controller; and Sir Thomas Davies was made Captain of the Guard: But of the other side, the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Southampton, were put off from the Council; of whom the Earl of Southampton died shortly after at Lincoln Place in Holborn, and was buried in St. Andrews Church there.

About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, whereon one Act was made against speaking of Prophéties; another against unlawful Affembles: but for fear of new tumults, the Parliament was unanimously dissolved, and Gentlemen were commanded to retire to their Country Habitations; and for the same cause also, Trinty Term did not hold.

About this time also, Pope Paul the third died; after whose death the Cardinals being divided about the Election of a new Pope, the Imperial part, which was the greatest gave their Voices for Cardinal Pole; which being told him, he disowned himself, and wished them to choose one that might be more fit for the glory of God, and good of the Church: upon this topic, some that were no friends to Pole, and perhaps looked for the place themselves, if he were put off, laid many things to his charge; amongst other, that he was not without suspicion of Lutheranism, as having been so very conversant with Immanuel Tremellium, and Anthony Flaminii, great Lutherons; and not altogether without our blemish of inconstancy, there being a young Nun that was thought to be his Daughter. But of these Criminations Pole so cleared himself, that he was afterward more importuned to take the place than he was before: and thereupon one night the Cardinals came into him, being in bed, and sent him word they came to adore him (which is one special kind of electing the Pope;) but he being awaked out of his sleep, and acquainted with it, made answer, That this was not a work of darkness, and therefore required them to forbear till the next day, and then to do as God should put into their minds. But the Italian Cardinal, attributing this putting off to a kind of Stupidity and Lethargy in Pole, looked no more after him, but the next day chose Cardinal Montanus Pope, who was afterward named Julius the Third.

And now the King of France, upon many just Considerations, was grown delirious to have a Peace with England; and thereupon sent one Guidolet a Florentine into England, to make some overture of his desire to the Lords of the Council, who addressing himself to the Earl of Warwick, whom he knew to be most prevalent, so prevailed, that it was concluded four Embassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and four from the French King, to Treat with them. The Commissioners for the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget; Sir William Peter, and Sir John Melf, Secretaries of State. For the French, were Monseigneur Passyon, Monseigneur Chalume, Gaylart de Martier, and Richard de Dffre. Much time was spent to agree about a place of Meeting; till at last the English, to satisfy the French, were contented it should be before Bullaigne, where were many Meetings, and many differences about Conditions: but in conclusion, a Peace was concluded upon certain Articles, the chief whereof was, that Bullaigne and the places adjacent should be delivered up to the French within six Weeks after the Peace Proclaimed; and that the French should pay for the same two hundred thousand Crowns, within three days after delivery of the Towns; and other two hundred thousand Crowns upon the fifth day of April following; Hoftages were on both sides given for performance, and to those Articles the French King was sworn at Arment, and the King of England in London: The Lord Clinton, who had been Deputy of Bullogne, was made Lord Admiral of England.

Prefently after this Agreement, the Duke of Brunswick sent to the King of England, to offer his Service in the King's Wars, with Ten thousand Men, and to Intreat a Marriage with the Lady Mary, the King's eldest Sifter. To this offer the King Anwered was made, That the King's Wars were ended: And touching the Marriage with the Lady Mary, That the King was in Speech for her Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal; which if it succeeded not, he should then be favourably heard. Upon this, the Emperours Embassadours demanded of the King, That the Lady Mary might have free exercit of the Mafs; which the King not only constantly denied, but thereupon Sermons were exercised at the Court, and order taken, That no Man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should Preech before him: And shortly after, under pretence of preparing for Sea-matters, five thousand pounds were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas. At this time also an Embassadour came from Gustavus King of Sweden, to enter League with the King for Entercourse of Merchants; and for which charge was then also given, that the King of England should be admitted in Ireland.

About this time the Queen Dowager of Scotland, going from France to her Country, passed through England, having first obtained a Safe Conduc, she arrived at Portsmouth, and was there met by divers of the English Nobility: conducted to London, she was lodged in the Bishop's Palace: After four days staying, having been Feasted by the King at White-Hall, she departed, being waited on by the Sheriffs of Counties to the Borders of Scotland. And now was one Stewart a Scot apprehended in England, and imprisond in the Tower, for intending to poiyon the young Queen of Scots, whom the King delivered to the French King upon the frontiers of Collyer, to be by him justified at his pleasure.

At this time certain Ships were appointed by the Emperor, to Transport the Lady Mary either by violent or by stealth out of England; whereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Effex, where the Lady lay: and besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with two hundred Men, the Lord Privy Seal with other two hundred, and Master Steeleg with four hundred more, to several Coasts upon the Sea; and the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Peter were sent to the Lady Mary, who, after some Conference, brought her to the Lord Chancellor's House at Lyne in Effex, and from thence to the King at Welfminster. Here the Council declared unto her, how long the King had permitted her the use of the Mafs, and considering her obstinacy, was resolved now no longer to permit, unlefs she would put him in hope of some conformity in short time. To which she answered, That she could not change, so she would not trouble it. Reply was made, That the King intended not to constrain her Faith, but to restrain the outward prolelion of it; in regard of the danger the Example might draw. After some like entrance of speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King, when there arrived an Embassadour from the Emporur with a threatening Message of War, in case his Cousin the Lady Mary should be denied the free exercit of the Mafs: Hereupon the King prefently advised with the Archbishops of Canterbury, and with the Bishop of London and Rochester, who gave their Opinion, That to give Licence to sin, was sin; but to continue at sin, might be allowed, so it were not too long, nor without hope of Reformation: Then Answer was given to the Embassadour, That the King would fend to the Emporur within a month or two, and give him such satisfaction as should be fir.

And now the King being uncertain of the faith, both of his Subjects and of his Confe-derates, intended by alliance to strengthen himself; and thereupon sent one Barwick, to the King of Denmark with private Intructions, to Treat of a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth, the King's youngets Sifter, and the King of Denmark's eldest Son: but when it came to the point, this Lady could not be induced to entertain Marriage with any:

After this the Marquess of Northampton was sent Embassadour to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to Treat with him of other secret Affairs: With him were joyned in Commission the Bishop of Ely, Sir Philip Hobbe, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mion, and Master Smith Secretary of State: also the Earl of Woreser, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them; as likewise the Lords Ely, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergavenny, and Evers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of Note, to the number of Sixand twenty: And for avoiding of an inmoderate Train, Order was given, That every Earl should have but four Attendants, every Baron but three, every Knight and Gentleman but two, only the Commissioners were not limited to any number. Being come to the Court of France, they were fent with brought the King, being then in his Bed-Chamber: To whom the Marquess presented the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested. Then the Bishop of Ely in a short Speech, declared how the King of England, out of his love and desire of Amy, had fent this Order to his Mijlety; defiring withal, That some Persons might be authorized to Treat with them about some other matters of Importance; whereupon a Commission went forth to the Cardinal of Lorrain, the Constable, the Duke of Gujy, and others. At first, the English demanded, That the young Queen of Scots might be lent into England for perceiving of Marriage between King Edward and her. But to this the French answered, That the conclusion had been made long before for her Marriage with the Dauphin of France. Then the English proposed a Marriage between King Edward and the Lady Elizabeth the French King's eldest Daughter. To this the French said cheerfully incline; but when they came to talk...
The Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

...and with him Peers to the number of seven and twenty: The Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the Marquises of Northampton, the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntingdon, Rutland, Bath, Suff., Worester, Pembroke, and Hereford: The Barons, Abergavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evreux, Latimer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darby, Sherborne, Wynton, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray. The Lords being set, the Indictments were read, in number five, containing a Charge, for railing Men in the North parts of the Realm: And at his House, for affailing Men to kill the Duke of Northumberland: For refiling his Attachment, for railing London, for assailing the Lords, and deviling of their deaths. To all which he pleaded, Not guilty, and made a satisfaction. Answer to every Point, though the Kings Learned Council pressed them hard against him. The Lords set the Laws together, where Exception was taken by some, as a thing unfit, That the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquises of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke should be of the Jury; seeing the Prisoner was chiefly charged with practices against them: But to this the Lawyers made Answer, That a Peer of the Realm might not be challenged. So after much variation of Opinions, the Prisoner was accused of Treason, but by most Voices found guilty of Felony; and that by a Statute lately by his own procurement made, That if any should attempt to kill a Privie Counsellor, although the Fact were not done, yet it should be Felony, and be punished with death. But upon his being accused of Treason, the Axe of the Tower was presently laid down, which made people conceive he had been acquitted of all; who therefore for Joy gave to great Shout, that it was heard as far as Cheapside-Cros: But Edward was little the better for being acquitted of Treason, seeing he was found guilty of Felony; and had Judgment to die. It is thought by some, he might have saved his life, if he had demanded his Clergy: but it is rather thought, that in that Statute Clergy was denied. Two months after his Condemnation, (much against the Kings will) he was brought to the Tower-Hill to execution; where being ascended the Scaffold, he entered into a Speech, wherein though he justified himself, for any matter tending to the hurt of the King or Kingdom; yet he confessed, he was justly by the Law brought to his death; and thanked God that had given him so large a time of repentance, especially that he had opened his eyes, to see clearly the light of the Gospel: And going on in his Speech, a sudden noise arose, of some crying Amen, amen, which made many think the Tunstall had been come, but was indeed the voice of some that had been warned to be at the Execution, and were come somewhat late: But the Tunstall being apprehended, the Duke went on with his Speech, and at last commending his Soul to God, with a countenance not shewing any sign of fear, or perturbation, only his cheeks a little redder than they used to be, he peaceably laid down his head upon the Block, and in a moment, with one stroke of the Axe, had it plucked off. The
The Death of this Duke made the Duke of Northumberland more odious to the people than he was before; and there were some that dipped Handkerchiefs in his blood, and kept them to upbraid the Duke of Northumberland withal, when he came himself afterward to the like end. After execution of the Duke, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Patroux, were hanged at the Tower-Hill, Sir Michael Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Arundell were there beheaded.

After the Duke's condemnation, it was thought fit to have something done for avverting the King's mind from taking thought; and to that end, one George Ferrers, a Gentleman of Lincolns-Inn, was appointed, in the Christmas time, to be Lord of Misrule; who so carried himself, that he gave great delight to many, and come to the King, but not in proportion to his heveniefs.

About this time was a call of seven Serjeants at Law, who kept their feast at Gray's-Inn; of whom, Master Robert Brooke, Recorder of London, was the first; and the next Master Dyer, who was chosen Speaker the next Parliament.

About this time also, the Lord Paget was committed to the Tower, for what cause is not certain; and being a Knight of the Order, his Garret was taken from him by Garret King at Arms, upon that pretence, that he was sold to be no Gentleman, either by Father or Mother; and the Garret was then bellowed on the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumberland Eldeft Son; and the Lord Rich, Lord Chancellour, was put off from his place, and the Seal then delivered to Doctor Thomas Godriick Bishop of Ely.

About this time also three great Ships were set forth at the Kings charge, for discovery of a Passage to the East India by the North Seas; the chief Pilot and Director in this Voyage was one Sebastian Gabobs an Englishman, born at Brisdel, but a Son of a German: these Ships at the last arrived in the Countrey of Muscovia, but not without loss of their Captain Sir Hugh Willoughby, who being tossed and driven by tempest, was afterward found in his Ship frozen to death, and all his people.

At this time also the Duke of Suffolk, the Duke of Northumberland, and the Duke of Somerset, three Daughters, which he had by Frances, Daughter of Charles Braken, and Mary Queen of France, were married at Dunham Houfe: The eldest Jane, to the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth Son to the Duke of Northumberland; The second Katherine, to Henry, Son and Heir to the Earl of Pembroke: The youngest, Mary, being some what deformed, to Martyn Keynes, the Kings Gentleman Porter. And then also Katherine, the Duke of Northumberland's eldest Daughter, to the Lord Holfing, eldest Son of the Earl of Huntington, and now had the Duke of Northumberland gone a great way in his deceil; it remained to perfwade King Edward to exclude two of his Sifters from Succession in the Crown; for that done, his Daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane, would come to have a title: For as for pretenders out of Scotland, or any other, he made no great matter. And now to work the King to this perfwasion, (being in a languishing fickness, not far from death) he incollates to him, how much it concerned him to have a care of Religion, that it might be preferred in purity, not only in his own life, but as well after his death; which would not be, if his Sifter the Lady Mary should succeed, and she could not be put by, unless her other Sifter, the Lady Elizabeth, were put by also, seeing their rights depended one upon another; but if he pleased to appoint the Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolk's eldest Daughter, and his own next Kinswoman to his Sitters, to be his Successor, he might then be sure that the true Religion should be maintained, to Gods great glory, and be a worthy Act of his own religions Providence. This was to strike upon the right string of the young Kings affection, with whom nothing was so dear as prefervation of Religion; and thereupon his last Will was appointed to be drawne (contrived chiefly by the Lord Chief Justice Mountague, and Secretary Cecil) by which Will, as far as in him lay, he excluded his two Sifters from the Succession, and all other, but the Duke of Suffolk's Daughters; and then causit it to be read before his Council, he required them all to affent unto it, and to subscribe their hands; which they did, both Nobility, and Bishops, and Judges did: Only the Archbishop Cranmer refuted at first, Sir James Hales a Judge of the Common-Place to the last, and with them also Sir John Baker Chancellour of the Exchequer. And now remained nothing for the Duke of Northumberland's purpose, but that the King should die; which soon after he did at Greenwich, the sixt of July, in the year 1553. One point of the Duke's policy mutt not be forgotten, that fearing what troubles the Lady Mary might raise after the Kings decease, if she should beat liberty; he therefore, seeing the Kings drawing on, ufed all means possible to get her within his power; to which end Letters are directit to her in the Kings name from the Council, willing her forthwith to repair to the King, as well to be a comtoit to him in his sickness, as to see all matters well ordered about his Person: Whereupon, the Lady supping no thing, adhered her self with all speed to the Journey; till being upon the Way, she was advertisit of the Duke's design; and then she returned to her House at Howfden, and so escaped the flame: by whose escape, the whole Deight of the Duke of Northumberland was disappointed; as soon after will be seen.

Of his Taxations.

In no Kings Reign was ever more Parliaments for the time, nor fewer Subsidies; the greatest was in his last year, when yet there was but one Subsidy, with two Fifteens and Tenthis, granted by the Temporality, and a Subsidy by the Clergy. And indeed to shew how loath this King was to lay Impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument; That though he were much in debt, yet he chose rather to deal with the Foreign in the Low-Countries for money upon loan, at the interest of fourteen points for a hundred, for a year. But his ways for raising of money, were by selling
The Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

Peter Martyr was sent to read a divinity Lecture in Oxford; Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this King's fourth year, all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken down, and Tables placed in their rooms. In his fifth year, the Book of Common Prayer was established.

Casualties happening in his time.

In his second year, St. Anne's Church within Aldergate was burnt. In his fifth year, a Sweating Sickness inflicted first Shirley, and then the North parts, and afterwards grew most extream in London, so as the first Week there died eight hundred people, and was so violent, that it took men away in four and twenty hours, sometimes in twelve, and sometimes in six: Amongst other of Account that died of this Sickness, were the two Sons of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, who died within an hour after one another, in such order that both of them died Duke. This distaste was proper for the English Nation, for it followed the English wherever they were in Forain Parts, but feiz'd upon none of any other Country. In this year one Mr. Arden of Kent, by procurement of his Wife, was murdered in his own house; but being dead, his body was carried out and laid upon the ground, in a Clofe hard by, where this is Memorable. This for two years after, the ground where his body lay, bore no grafts, but represented still as it were a picture of his body, only in the space between his legs and arms there grew grafts; but where any part of his body touched, none at all. Yet this Marvellous Accident was not so much for the Murderer, as for the Curles of a Widow Woman, out of whose hands the said Matter Arden had uncharitably bought the said Clofe, to her undoing. And thus the Divine Justice, even in this World oftimes, works Miracles upon Offenders, for a merciful warning to men, if they would be so wise to take it. In the sixth year, the third of August at Midland floods, eleven miles from Oxford a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the navel upward, the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies joyned, and had but one issue for the Excrements of them both they lived eighteen days, and were Women Children. This Year also were taken at Quainton three Dolphins, and at Blackwall five more, the leaff of which was bigger than any Hore. Works of Piety done by him, or others in his Time.

His King gave three Houeses to the Relief of the Poor: First, for the Father's and Beggars Children, he gave the late Gray-Friers in London, which is now called Chrift's Hospital. Then for lame and defeased people, he gave the Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, and St. Bartholomew in Well-Smithfield. This for the riotous and idle people, he gave his House of Bredin; and for their Maintenance, he took six hundred pounds a year land from the Houfe of the Swep, (which had been long abated) and bellofed it upon these Houfes to which Selling of Chantry Lands and Houfes, given him by Parliament; and by inquiring after all Church Goods, either remaining in Cathedral and Parish Churches, or embazzeled away, as Jewes, Gold and Silver Chalices, ready mon-ey, Copes, and other Velliments; referring to every Church one Challice, and one covering for the Communion Table, the rest to be applied to his benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after offences of Officers in great places; in which enquiry one Beaumont Matter of the Rolls, being convinced of many Crimes, surrendered all his Offices, Lands, and Goods into the Kings hands: Also one Whaley, Receiver of Yorkeshire, being found a Deliquent, surrendered his Office, and paid a great Fine belides. Also the Lord Paget, Chancellour of the Dutchie, convinced that he had sold the Kings Lands and Timber-Woods without Commission, and had applied the Kings Fines to his own use for thefe and other offences, surrendered his Office, and was fined at four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in this time for raising of money; twenty thousand pounds weight of Bullion was appointed to be made so much bafer, that the King might gain thereby a hundred and forty thousand pounds.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

In his third year a Parliament was holden; wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies, and another, against unlawful Assemblies. In his fourth year a Parliament was holden, wherein Priests Children were made legitimate: and twelve for loan of money was forbidden. In his fifth year it was ordained, That the Laws of England should be admitted in Ireland; and a King at Arms named Duffer, was newly in frustrated, and Ireland whose Province was all Ireland; and he was the first fourth King of Arms, and first Herald appointed for Ireland. Also in his fifth year, bafe moneys formerly coined, were crie down; so as the shilling went but for nine pence, and shortly after but for six pence, the groat but for three pence, and shortly after but for two pence.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

In the first year of this Kings Reign, Injuri-ions were set forth, for pulling down and removing all Images out of Churches; also certaine Homilies were appointed to be made by Learned men, to be read in Churches, for the peoples instruction: And at Easter this year, it was ordered, That the Sacrament of the Lords Supper should be miniftered to the Lay-people in both kinds. Also Marriage was allowed to Clergy men; aicular Confirmation and Prayer for the dead were forbidden: And it is observable, That the very same day that Images were pulled down at London, the great overthrow was given to the Scots at Mucklebarough. Also at this time, by the Archbishop Cranmer's means, divers learned Protestants came over into Eng-land, and had here entertainment, a Peter Mar-tyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius; of whom which he added four thousand Marks a year more. By his Example, Sir William Chefeier Alderman of London, and John Chatterpe Draper, at their own Costs made the Brick-walls and way on the backside that leadeth to the Hospit. al of St. Bartholomeu, and also covered and vaulted the Town-Ditch, which before was very noyome. In the second year of this King, Sir John Greffham, then Mayor of London, founded a Free-School at Hoft in Norfolk: Alfo at his deceafe he gave to every Ward in London ten pounds, to be distributed amongst the Poor, and to Maids Marriages two hundred pounds. In his third year, Sir Rowland Hill, the then Lord Mayor of London, caufed to be made a Cawfeley commonly called Overlant Pavenient, in the High-way from Stone to Northolt, in length four miles, for the eafe of Horfe and Man. He caufed also a Cawfey to be made from Dun.

church to Brafton in Warwickshire, more than two miles in length; and gave twenty pounds towards the making of Rotton Bridge three miles from Coventry. He made likewise the highway to Kilburne near London. Alfo four Bridges, two of them of Stone, containing eig teen Arches in them both; the one over the River of Sworn, called Achem Bridge, the other Temple Bridge, and two other of Timber at Stoke, where he built alfo a good part of the Church. A Free School likewise he built at Drayton in Shropshire, with Matter and Usher, and gave ftuficient Stipends to them both. Alfo he purchased a free Fair to the foid Town, with a free Market weekly; and every fourteen daies a free Market for Cafile. Besides all this, he gave to the Hospital of Christ-Church in London in his life-time five hundred pounds, and at his death a hundred. In this Kings fourth year, Sir Andrew Jedd, Mayor of London, founded a noted Free School at Twmbridge in Kent; and gave thereforfe pounds land a year to the Skinner's of London, for which they be bound to pay twenty pounds to the School-Master, and eight pounds to the Usher of his Free School at Tum-bridge yearly for ever. In his fifth year, Sir George Bornes, who was Mayor of London, gave a Wind-Mill in Finsbury Field to the Herbadifters of London, the profits thereof to be dif-tributed to the poor of that Company; alfo to St. Bartholomew the Little certain Tenements to the like ufe.

Of his Perfonage and Conditions.

Concerning his Perfonage, it is faid, he was in Body beautiful, of a sweet appe th, and specially in his eyes, which feemed to have a harf ly liveliness and luftre in them. Concerning his Clothes, in manner of Fafhion, there is not much to be faid; but in manner of Difpofition and Inclination very much, even to admiration. For though his Tree was not yet come to the maturity of bearing Fruit, yet it was comor the forerunners to bear plenty of Buds and Blossoms: For proof of his Merciful Difpofi tion, this one example may be fufficient: When one John Butcher was to be burned for Blafph emy and Heretick, all the Council could not get him to sign the Warrant, till the Archbifhopp came, with much importance, periward him, and then he did it, but not without weep ing. For his pregnancy of Wit, and knowledge in all kinds of Learning, we shall need but to hear what Cardan (who coming into England, had often Conference with him) reporteth of him, That he was extraordinarily skillful in Languages, and in the Politicks; well fenn in Philofophy, and in Divinity, and generally in deed a very Miracle of Art & Nature. He would answer Embaffadours sometimes upon the sudden, either in French or Latine: He knew the flace of Foreign Princes perfectly, and his own more: He could call all Gentlemen of accounts through his Kingdom by their names. And all this when he had fcarce yet attained to the age of fifteen years, and died before sixteen; that from hence we may gather, It is a fign of no long life, when the Faculties of the Mind are ripe fo early.

Of his Death and Burial.

In the Sixth Year of his Reign, which was the year before he died, he fell sick of the Meafels, and being well recovered of them, he fell fon after into the small Pox, and of them alfo was fo well recovered, that the Summer following he rode a Progres, with a greater Magnificence than ever he had done before; having in his Train no fewer than four thousand Horfe. In January following (whether procu red by finifter practice, or growing upon him by natural infirmity) he fell into an indispofo tion of body, which soon after grew to a Cough of the Lungs. Whereupon a rumour was spread abroad by some, That a Nofegay had been gi ven him at New-Years-tide, which brought him into his flow, but deadly Confumption:

By others, That it was done by a Clyfter. However it was, he was brought at laft to great extremity; that his Physicians difpaired of his life; and when Physicians could do him no good, a Gentleman (thought to be prepared for the purpofe) took him in hand, and did him hurt: For with her applications his Legs fcarcely, his Pulfe failed, his Skin changed colour, and many other Symptoms of approaching death appeared. The hour before his death, he was over-heard to pray thus himfelf, O Lord, God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life: O Lord, then know how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy Chofens fakes, if it be thy will, fend me life and health, that I may ftay here: O Lord God, fave thy chofen people of England, and defend this Realm from Papiftry, and maintain thy true Religion; that I and my People may praise thy holy Name, for thy Son Jefus Chrifts fake. So turning his face, and feeing hone by him, he faid, I though you had never been fo nigh: Yet, faid Doctor Owen, we heard you speak to your felf. Then faid the King, I was praying to God: O I am fain, Lord, have mercy upon me, and receive my spirit; and in fo faying, gave up the Ghoft, the fithday of July, in the year 1553, and the Sixteenth year of his age, when he had Reigned fix years, five monfths, and nine daies. It is noted by fome, that he died the fame month, and the fame day of the month, that his Father King Henry the Eighsb had put Sir F.
Thomas More to death. His Body was buried upon the ninth of August, in the Chappel of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, and laid near to the Body of King Henry the Seventh his Grandfather. At his Funeral, which was on the tenth of August following, his Sister Queen Mary shewed this respect to him, that tho' Doctor Day, a Popish Bishop, Preach-ched, yet all the Service with a Communion was in English.

The Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

Men of Note in his Time.

His Kings Reign being short, and having but small Wars, had not many Sword-men famous for any Aet they did; Gownmen there were some, as Edward Hatley & Counsellour in the Law, who wrote a notable Chronicle of the Union of the Two Houses of York and Lancaster; William Hugh, a Yorks-hire man, who wrote a notable Tretitcle, called, The Troubled Man's Medicine; Thomas Sterndald, born in Southampton, who turned into English Meeter seven and thirty of David's Psalms.

The Interregnum between the Death of King Edward, and the Proclaiming at London of Queen Mary.

King Edward being dead, the Duke of Northumberland took upon him to fit at the Sern, and ordered all things at his pleasure: so two days after, he, with others of the Council, sent to the Lord Mayor, that he, with six Aldermen, and twelve principal Commons, should repair presently to the Court; to whom when they came, it was signified that King Edward was dead; and that by his last Will, to which all the Nobility and Judges had given attenth, he had appointed the Lady Jane, Daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him; his Letters Patents whereof were shewed them, and thereupon they were requited to take their Oaths of Allegiance to the Lady Jane, and to secure the City in her behalf; which whether delightful or in-cerely, whether for love, or fear, yet they did, and departed. The next day, the Lady Jane in great State was brought to the Tower of London, and there declared Queen; and by Edict, with the sound of Trumpets proclaimed so through London: at which time, for some words seeming to be spoken against it, one Gilbert Pot, a Vintners servant, was set in the Pullorey, and left both his Ears. Before this time, the Lady Mary having heard of her Brothers death, and of the Duke of Northumberlands design, removed from Hereford to her Manour of Keninghulm in Norfolk, and under pretence of fearing infection, (having lately lost one of her Household-Servants of the Plague) in one day the rode forty miles, and from thence afterward to her Castle of Framingham in Suffolk; where taking upon her the name of Queen, there resolved to her the most part of all the Gen-tlemens both of Norfolk and Suffolk; offering their Affiliation; but upon condition, she would make no alteration in Religion, to which the condefcended; and thereupon, one morning, her the Earls of Oxford, Bath, and Suffolk, the Lord Hunsford, Thomas Wratton, and John Marland, Barons eldest Sons; and of Knights, Chamberlins, Drury, Wolvyny, Shetan, Beningfield, Jerryngam, Sattard, Frisam, and many others. The Lady Mary being thus affirearly you: And I (said the Duke) obey your Atrel; yet I beleech your Lordship to use mercy towards him whole acts have been no other than were enjoyned by Commission. You should have thought of that sooner (said the Earl;) and thereupon committed him to a Guard, and left him to the Queens mercy. Thus ended all this great Duke's designs in his own destruction, and brought him to fall on his knees to them, who had often before bowed their knees to him; and the Earl, who at the Dukes going out could have been contented to spend his blood at his feet, was now contented to be made an instrument of his fall: So sudden are the turns of mens affections, and so unstable is the building upon their affections; at least no man must look to have his case be of any weight against him, who hath his own cafe put in the Balance. Together with the Duke his three Sons, John, Andrew, and Henry, the Earl of Huntingdon, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, John and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sands were conveyed towards London, and brought to the Tower; and the next day the Marques of Northumberland, the Lord Robert Dudley, and Sir Robert Care. Before which time, the Duke of Suffolk, enquiring his Daughters, the Lady Jane's Chamber, told her, She must now put off her Royal Robes, and be contented with a private life. To which she answered, She would much more willingly put them off, than she had put them on; and would never have done it, but in obedience to him and her Mo- ther. And this was the end of the Lady Janes Ten days Reign.

QUEEN MARY,

1553.

The Lady Mary having been Proclaimed Queen in London, and other parts of the Realm; removed from her Cattle of Framlingham towards London; and being come to Westminster in Effect, on the thirtieth of July, the Lady Elizabeth her Sitter, with a Train of a Thousand Horfs, rode from her Place in the Strand to meet her. On the third of August the Queen rode through London to the Tower, where at her Entrance were prefented to her Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Edward Lord Courcy, Stephen Gardiner, late Bishop of Winchester, and the Dukes of Somerset; who all kneeling down, they kissed them, and said, Thine is my Prifoner, and then caufed them prefently to be fet at Liberty. The next day the Queen, on the Lord Courcy to the Marquifte of Exeter; and the fame day also the not only refored Stephen Gardiner to his Bifhoprick of Winchester, but a few days after made him Chancellor of England: Yet this was the Man that had prefcribed to her Mothers Divorce, and had written Books against the lawfulness of her Marriage. The fifth of August, Edmund Bonar, late Bifhop of London, Prifoner in the Marshalls, an Altar to God, the old Bifhop of Durham, Prifoner in the Kings-Church, had their Par- dons, and were restored to their Sees. Shortly, after, all the Bifhops, which had been depriving in the time of King Edward the Sixth, were restored to their Bifhopricks, and the new removed, as Ridley was removed from London, and Bonar placed; Skory from Chichefeher, and Day placed; Miles Coverdale from Exeter, and West placed; John Horfe from Worfeher, and Heath placed. All the Bifhops men that were married, or would not renounce their Religion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms.

On the thirteenth of August, one Mafter Bourne a Canon of Pauls, Preaching at Pauls Crofs, not only prayed for the dead, but also declared, that Doctor Bonar Bifhop of London, late restored, and there in preience) for a Sermon by him made four years before, in the fame place, and upon the fame Text, had unjustly been call into the vile Prifon of the Marshalls; which Speech fo offended fome of the Auditor, that they cried, Pull him down, Pull him down; and had certainly done him violence, (for a Dagger was throw at him,) if Mafter Bradford, a Proteftant Preacher, had not step into his place and appeafed the Tur- mult, and Mafter Rogers another Proteftant Miniftre, (who were both afterward burnt for Re- ligion,) had not refifted away Bourne into Pauls School.

Hitherto Queen Maryes Reign had been without blood, but now the Catarrhus of feve- rity will be opened, that will make it rain blood: for now on the eighteenth of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marquifte of Northampton, and John Earl of Warwicke, Son and Heir to the Duke, were arraigned at Westminster-Hall before Thomas Duke of Norfolk as High-Steward of England; where the Duke of Northumberland, after his Indictment read, required the Opinion of the Court in two Points; First, Whether a man doing any Act by authority of the Prince Court, or by warrant of the Great Seal of England, might for any fuch Act be charged with Treafon? Secondly, Whether any fuch per- fons as were equally culpable, and by whole Commandments he was directed, might be his Judges, and pass upon his Trial? Whereunto was anfwere, That concerning the fift, the Great Seal, which he alledged for his Warr- rant, was not the Seal of the Lawful Queen of the Realm, but of an Ufurer, and therefore could be no warrant for him. And as to the fe- cond, It was refolved, That if any were as deeply to be touchd in the Cafe as himfelf, yet fo long as no attainer were of record againft them, they were perpons able in Law to pass upon his Trial, and not to be challenged but at the Prince's pleafure. After which Anfwers, the Duke used few words, but confelfed the Indictments, and accordingly had Judg- ment to die. By whom example, the other Prifoners arraigned with him, confelled the Indictments, and thereupon had Judgment. The nineteenth of August, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John, and Sir Henry Gotes, Brethren, and Sir Thomas Palmer, Knights, were Arraigned at Westminster, who confessing their Indict- ments, had Judgment, which was pronounced by the Marques of Winchefer, Lord High Treafurer, fitting that day as Chief Juftice. After thefe Condemnations followed the Execu- tions; for on the two and twentieth of Au- gust, John Duke of Northumberland was brought to the Tower-Hill, and there beheaded: being condufted upon the Scaffold in a Gown of green col- our, damask, he put it off, and then made a long Speech, wherein he asked the Queen forgive-
The Reign of Queen Mary.

The Queen's life was marked by events of great political and religious significance. After her coronation, she faced numerous challenges, including the rebellion of the Northern Flower, the persecution of Protestants, and the attempts of Elizabeth to claim the throne. Her marriage to Philip II of Spain was a significant event, and the marriage of the English nobility to Spanish princesses led to the establishment of the Tudor dynasty in Spain.

The reign of Queen Mary was also marked by a series of religious reforms, including the introduction of Catholicism and the suppression of Protestantism. The queen's policies were directed towards the restoration of Catholicism in England, and she was determined to assert her authority over the Church of England.

Mary's reign was marked by her strong commitment to the Catholic faith and her efforts to bring England back under the aegis of the papal see. Her policies and actions led to the execution of many Protestant nobles and the restoration of bishops and archbishops to their sees. The queen's reign was a time of great change and conflict, and it set the stage for the subsequent reign of Elizabeth I, who would ultimately succeed her on the throne.
matches pronounced for Queen Mary.

The match is concluded with Philip Prince of Spain.

With greater advantages to her than to him.

Yet is opposed by divers especially the Duke of Kent, who having communicated the matter with the Duke of Suffolk, the lady Janes Father, with Peter Care, a Knight of Devonshire, and divers others, intended only to make secret provision, but not to stir till Prince Philip should be come, that to their cause of taking Arms might have the better colour. On the fourteenth of January, Robert Dudley, Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guild-Hall of high treason, who confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment given by the Earl of Suffolk, to be drawn, hanged, bowelled and quartered.

But now in Councels communicated to many, it is a hard matter to have counsel kept, and Sir Peter Care finding that their Plot was discovered fled privately into France, where lurking for a while, he was afterward taken at Bruxelles, and brought Captive into England, as likewise at the same time and place Sir John Cheek King Edward's School-Master was taken, who being drawn by tortours to embrace the Papal Religion, with very grief afterward of his error pined away and died; Sir Peter Care lived many years after, and died in Ireland; though it be falsely recorded, they were both burnt for Religion, in June this year Wyat hearing of Sir Peter Care's flight, and that all their purpose was discovered, was driven before his time to enter into Arms, giving out for the Caufe, that it was not to attempt any thing against the Queen, but only to remove ill Councillors, and chiefly to repel Prince Philip, lest by his Marriage the Kingdom should come in subje4tion to the Spaniard. With Wyat were joined Sir Henry Jefey, Sir George Harper, Anthony and William Knew, and divers other Gentlemen, who against him were the Lords Argievency, Sir Thomas Cheney, Lord Warden of the Ports, Sir Robert Sontwell Sheriff of Kent, Sir Warram Sontiger, Sir Thomas Kemp, Sir Thomas Myle, Sir Thomas Finch, with divers others; yet all those great men had such doubts of the people, that they durst not proceed but very warily. The five and twentieth of January, news came to London of Wyat rising; against whom was presently sent the Duke of Norfolk with Sir Henry jermingham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fegges, John Cert, Roger Appleton Esquires, and five hundred Souldiers out of London appointed to go after him, under the leading of Captain Bretts. And now set in times of Sedition, how uncertain a thing it is to truitt to the people; for before Brets could overtake the Duke, Sir George Harper was secretly got to London; so persuaded him that he and his five hundred Souldiers left the Duke, and went all to Wyat; which made the Duke and those with him presently to fly, and put such boldness into Wyat, that now he marched with great force with confidence towards London, with so great terror to all forts of people, that at Westminster, Halt the Serjeants and other Lawyers pleading in harness.

In the mean time, the Duke of Suffolk was perceived in Warrick, to be against the Duke of Norfolk, in a field of fifty men, who being in affiance of Wyat; against whom was presently sent the Earl of Huntingdon, and the Duke finding himself unable to make resistance, flance, having with all his industry gotten together but of fifty men; he betook himself to a Tenant of his, one Underwood, with whom he hoped, and had promises, to remain undiscovered; still he might have opportunity to escape, as some say: as others, to a Keeper of his Park, called Nicholas Lawrence, who kept him in a hollow Oak in the said Park for two or three days: but whether Underwood or Lawrence, either out of fear, or out of hope of reward, he betrayed him to the Earl, by whom he was taken, and under a strong Guard carried to the Tower. Upon this, Queen Mary her self came into London, where calling the Mayor and chief of the City together, she made an Oration, wherein she shewed the infidelity of Wyatt, who though he pretended but only the crofting of the Marriage, yet was now grown to such prejumptuon, that he required to have the Council of her Person; and to have Councillors retained or removed at his plati-fore. And as for her husband, she there affirmed, and so it was, that she was no longer of a mind to marry, but by the advice of her Council; and for her self, that that she was not so longing for a Husband, but that if it were not more for the good of the Kingdom, than for her own Satisfaction, she would never once think of entertaining it.

Having by her Speech confirmed the Minds of the Citizens; Forces were prcfently raised, and placed about the Bridge, and other fit places of the City. The third of February, Wyatt with an Army of Three or four thousand came to London, hoping of present entrance, but finding the Bridge broken, and Souldiers platted to ret., him, after two days stay in South-mark, he removed to King'ston, where he found Likewise the Bridge broken, yet with great industry suddenly repairing it, he paffed over his Men, and meant with all speed to get to the Court, before the Queen should have notice of his coming, and Marriage made, and adea of Waste, and an error upon that mistake had not hindered him. For being come within six miles of London, the Carriage of one of his Great Ordinance brake, in bending whereof too much time was spent (and Wyatt by no perfusions would go forward without it) that the time was past, in which his Friends at London expected his coming: which disappointment made many in those parts to fall off, and being perceived by those about him, many of them also; so one half of his Army was suddenly gone and left him; among other, Sir George Harp; the most intimate of all his COUNcil, went to the Queen and discovered all his purposes: whereupon the Earl of Pembroke, with a Company levied upon the sudden, was sent against him, which made W; quickly break his pace, sow it was Noon before he came to the Suburbs of the City, and then placing his Ordinance upon a Hill, and leaving there the greatest part of his Army, he only with five Ensigns marched towards Ludge, and being encountered at Charing-Crofts by the Lord Chamberlain and Sir John Gage, after a small fight put them to flight in such form, that word was carried to the Queen, how near Wyatt approached, and how wonderfully he prevented all the way he came: with which nothing dismayed, Well then (foe the ) I will go in person against him my self; and was preparing to do so indeed (to much was her Father's Valour running in her veins) but it needed not; for by this time Sir Henry Jermyngham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Miller of the Ordinance, and Sir Philip Parry had given him Battell, and thin ny of his men: and that which was more, coming to Ludge, he was denied entrance; and then thinking to retire, he heard the Earl of Penrwey with his Forces was behind at Chari-ing Crofts; so as neither able to go forward nor yet backward, he was at a stand and in amazement, and then leaving a while upon Stall by the Bell-Savage, after a little mulling he returned towards Temple-Gate: where Cle-rentow the Herald meeting him, fell to per-swade him, not to be a cause of more effusion of blood, nor by perfiling in obstinacy to exclude all hopes of the Queen's mercy. The Soldiers of Wyatt were earnest with him to have it fought out; but Wyatt shewed all his endings, as he had unsavedly begun, and added him to Sir Maurice Berkeley, and getting up upon his horse behind him, in that manner rode to the Court, where he had not the entertainment he expected, for without more ado he was presently sent away to the Tower. The Captain taken, the reit made no resistance, few fled, and of the other many were taken and laid in Prison; and this was done the sixth of February. And now conflstion was held what Delinquents should be punished; where the first that was thought on was the Lady Jane, in whom was verified, The Fathers have eaten fower Grapes, and the Children's teeth are fet on edge: The innocent Lady must suffer for her Fathers fault; for her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not this second time made shipwreck of his Loyalty, his Daughter perhaps had never talked the faith-waters of the Queens displeasure: but now as a Rock of offence, she is the first that must be removed and therupon is Doctor Ffrekean.sent for to acquaint her, That she must prepare her self to take the next day: Which Mayige was so trying unpleasing to her, that she seemed rather to re-joy she at it, as whereby she should at last be free at liberty: And the Doctor being earnest with her to leave her new Religion, and to embrace the old: she answered, She had now time to think of any thing but of preparing her self to God by Prayer. Ffrekean thinking she had spoken this, to the end she might have some longer time of life, obtained of the Queen three days longer, and then came and told so much to the Lady Jane: Whereat the smiling said, You are much deceived, if you think I had any desire of longer life: for I affure you, since the time you went from me, my life hath been so tedious to me, that I long for nothing so much as death; and since it is the Queens pleasure, I am most willing to undergo it. Be-tore she was brought to Execution, her Hufband, the Lord Guilford, had made faint and obtained to see her, and have some conference with her; but she refused it, saying, These were rather augments of grief, than comforts of death; she made no doubt, but they should shortly meet in a better place, and in a better condition of society: So on the twelfth of February

The Reign of Queen Mary.

February her Husband the Lord Guilford first, and then she, an hour or two after, was beheaded within the Tower; where she acknowledged her fault to have deferr'd death, not for fearing the Crown, but for not relating it, being offered: and after Prayers to God, unclombing her fell, and putting a Handkerchief before her eyes, she laid her head down upon the Block, and patiently suffered death, more grievous to the beholders than to her self. This End had the Lady Jane Gray, a Lady of incomparable Piety, and (for her years) of incomparable Learning; for being not past seventeen years of age, she understood perfectly the Greek and Latin Tongues, and was so ready in Points of Divinity, as it she knew them by inspiration rather than by instruction; no less a Miracle in this kind than King Edward; and therefore no marvel if he appointed her to succeed him in the Kingdom, in the endowments of Man was so like unto him, that whilst she reigned, it might be thought he continued to reign himself, at least no more differing but only the Sex. It may not be for her justice, but for her's sake, that in her Arraignment gave the sentence against her, shortly after fell mad, and in her raving, cried continually to have the Lady Jane taken away from him, and to end his life.

Two days after the Execution of the Lady Jane, namely, the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, twenty pair of Gallows were set up in divers places of the City, wherein were hanged fifty of Wyat's Faction; on the eighteenth of February Brett was hanged at Rochefort in Chains, Sir Henry lye, who had been taken in an old free Coat and an old pair of Hose, with his Brother Thomas lye, and Walter Mantell were hanged at Maidstone, Anthony Knevet, and his Brother William, with another of the Mantells, were executed at Sevenoak; but then on the twentieth of February, a sprinkling of mercy came, for four hundred of Wyat's followers, being brought before the Queen with halter about their necks, were pardoned, and let to liberty. But then severity soon began again, and on the three and twentieth of February, the Lord Henry Gray, Duke of Suffolk, and Father to the Lady Jane, who the week before had been arraigned and condemned, was on the Tower-Hill beheaded; and on the eleventh of April in the same place was beheaded (the Author of all this mischief) Wyat himself, whose quarters were fet up in divers places of the City, his head upon the Gallows at Hay hill, besides Hide-Park. This man, in hope of life, having before accused the Lord Courtney, and the Lady Elizabeth, the Queens Sitter, to be privy to his Conspiracy, yet at his death he clearest them, and proceeded openly, that they were altogether innocent, and never had been acquainted with his proceedings. Yet was this matter forg'd against them by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor, that both of them in March before had been committed to the Tower, though in May following they were both again released; but yet confined, the Lady Elizabeth to Woodstock, under the custody of Sir Henry Bedingfield of Oxenburgh in the County of Norfolk; the Lord Courtney to Fotheringham, under the custody of Sir Thomas Treviham, who after some time was sent to liberty, and going into Italy there died. It is memorable, what malice this Bishop Gardiner bore to the Lady Elizabeth, by whose only procurement, not only she was kept in mortal hardness, but a Warrant was at last framed under certain Councilours hands, to put her to death; and had been done, but that Mr. Bridge Lieutenant of the Tower, pitying her cafe, went to the Queen to know her pleasure, who utterly denied that she knew any thing of it; by which means her life was preferred. Indeed the Bishop would sometimes say, how they cut off boughs and branches, but as long as they let the root remain, all was nothing: and it is not unworthy the remembering what trains were laid to ensnare her. The common Net at that time for catching of Protestant, was the Real Preence, and this Net was used to catch her, for being asked one time, What she thought of the words of Christ, This is my Body: whether she thought it the true Body of Christ that was in the Sacrament? It is said, that after some pafsinge, the thus answered:

Christ was the Word that spake it: He took the Bread, and brake it: And what the Word did make it, That I believe, and take it.

Which though it may seem but a slight expression, yet hath it more solidness than aseft light appears; at least it serv'd her turn at that time to escape the net, which by direct answer she could not have done. On the fourteenth of February, Thomas Lord Gray the Duke of Suffolk Brothers was beheaded, the lad, and indeed the least in De- linquency, that suffer'd for having any hand in Wyat's Conspiracy. There remained yet a fagge end, and was indeed but a fagge end, as nothing worth; for on the same day Sir Nicolai Throgmorton was being accused to have been a party to Wyat's Conspiracy, was at the Guildhall arraigned before Sir Thomas White, Lord Mayor, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Derby, Sir Thomas Bromley Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir Nicholas Hare Master of the Rolls, Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, Sir Richard Southwell and Sir Edward Walgrave Privy Councilours, Sir Roger Chamerly, Sir William Portman one of the Justices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward Sanders, one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, Mr. Stamford and Mr. Dyer Serjeants at Law, Mr. Edwad Gryffin Attorney General, Mr. Sandall and Peter Tichborne Clerks of the Crown, where the said Sir Nicholas Throgmorton so fully and dillerently answered all Objections brought against him, that he was found by the Jury, Not guilty; and was clearly acquitted: But the Jury notwithstanding was afterward troubled for acquitting him, and sent Prisoners, some of them to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and afterward fined to pay a thousand Marks apiece at least, and some two thousand pounds, though these Sums were afterward something mitigated.

More
More of Wyatt’s Complices had been taken, arraigned, and adjudged to die, but in Judgment the Queen remembered Mercy, and gave them their Pardons, of which Number were Walter Ruston of Kent, Sir James Crofts, the Lord John Gray, Brother to the Duke of Suffolk, and some others.

About this time, a little before and after, were advancements in honour, the Lord William Howard, Lord Admiral of England, was created Baron Howard of Effingham, Sir John Williams was created Baron of Trolly, Sir Edward Chartleig, Sir John Bridg was created Baron Chawdor of Sudley, Gerard Fitz Garett Earl of Kildare and Baron of Ophelby, and not long after Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, was created Viscount Madingley.

It is scarce worth remembering, That in the end of this first year of the Queen’s Reign, one Elizabeth Crofts, a Wench of eighteen years old, was by practice put into a Waif, and thereupon called, The Spirit in the Waif, who with a Whistle made for the purpose, whistled out many feticious words against the Queen, the Prince of Spain, the Mafi, Confession, and such other points, for which the said Penitence, standing upon a Scalfot at Paul’s Cross all the Sermon time, where she made open confession of her fault.

There had been great flour of Lay-men blood fired already, and now the time is coming to have Clergy-men fired; and for a preparative to it, on the tenth of April, Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley late Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer late Bishop of Worcester, are conveyed from the Tower to Oxford, there to dispute with Oxford and Cambridge men in Points of Religion, but especially of the Eucharist; the Oxford men were Cofe, Chadly, Pye, Harfield, Smith, and Doctor Wofin Proctor: the Cambridge men, Young, Steaton, Watson, Ackinsh, Feekman, and Sedgewick: The Disputation ended, which (we may well think as the matter was carried) went against the Prisoners, on the twentieth of April they were brought again on the Stage; and then demanded, Whether they would perfit in their Opinion, or else recant? And affirming they would perfit, they were all three adjutted Hereticks, and condemned to the Fire; but their Execution we must not look for till a year or two hence; but in the meantime we have John Rogers the first Martyr of these Times, burnt at London the fourth of February; after whom the ninth of February, John Hooper, late Bishop of Worcester, burnt at Gloucester; after him, Robert Ferrar Bishop of Man, burnt at Carmarthen; after him John Bradford, with many others; & then the two famous men Ridley and Latimer, no less famous for their constant deaths than their Religous lives, both burnt at Oxford the sixteenth of October.

This Rising of Wyatt had been a Remon to the Queen’s Marriage, and now to avoid all such ob-(flites hereafter, the Queen in April called a Parliament; wherein were propos’d two things; one for Confirmation of the Marriage; the other for restoration of the Popes Primacy. This latter was not attented to but with great difficulty; for the six years Reign of King Edward had spread a plantation of the Protestant Religion in the hearts of many; but the Propostion for the Marriage was attented to readily, but yet with the adding of some conditions, which had not been thought of in the former Articles. That King Philip should admit of no Stranger in any Office, but only Natives. 2. That he should innovate nothing in the Laws and Cu-mons of the Kingdom. 3. That he should not car y the Queen out of the Realm, without her con-ent, nor any of her Children without consent of the Council. After surviving the Queen, he should challenge no right in the Kingdom, but suffer it to descend to the next Heir. 5. That he should carry none of the Jewels of the Realm out of the Kingdom, nor suffer any Ships or Ornanceto be removed out of the Realm. And lat-ly, That neither directly nor indirecly, he should cause the Realm of England to be imgled with the War between Spain and France.

All things being thus agreed on, the Earl of Bedford Lord Privy Seal, the Lord Fitz-water, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, are sent into Spain to fetch over Prince Philip, who arived at Southampton the twentieth of July, in the year 1554. and the three and twentieth came to Winchister, where the Queen met him, and the five and twentieth, the Marriage between them there was openly solemnized: (the difparsity of years, as in Princes, not much regarded, though he were then but seven and twenty years of age, the eight and thirty) at which time the Emperour Embassadours being preffent, openly declared, That in consideration of that Marriage, the Emperour had given to Prince Philip his Son, the Kingdoms of Naples and Hierfsalem; and thereupon (the solemnity of Marriage being ended,) Garter King of Heralds openly in the Church, in the presence of the King, the Queen, and the Lords both of England and Spain, solemnly proclaimed the Title and Style of these two Princes, as folgoweth: Philip and Mary by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Hierfsalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain, and Sicily, Arch-Dukes of Austria, Dukes of Milford, Burgan-dy, and Brabant, Counts of Holland, Flanders, and Tyrol. After this, the King and Queen by earlie Journeys came to Windsor Castle, where the King was install’d Knight of the Garter, and the Earl of Suffolke with him: The eleventh of Auguft they removed to Richmond, the seven and twentieth to Suffolk Place in Southwark, and the next day to London (where the late Shews that were made, may well enough be conceived without relating) from hence after four days they removed again to Richmond, where all the Lords had left to depart into their Countries, and indeed so many departed, that there remained not an English Lord at the Court but the Bishop of Winchister: From Richmond they removed to Hampton Court, where the Hall door within the Court was continually kept shut, so as no man might enter unless his errand were first known, which might perhaps be the fashion of Spain, but to Englishmen seemd very strange.

About this time Cardinal Pole, sent for by the
The Reign of Queen Mary.

The King and Queen came over into England; and had come sooner, but that the Empour, fearing he might prove a Corrival with his Son Philip, had used means to stop his passage; but now that his Son's Marriage was past, he was content to let him pass; as though he did from Rome with the great authority of a Legate a Latere, yet he would not but come privately into London, because his Attaindour was yet upon Record; an Act therefore was presently passed to take it off, and to restore him in blood; for passing of which Act, the King and Queen in Person came to the Parliament House; whither a few days after, the Cardinal came himself, which was then kept in the great Chamber of White Hall, because the Queen, by reason of sickness, was not well able to go abroad: and here the King and Queen, on a sudden, took the Cloth of Elistare, and the Cardinal on their right hand, all the Lords, Knights and Burgesses being present, the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, made a short Speech unto them, signifying the presence of the Lord Cardinal; and that he was sent from the Pope as his Legate a Latere, to do a Work tending to the glory of God, and the benefit of them all; which (faith he) you may the better hear from his own mouth. Then the Cardinal roke up, and made a long solemn Oration, wherein he first thanked them for his restoring, by which he was enabled to be a Member of their Society: Then exhibiting them to return into the bosome of the Church, for which end he was come; not to condemn, but to reconcile; not to compell, but to call and require: and for their first work of Reconciliation, requiring them to repeal and abrogate all such Laws as had formerly been and are derogation against the Catholic Religion. After which Speech, the Parliament, going together, drew up a Supplication, which within two days after they presented to the King and Queen; wherein they shewed themselves to be very penitent for their former Errors, and humbly desired their Majesties to intercede for them to the Lord Cardinal and the See Apostolick, that they might be Pardon of all they had done amiss, and be received into the bosome of the Church, being themselves most ready to abrogate all Laws prejudicial to the See of Rome. This Supplication being delivered to the Cardinal, he then gave them Absolution in these words; [We, by the Apostolick Authority given unto Us, by the most Holy Lord Pope Julius the Third (Chrisii Vercgerent on Earth) do absolve and deliver you, and every one of you, with the whole Realm and Dominions thereof, from all Here- see and Schism, and from all Condemnations, Con- fusions, and pains for that cause incurrend: And also We do restore you again to the Unity of our Mother the Holy Church. ] The report hereof coming to Rome, was caule that a solemn Proclamation was made for Joy of the Conversion of England to the Church of Rome. And now the Queen had a great desire to have King Philip Crowned, but to this the Parliament would by no means assent.

In October this second year of her Reign a rumour was spread of the Queens being with child, and so forward, that she was quiedy and thereupon were Letters sent from the Lords of the Council to Bishop Bishop of London, that Prayers of Thanksgiving should be made in all Churches; and the Parliament it fell to be ced- dulous of, that they entered into consideration of the Education of the Child; and made an Act, desireing the King (out of the confidence they had in him) that if the Queen should fail, he would be pleased to take upon him the Rule and Government of the Child: But after all this, in June following, it came to be known, that it was but a Tympany, or at least the Queen so miscarried, that there was no Child, nor the Queen likely ever after to have any. But howsoever, in hope of the joy that was expected, in January this year, divers of the Council, as the Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Controller of the Queens House, Secretary Bunyan, and Sir Richard Soutbwell Master of the Ordnance, were sent to the Tower, to discharge and set at liberty a great part of the Prisoners in the Tower; as namely, the late Duke of Northumberland's Sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, also Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir James Craves, Sir Nicho- las Throgmorton, Sir John Rogers, Sir Nicho- las Arnold, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward War- ner, Sir William Stilwell, Sir Queen Catesby, William Gybbs Elquire, Cumbert Vaughan, and some others.

About this time one William Etherbone, Mullers Son, of the age of eighteen years, named, and bruitied himself to be King Edward the Sixth; for which being apprehended and exam- ined, he answered as one Lunatick, and there- upon was whipped at the carts tayl, and ban- nished into the North: but the year after, spreading abroad again, he was taken, and that he had talked with him, he was arrested and condemned of treason, and at Tyburn hanged and quartered.

In the month of March, the Queen was taken with a fit of Devotion, and thereupon called unto her four of her Privy Council, namely, William Marques of Winchester Lord Treasurer, Sir Robert Richseh Controller, Sir William Peter Secretary, and Sir Francis Engfield Master of the Wars, and signified unto them, That it went against her Conscience to hold the Lands and Poffessions as well of Monasteries and Ab- beys, as of other Churches, and therefore did freely relinquish them, and leave them to be disposed of, as the Pope and the Lord Cardinal should think fit; and thereupon charged them to acquite the Cardinal with her purpose. And shortly after in performance of this, John Hickman, late Dean of Pains, was made Abbot of Wolfhimer, and had poffession of the same, and with him fourteen Monks re- ceived the Habit at the same time: and on the twentieth of November, Sir Thomas was intima- ted Lord of St. Johns of Hirufaleme, and was put in poffession of the Lands belonging unto it. And when it was cold her, That this would be a great diminution of the Revenues of her Crown; she answered, She more valued the salvation of her soul than a thousand Crowns. A most religious speech, and enough, if there were but this, to show her to be a most Pious Prince.
The fourth of September this year, Ring Philip waited on with the Earl of Arundel, Lord Steward, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Huntingdon, and others, went over to Calliche, and from hence Burnell in Braintree, to visit the Emperour his Father; who delivering him posfession of the Low-Countries, in March following he returned into England; but on the sixth of July following, by reason of Wars with France, he paused again over to Calliche, and from whence he returned not till eighteen months after; which made great muttering amongst the Common people, as though he took any little occasion to be absent, for the little love he bore to the Queen.

In the third year of the Queen died Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, at his house in Southwalk, of whole death it is memorable, That the same day in which Bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer suffered at Oxford, he would not go to dinner till four a clock in the afternoon, though the old Duke of York was come to dine with him the reason was, because he would first look of their being burn'd; and as soon as word of that was brought him he presently said, Now let us go to Dinner; where setting down, and eating merrily, upon a sudden he fell into such extremity, that he was fain to be taken from the Table, and carried to his bed, where he continued fifteen days, without voing any thing either by Urine or other wise, which caused his tongue to swell in his mouth, and so he died, after whose death, Nicholas Heath Arch Bishop of York was made Lord Chancellor.

And now comes the time of Arch Bishop Cranmer Execution, who the year before had been condemned and degraded by Commination from the Pope; after which, being by the fulbility of home, put in hope of life, out of frailty he subscribed to a Recantation, which yet did him no good; for whether it were that Cardinal Poole would no longer be kept from being Arch Bishop, (which he would not be long as he lived) or because he was before, to forget his being the chief Instrument of her Mother's Divorce; his Execution was resoluted to be the fourteenth of February, in the same place Oxford where Ridley and Latimer five months before had been: Before the Execution, Doctor Cole preached, who to make use of Cranmer's Recantation, told the people, they should do well to hearken to this Learned mans Confession, who now at his death, and with his death would testify which was the true Religion; never thinking that Cranmer would have denied his former Recantation: But Cranmer being brought to the Stake, (contrary to expectation) acknowledged, That through frailty he had subscribed it, praying God heartily to forgive it; and now for a punishment, that hand which had done it should first suffer, and therewithall throwing his right hand into the fire, he there held it, till it flirr, and then his while body was consumed; only (which was no small miracle) his heart remained whole and not once touched with the fire. The same year also, no fewer than eighty four of both Sexes were burn't for Religion: and it was a cruelty very far exceedeth, that the bones of Bun and Phil were some time before dead and burnt were taken up and publicly burnt in Cambridge. No sooner was Cranmer dead, but the very fame day was Cardinal Poole made Arch Bishop of Canterbury.

In the fourth year of the Queen, exemplary Justice was done upon a great Perfon; for the Lord Sturtz a man much in the Queen's favour, as being an erneated Papist, was for a Murther committed by him, arraigned and condemned, and he, with four of his Servants carried to Salisbury, was there in the Market-place hanged, having this favour to be hanged in a fiken halter, his Servants in places near ad-joyning to the place where the Murther was committed.

The four and twentieth of April, Thomas Staff-for, second Son to the Lord Stafford, with other to the number of two and thirty persons (let on by the French King) attempted to raise Senation against the Queen, for marrying with King Philip, and coming out of France, arriv'd at Scarborough in Yorkshire, where they took the Cattle, but within two days were driven out by the Earl of Pembroke; and though taken and arraigned; The eighth and twentieth of May, Stafford was beheaded on the Tower-Hill, and the next day three of his Associates, Stella, Bradford, and Prator were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, and there executed. The first of May, Thomas Percy was first made Knight, after Lord, and the next day was created Earl of Northumberland, to whom the Queen gave all the Lands that had been his Aunciturs.

At this time the Queen intangled her self (contrary to her promife) in her Husband's Querelle, lent a dehance to the French King, by

Clarence King at Arms; and after on the Monday in the Whitsun-week, by found of Trumpet, proclaimed open War against him in Cheesepie, and other places of the City; and shortly after, caused an Army of a thousand Horsie, and four thousand Foot, to be transported over, to the aid of her Husband King Philip, under the leading of the Earl of Pembroke Captain General, Sir Anthony Brown Vice Count Montague Lieutenant General, the Lord Gray of Wilton Lord Marshal, the Earl of Rutland General of the Horfe, the Earl of Lincoln Colonel of the Foot, the Lord Robert Dudley Master of the Ordnance, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord De la Werre, the Lord Bray, the Lord Chandos, the Lord Ambrose Dudley, the Lord Henry Dudley, with divers Knights and Gentlemen; who joining with King Philip Forces, they all set down before St. Quintus, a Town of the French Kings of great importance. To the rescue whereof, the French King lent an Army, under the leading of the Conflable of France, which conflited of nine hundred men at Arms, with as many light Horsie, eight hundred Reylers, two and twenty Ensigns of Lancetheletes, and sixteen Ensigns of French Foutmen: Their purpose was not to give battle, but to put more Succours into the Town, which the Philippians percieving, encountered them, and in the fight flew John of Baron Duke of Anglita, the Vice count of Torrain, the Lord of Chadscott, with many Gentlemen of account: They took prisoners the Duke of Marmory Conflable of France, the Duke of Montemper, Duke Longeville, the Marshal of St. Andrews, the Lord Lewis Brother to the Duke of Marchmont, the Baron of Caston, the Alingrate Colonel of the Almarchant, Monsieur d'Oigny, Monsieur de Biron, and many others; and then pursuing the victory, under the government of the Earl of Pembroke, on the seventh and twentieth of August they took the Town of St. Quintin; in the assault whereof, the Lord Henry Dudley, youngest Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was with a piece of great Ordinance slain, & some other of account. The facade of the Town K. Philip gave to the English, as by whose valour chiefly it was won. The joy was not for great for this winning of St. Quintin, but there will be greater sorrow present for other losses. Many of the Garrison of Calais had been drawn from thence for service of St. Quintin, and no new supply sent; which being perceived by the French King, a Plot is laid how to surprize it, which yet was not so secretly carried, but that the Officers of Calais had intelligence thereof; who there upon signified it to the Council of England, requiring speedy Succours, without which, against to great an Army as was raised against them, they should not be able to hold out. But whether they gave no credit to their relations, or whether they apprehended not the danger to imminent as indeed it was, they neglected to send Supplies till it was too late: For the Duke of Guise, with no less speed than Policy, took such a course, that at one and the same time, he sent both upon Newhaven bridge, and also upon Ricebank (the two main Skcers for defence of the Town) and took them both, and then fell presently to batter the Walls of the Castle it self, and with such violence of great Ordinance, that the noise was heard to Antwerp, being a hundred miles off. But having made the Walls unserviceable, the English used this Stratagem, they laid trains of Powder to blow them up, when they should offer to enter; but this Stratagem succeeded not; for the French in making the Ditch, had so wet their cloths, that dropping upon the ground, the Powder would take no fire (for all things seemed to concur against the English) and thereupon the Castle was taken also, and with it the Town also been taken, but that Sir Anthony Ager, with the loss of his own life, and his eldest Sons, valiantly defended it, and for that time repelled the French; but their Numbers increased so fast upon the Town, that the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, seeing no other way of safety, demanded Parlee, where a Composition was made, that the Town should presently be yielded to the French King, the lives of the Inhabitants only saved, and safe conduct to pass away, saving the Lord Deputy with fifty other, such as the Duke should name. And here to be quit with the English for their hard usage at St. Quintin, the Duke caused Proclamation to be made, That all and every person of the Town should bring their money, jewels, and plate, to the value of a great, and lay it down upon the high Altar of the Church; by which means, an indescribable form of Treason was there offered, enough to enrich an Army, which had before enriched a Town. And now to make it appear how unable the Town was to hold out against so great an Army, it is said, there were in it: but only five hundred Soldiers of ordinary, and scarce two hundred more of able fighting men; but of other people, men, women, and children, four thousand and two hundred; all which were suffer'd to depart, saving the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, Sir Ralph Cheynwold Captain of the Castle, John Earlestone Captain of Richards, Nicholas Alexander Captain of New- ham bridge, Edward Grimston the Controller, John Rogers the Surveyor, with others to the number of fifty, who were all carried prisoners into France. And thus Calais, which had been in possession of the English above two hundred years, was won from the English in eight days, which King Edward the Third had not won from the French in less than a year. The Lord Wentworth was suspected, and in Queen Elizabeths time arraigned for betraying it, but was acquitted by his Peers. Calais thus won, the Duke with his Army marched to Guise, five miles distant, whereof was Cap- tain the Lord Gray of Wilson, who held out the siege and bastions five or six days with great valour and resolution, that he appeared in no thing inferior to the Enemy but in multitude; yet at last overthrows with their numbers, and imperturbed by his Soldiers, much against his own will, he made composition, that the Town and Calais should be wholly render'd, himself and all Officers remain prisoners, all other to depart with their Armour and Baggage. The King afterward ransom'd for four and twenty thousand Crowns. And now the Duke of Guise considering that Guise would be too costly a Castle to be kept, and too dangerous a neighbour to Calais, if it should be recovered, razed it with the Bulwarks and Fortifications to the ground. Guise thus won, there remain'd nothing within the English Pale, but the lit- tle Castle of Hamlet, whereof was Captain the Lord Edward Dudley, who considering that it was naturally strongly situat'd, as being environ'd with Pans and Marshes, yet it had but little help by Act of Fortifications, and being allus'd that the Duke of Guise would speedily come upon him, he secretly in the night with all his Garrison departed into Flanders, so as the Castle was not won, but taken by the Duke of Guise; and with the loss of this Castle, the English lost all their footing in Terra Forma, and the Kings of England all the reality of their Title in France, having nothing left but undam names.}

Prently after this, the French King caus'd the Marriage between his eldest Son Francis, Duke of Holstein, and Mery Steward, sole Heire of James the fifth, King of Scotland, to be solemn- lized: whereupon great Wars ensued soon after between England and Scotland.

Queen Mery being infinitely troubled in mind for the loss of Calais, sent prently forth her Admiral the Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of more than a hundred sail, to recover at least re- paration in honour, by doing some exploit upon France, who not finding opportunity to fet upon Haydock's, as he was appointed, fell upon the Town of Calais, which he took and burnt, and also divers Villages therabouts, and then returned. In which mean time, many great Confllicts having having been between King Philip and the King of France; at last, by mediation of the Dutchess of Lorraine, a Treaty of Peace is agreed on, where all things seemed to be well accorded, but only that King Philip by all means required restitution of Calais, to which by no means the French would consent: But whilst they stood upon these terms, it happened that first the Emperor Charles King Philip's Father died, and shortly after Queen Mary, and the day after Cardinal Pole, and shortly after Sir John Parker of Sisophon in Kent, who had been a Privy Counsellor to Henry the eighth, Edward the sixth, and Queen Mary. And to our Story hath no further relation to either War or Peace, between the two Kings of France and Spain.

Of her Taxes.

She began with a rare Example; for in the first year of her Reign, was pardon'd by Proclamation the Subsidy of four shillings the pound of Land, and two shillings the pound of goods, granted in the last Parliament of King Edward the sixth. In her second year, in Parliament then holden, was granted to the King and Queen a Subsidy of the Livery, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence to twenty pence, from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence to twenty pounds, from twenty pounds upwards, fifteen pence in the pound; all Strangers double, and the Clergy fix shillings in the pound. If this were all, then upon the matter, in all her time, there came no new charge upon her people; for one Subsidy remitted, and one received, made but even. In her last year she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the City of London; and paid twelve pounds a year Interest for every hundred pound.

Laws and Ordinances in her Time.

In her first year, on the fourth of September, there were proclaimed certain new Coins of Gold and Silver, a Sovereign of Gold of thirty shillings; the half Sovereign fifteen shillings; an Angel of ten shillings; the half Angel five shillings. Of Silver the pant, the half groat, and penny; all these Coins to be current as before. In her second year, Proclamation was made, forbidding the flooring in Hand-guns, and bearing of weapons. The year in which she was married to King Philip, a straight charge was made to all Victuallers, Taverners, and Alehouse-keepers, that they should not feem nor drink, nor any kind of viætuals, to any Serving-man whatsoever, unless he brought a testimonial to show whose servant he was. Also in a Parliament helden this year, amongst other Acts, the Stature Ex Officio and other Laws made for the punishment of Heretickes, were revived; but chiefly the Popes Bull of Dispensation of Abbeylend was there confirmed. In her second year, on Michaelmas Even, the Prisoners that lay in the Counter in Breadstreet, were removed to a new Counter made in Fleetstreet, the City purchase and building: which the removing was confirmed by the Common Council of the City.

Affairs of the Church in her Time.

In the first year of this Queen Regne, all Bishops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the Sixth, were restored to their Bishopspricks; and the new removed, allowed beneficed men that were married, or would not forsake their Opinion, were put out of their Living; and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms. About this year, on the seventh and twelfth of August, the Service began to be sung in Latin in Paul's Church. Also this year the Popes Authority was by Act of Parliament restored in England, and the Mafs commanded in all Churches to be used. In her second year, the calm is Abolished, and reconciled to the Church of Rome by Cardinal Pole: and first Fruits and Tents are restored to the Clergy; but this was soon revoked, the Council finding the necessity of it for the Queens support. In her fourth year, Monasteries were begun to be re-edified; of which number were that of Westminster, that of Sheen and Stan, that of the Black-Fryers, and the Fryers of Greenwich. Of the number of those that died for Religion in her time, there are recorded five Bishops, one and twenty Divines, and of all sorts of Men and Women, two hundred three score and seventeen.

Works of Piety done by her, or others, in her Time.

His Queen restored a great part of Abbeylands that were in her possession, and if she had lived longer, very likely she would have restored more. In her first year, Sir Thomas White then Mayor, erected a College in Oxford, now called St. John's College, before Bernard College: he also erected Schools at Briffou and Reading, and gave two thousand pounds to the City of Briffou to purchase Lands, the profits whereof to be employed for the benefit of young Clothiers for ten years, and after that to be employed in like manner, to the benefit of two and twenty other Shires and Cities. In her third year died Sir John Gresham, late Mayor of London, who founded a Free School at Hol in Norfolk, and gave to every Ward in London ten pounds to be distributed to the Poor also to Maids Marriages two hundred pounds. Cutber Tynful Bishop of Durham erected a goodly Library in Cambride, storing it with many excellent Books, and in written Books; he also bestowed much upon building at Durham, at Alnwick and at Tynbridge.

Casualties happening in her Time.

In her first year, on the seven and twentieth of August, the goodliest Ship in England, called The Great Harry, being of the burthen of a thousand Tuns, was burnt at Fishwich by negligence of the Master. In her second year, on the sixteenth of February, appeared in the Skie a Rainbow reverbered, the bow turned downward, and the two ends standing upward: Also two Suns shined at one time a good distance abunder,

Of her Personage and Condition.

The price of Wheat and Malt in a dearth, was very high, in a plenty.

Of her Death and Burial.

Of Men of Valour in her time, there were many, as may be seen in the Story of her Reign; but to name some for example, there was William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the chief affiant of King Philip in the winning of St. Quayns: there was William Lord Gray of Wilton, Captain of Graysho, who though he yielded the Town, yet more of tenderness to his Souldiers than out of fear of his Enemies, which he never else would have yielded up: and to speak of one of a meaner rank, there was Sir Anthony Ager, who in defence of the Town of Calais lost his life, but not till he made the Enemy turn their backs and fie. Of Learned men also there were very many, as John Rogers, born in Lancashire, who Translated the Bible into English with Notes. Richard Maryson Knight, born in Oxfordshire, who wrote divers divers Treatises. Robert Record, a Doctor of Phyllick, who wrote a Book of Arithmetick.
Caius Bert Traftall, of a Worshipful Family in Lancashire, though base born, whose Anceytor came into England with the Conquerour as his Barbour, and therefore hath three Combs his Arms, Bishop first of London, and after of Durham, who wrote divers learned Works. Richard Sampson, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who wrote certain Treatises. Lucas Shepheard, born at Cireficer in Essex, an English Poet. Jane Dudley, Daughter to Henry Grey Duke of Suffolk, wrote divers excellent Treatises. William Pern, a black Fryer, who wrote in defence of the Mass, and also divers Sermons. Henry Lord Stafford, Son to Edward Duke of Buckingham, who, amongst other things which he wrote, Translated a book out of Latine into English, entitled, Utriusque Posteritatis Differentia; which Book (as some think) was first compiled by Edward Fox Bishop of Hereford. John Hopkins, who Translated divers of Davids Psalms into English Meeter, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the Church.

Mayers and Sheriffs of London in her Reign.

In her first Year, Sir Thomas White was Mayor.
Thomas Offley, William Hemet, Sheriffs.

In her second year, Sir John Lyon was Mayor.
David Woodruff, William Chester, Sheriffs.

In her third year,

The Reign of Queen Elizabeth

Queen Mary dying on Thursday the seventeenth of November, in the Year 1558, her Sister, the Lady Elizabeth, of the age of five and twenty years, the only surviving Child of King Henry the Eighth, by undoubted Right, succeeded her in the Crown; which happening in a time of Parliament, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, and Lord Chancellor, sent to the Knights and Barnefies in the Lower House, to repair immediately to the Lords of the Upper Houfe; to whom he signified, That Queen Mary was that Morning dead, and therefore required their Affent to join with the Lords in proclaiming Queen Elizabeth; which accordingly was done, by the sound of Trumpet, firft at Westminster, and in the City of London. The Queen was then at Hatfield; from whence on Wednesday the three and twentieth of November, she removed to the Lord North's Houfe in the Charter-Houfe, where she stayed till Monday the eight and twentieth of November, and then rode in her Chariot thorough London to the Tower; where she continued till the fifth of December, and then removed to Somerfet Houfe in the Strand; from whence she went to her Palace at Westminster, and from thence, on the twelfth of January, to the Tower; and on the fourteenth of January, to Westminster to her Coronation; whereas we went, the said this Prayer: O Lord, Almighty and everlasting God, I give thee most hearty thanks, that thou hast spared me to this joyful day; and I acknowledge, that thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me, as thou didst with thy Faithful Servant Daniel whom thou deliveredst out of the Denne, from the cruelty of the raging Lions; even so was I exasperated, and only by thee delivered: To thee therefore only be thanks, honour and praise for ever. And it is incredible, what Pageants and Shows were made in the City, as she passed. On Sunday the five and twentieth of January, she was Crowned in the Abbey Church at Westminster, by Doctor Ogelthorp Bishop of Carlisle, with all Solemnities and Ceremonies in such case accustomed. At this time, to honor her Coronation, she conferred more Honours, than in all her time after: William Parre degraded by Queen Mary, she made Marquess of Northampton; Edward Seymour, whose Father had been Attainted, the made Earl of Hertford; Thomas Howard, second Son to the Duke of Norfolk, the made Viscount Bindon; Sir Henry Carie, her Cousin German, the made Baron of Hunsdon; and Sir Oliver Saint-John, the made Baron of Blithfield.

And now the Queen, though the were her self very wife, yer would not truft (and it was a great point of Wisdome that she would not trauft) to her own widome; and therefore she chose Counsellors to affift her: In which number she took Nicholas Heat Archbishop of York; William Parre Marquis of Winchester; Lord high Treasurer; Henry Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundell; Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury; Edward Stanley Earl of Derby; William Herbert Earl of Pembroke; Edward Lord Clinton Lord Admiral; and William Lord Howard of Effingham; Sir Thomas Chetwynd, Sir William Peter, Sir Richard Sackwyt, and Nicholas Winton Dean of Canterbury; All which had been Counsellors to Queen Mary, and were of her Religion; but then to make a counterpoise of Counsellors of her own Religion, she joined with them William Parre Marquis of Northampton; Francis Roffel Earl of Bedford; Sir Thomas Parre, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Ambrose Care, Sir Francis Knolles, and Sir William Cecil, late Secretary to King Edward the Sixth; and a little after Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom the made Keeper of the Great Seal. And having thus provided for the
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

During this time, a Parliament had been summoned to begin at Westminster, upon the fifteenth of January; and now the Queen, for satisfaction of the People, appointed a Conference to be held between the Prelates of the Realm, and Protestant Divines now newly returned, who had fled the Realm in the time of Queen Mary; For the Prelates, were chosen John White, Bishop of Winchester; Ralph Bayes, Bishop of Croydon and Lichfield; Thomas Watson, Bishop of Lincoln; Doctor Cole, Dean of Pauls; Doctor Langwell, Arch-deacon of Lams; Doctor Harpsfield, Archdeacon of Canterbury; and Doctor Chadby Archdeacon of Middlesex. For the Protestant sides were appointed Doctor Story, Doctor Cox, Doctor Sands, Doctor Whitchurch, Doctor Grindall, Master Horns, Master Goff, Master Elmer, and Master Smalle. The place was prepared in Westminster Church; where, besides the Dividants, were present the Lords of the Queen's Council, with all of the Nobility; as also many of the Lords House of Parliament. The Articles propounded against the Prelates, and their adherents, were these: First, That it is against the Word of God, and the Custom of the Ancient Church to use a Tongue unknown to the People in Common Prayer and in the Administration of the Sacrament. Secondly, That every Church hath authority to appoint and change Ceremonies, and Ecclesiastical Rites, so they be to edification. Thirdly, That it cannot be proved by the Word of God, that there is in the Mass a Sacrifice Propitiatory for the living and the dead. For the manner of their Conference, it was agreed it should be performed in Writing, and that the Bishops should deliver their Reasons in writing first. The last of March was the first day of their meeting; where, contrary to the Order, the Bishops brought nothing in Writing; but said, they would deliver their minds only by Speech; This breaking of Order much displeased the Lords; yet they had it granted. Then role up Doctor Cole, and made a brief Declaration concerning the first Point: when he had ended, the Lords demanded if any of them had more to say? Who answered, No. Then the Protestant Party exhibited a written Book; which was distinctly read by Master Horn. This done, some of the Bishops began to affirm, they had much more to say in the first Article: this again much displeased the Lords; yet this also was granted them, to do at their next Meeting on Monday next; but when Monday came, so many other differences arose between them, that the Conference broke off, and nothing was determined. But in the Parliament there was better agreement; for there it was Enacted, That Queen Elizabeth was the lawful and undisputed Queen of England; notwithstanding a Law made by her Father King Henry the Eighth, that excluded both her and her Sister Mary from the Crown, seeing, though the Law be not repealed, yet it is a principle in Law, That the Crown once taken, cannot take away all defects. Also in the Parliament, First Fruits and Tithes were restored to the Crown; and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England was confirmed to the Queen, with an universal consent, that in the Upper House, none opposed these Laws, but only the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir Anthony Browne; Vicount Montague; Montague: and in the Lower-House, only some few of Papal inclination, murmured, saying, That the Parliament was partial, and that the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundel, and Sir William Cecil, for their own ends, had cunningly begg'd Voyces, to make up their Party.

The Supremacy thus confirmed to the Queen, the Oath was soon after tendered to the Bishops and others, of whom, as many as refused to take it, were presently deprived of their Living. And that we may infer, how inclining the Kingdom at this time was to receive the Protestant Religion: it is said, that in the whole Realm (wherein are reckoned above Nine thousand Spiritual Promotions) there were not more that refused to take the Oath, but only fourscore Parsons, fifty Prebendaries, fifteen Masters of Colleges, twelve Arch-deacons, twelve Deans, six Abots, and fourteen Bishops, (indeed all that were at that time, except Antony Bishop of Landaff) as Nicholas Heath Archibishop of York, Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, Carter Tangall Bishop of Durham, Thomas Thirlby Bishop of Ely, Guillern Bourn Bishop of Bath, and John Christopher fan Winchester, Thomas Watson Bishop of Lincoln, Ralph Bayne Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, Owen Osborne Bishop of Carlisle, James Towne Bishop of Exeter, and David Poul Bishop of Peterborough: and with these, Dr. Frekeham Abbot of Westminster: All who were at first committed to prison, but soon after delivered to the custody of private Friends, excepting these two favoy Prelates, Lincoln and Winchester, who threatened to excommunicate the Queen. Three only, namely, Carter Seer Bishop of Chester, Richard Pate Bishop of Worcester, and Thomas Goldswell Bishop of Saint Asaph, changed their Religion of their own accord: as also did certain Noble Personages, namely, Henry Lord Morice, Sir Francis Englefield, and Sir Peter Percevall, (who had been able Councillors to Queen Mary) Sir Thomas Shierley, and Sir John Gage.

In the Sees of the Prelates above-mentioned were plac'd Protestant Bishops, as Matthew Parker was made Archibishop of Canterbury, (who was consecrated by the Impostion of the hands of three that formerly had been Bishops: namely, William Baron of Bath and Wells, John Scory of Chichester, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter) and being consecrated himself, he afterward consecrated Edmund Grindall Bishop of London, Richard Cor Bishop of Ely, Edwyn Sand Bip Bishop of Worcester, Rowland Merich Bishop of Bangor, Thomas Yong Bishop of Saint Davys, Nicholas Bullingham Bishop of Lincoln, John Jessil Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Davis Bishop of Saint Asaph, Edward Gres Bishop of Rochester, Gilbert Barkley Bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Bembam Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, William Alley Bishop of Exeter, John Parkery Bishop of Norwich, Robert Harw Bishop of Winchester, Richard Chevney Bishop of Gloucester, Edmund Scambler Bishop of Peterborough, William Baron Bishop of Chichester, John Scory Bishop of Hereford, Young Archibishop of York, James Pickington Bishop of Durham, John Rafe Bishop of Carlisle, and William Downham Bishop of Chester.

While these things were done in England, the Treaty of Peace at Cambray continued full: wherein King Philip stood for the restitution of Calais to the Englishe, as firmly as if it had been his own Interest: and without it, would agree to no Peace with France: But when by Messeages he understood that his Suit for marriage with Queen Elizabeth was rejected: and that the Protestant Religion was established in the Kingdom, he then left Queen Elizabeth, seeing the way not be his, to himself; and though he became not presently a Foe, yet he became peculiarly left then a Friend, and forborne to do any more good Offices in that busines. Queen Elizabeth thus left to her self, agreed with the French King, to conclude her own peace apart: and thereupon, Delegates on both sides were appointed to meet at Cambray: For the Queen of England were Thursday Bishop of Ely, the Lord Williams, the Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain to the Queen, and Doctor Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York: For the King of France were, Charles Cardinal of Lorraine, the first Peer of France, Anneus Duclus of Memramcy, James Allen Lord of Saint Annes, and John Marville Bishop of Orleance, and Claude Ambrose Secretary to the Privy Council. The Commissioners meeting, the chief point in difference, was the restitution of Calais: for which the Englishe Commissioners, by the Queen's appointment,offered to remit two Millions of Crowns, that by just accout were due from France to England; but the Queen was not more desirous to recover Calais, than the French King was to hold it: And thereupon at last, it was concluded, that Calais should remain in possesstion of the French for the term of eight years: and then expired, it should be delivered to the Englishe, upon Forfeiture of five hundred thousand Crowns, for which, Hoftages were given: But all this not-withstading, though the Conditions were feared and sworn to, and though Hoftages were affigned to remain in England, till one or other were performed: yet all was fruitless, and came to no thing.

About this time, Henry King of France married his Daughter to Prince Philip of Spain, and his Sister Margaret to Emanuel Poiveller, Duke of Savoy: at the Solemnity of which Marriages, he would needs be a Tilter himself: and thereupon commanded the Earl of Montgomery to run against him, who unfortunately breaking his Lance upon the Kings Curassye, a splinter thereof (his Beaver being somewhat open) struck him so deep in the Eye, that within few days he ended his life: After whose death, Francis his Son, at the age of sixteen years,fucceeded him in the Crown, having by the Marriage of Queen Mary, the Tirole of Scotland, and upon ground thereof, laying claim to the Crown of England also, & giving the Arms of England, as properly belonging to him. And now begins the game of Fochion to be plaid, wherein the whole Effere of Queen Elizabeth lay at stake, a Game that will hold playing the most part of her Reign, and if not plaid well, will put her in jeopardy of losing all, fearig all about her was against her: Philip of Spain hath a quarrel to her, for being rejected in his suit; the King of France hath a quarrel to her in right of his Wife, which is now his right; the Queen of Scots hath a quarrel to her for detaining her In-
The reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Pope hath a quarrel to her, for excluding his authority; the King of Sweden hath a quarrel to her, for flying his Son in the way of Marriage: And all the being and all her, whom hath she on her side, but only her own Subjects, Papists yesterday, and to day Protestants, who being fierce setted in their Religion, how shall they be setted in their Loyalty? And not being loyal, where can the find to cast Anchor for her safety? But it is a true saying, Nulla non est deputata; Wildone is a supply for all defects: And indeed the Queen being very wise in her self, and having a wise Council about her, she passion all these difficulties, though not without danger, yet with little or no hazard.

It happened at last it happened, and were not rather plotted of purpose that a Reformation of Religion was pretended in Scotland; but was indeed an incumbrance upon the Princes Authority; for at the preaching of John Knox, and other headstrong Ministers, not only Images and Altars were cut down and burnt, the Monasteries of Saint Andrew's, of Stone, of Stirling, and of Linlithgow were overthrown; but it was further put into the heads of the Nobility, that it was a great matter to take away Idolatry, and by force reduce the Prince to the precept of Law: whereupon there was presently a bandying of the Lords of Scotland, against the Queen Dowager, Regent of the Country; and in this case each of them fought for aid; The Queen Dowager had aid out of France, the Lords of Scotland lent aid to the Queen of England: But this was matter for contention. It seemed a bad example, for a Prince to give aid to the rebellious Subjects of another Prince; On the other side: It seemed no less than imperty, not to give aid to the Protestants of the same Religion; but most of all it seemed plain madness, to suffer adventuraries to be from near Neighbours, and let the French needle in Scotland, who pretend Title to England; upon such confidurations, it was resolved to feed them aid: and thereupon, an Army of six thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, was sent under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Gray of Welton his Lieutenant General; Sir James Crichton; and to him; the Lord Strag, Lord Marth, Sir George Howard, General of the men at Arms; Sir Henry Percy, General of the Light-Horse; Thomas Huggen Provoft Mar- thall; Thomas Gower, Master of the Ordinance; Master William Pilem, Captain of the Pyoneers; and Master Edward Randall, Serjeant Major, and divers others. These coming into Scotland joined with the Scotch Lords, and set down before Leith, where pafted many small Skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Affinats to whom, after some time, a new cappay of some two thousand Foot; whereof were Captains, Sir Andrew Corbet, Sir Rowland Stanley, Sir Thomas Hei- le; Sir Arthur Mannaring Sir Lawrence Smith, and others: yet with this new cappay there was little more done than before; many light Skir- mishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Affinats, so long till at last the young French King, finding these broys of Scotland to be too farious for him to oppose, he sent to the Queen of England, defiring that Commissioners might be sent to re-} 1560.

The Queen sends an Army to affit the Lords of Scotland.

A Peace is concluded between the King of France, and the Queen, and upon what terms, concile these differences; whereupon were dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecil, his principal Secretary, with Doctor Weller Dein of Canterbury, who concluded a Peace between England and France, upon these Conditions, That neither the King of France, nor the Queen of Scotland, should the first use the Arms of Titles of England or Ireland; And that both the English and the French should depart out of Scotland; And a general Pardon should be selected by Parliament, for all such as had been actors in those fins. This Peace was largely concluded, when Francis the young King of France died, leaving the Crown to his younger Brother Charles, who was guided altogether by the Queen Mother, and molested with the Civil dissensions between the Princes of Guise and Condé; for whole reconciliation, the Queen sent Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales; and shortly after an Army, under the leading of the Lord Antony Dudley, Earl of Warwick, who arriving at Newhaven, was received into the Town; which having kept eleven months, he was then contrained, by reason of a Peltience, to surrender again upon Composition, and so returned.

About this time, when the Parliament was upon dissolving, it was agreed upon by the House of Commons, to move the Queen to affit that she might have Hope to succeed her; to which purpose Thomas Gargraves, Speaker of the House, with some few other chosen men, had access to the Queen, who humbly made the motion to her, as a thing which the Kingdom infinitely defined; seeing they could never hope to have a better Prince, than out of her Lovys: Whereunto the Queen answered in effect thus; That she was already married; namely, To the Kingdom of England: and behold (faith she) the Pledge of the Covenant with my Husband; and there- with the held out her finger, and fayed the King wherewith, at the time of her Coronation, the gave her self in Wedlock to the Kingdom: and if (with the) I keep my self to this Husband, and take no other; yet I doubt not but God will lend you as good Kings as if they were born of me; for as much as we fee by daily Experience, That the Hope of the best Princes do often destroy itself which he had; And for my self, it shall be sufficient that a Marble Stone declare, That a Queen having reigned such a time, lived and died a Virgin.

Indeed, before this time, many Matches had been offered her; Firth, King Philip: and when he was out of hope of matching with her herself, he then dealt with the Emperor Ferdinand his Uncle, to command his younger Son Charles, Duke of Asftrria, to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, then John Duke of Finland, second Son to Giovanni King of Sweden, was sent by his Father, to solicate for his eldest Brother Eric; who was honourably receiv- ed, but the Match rejected. Then Algoum, Duke of Huilsh, Uncle to Frederick King of Den- mark came into England, upon a great hope of Speeding; but the Queen behoved upon him the Honour of the Garter, and a yearly Pension, but not her self. Then James Earl of Arras, was commended to her by the Prefectants of Scotland; but neither the man nor the motion was accept- ed. Of manner Fortune, there were some at home

Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining age. Then Robert Dudley, youngest Son of the Duke of Northumberland, of an excellent feature of face, and now in the flower of his age; but these might please themselves with their own conceit, but were not considerable in her apprehension: they might receive from her good Testimonials of her Prince***ly favour, but never pledges of Nuptial love.

About this time the Earl of Feria (who had married the Daughter of Sir William Damer) being denied leave of the Queen for some of his Wives friends to live out of England, grew to incend***ent, that he made means to purs the fourth, then Pope, to have her excommunicate as a Heretic and Usurper: but the Pope inclining rather to save than to destroy, & knowing that gentle cou***sels prevail more with generous minds, than rough***ness and violence; in most loving manner wrote under his hand, offering her to the.deleted from the Catholic Church; and as it is said, made her great offers, if she would hearken to his Counsel; particularly, That he would recall the Sen***tence pronounced against her Mothers Marriage, confirm the Book of Common-***Prayer in English, and permit to her People the use of the Sacra***ment in both Kinds. But Queen Elizabeth neither terrified with the Earl of Feria***s practices, nor allured with the Pople***s great offers, according to her Motto, Semper eadem, pers***sed constant in her Reflection, to maintain that Religion which in her Conscience she was persuaded to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church.

Whil***ile these grounds of troubles are flowing in England, France and Scotland, it is not likely that Ireland will lye fallow; though indeed it must a Country that will bring forth troubles of it self, without Foreign, but however, to make the more plentiful. Here are troubles enough. For King Henry the Eighth made Earl of Tyrone to prevent the punishment of a private outrage upon a Brother, broke into open Rebellion against the Prince; and though his attempts were maturely made frustrate by timely opposition; yet this was as that in the beginning of the Queens Reign, sowed the Seeds of that trouble in Ireland, which afterward, took so deep root, that till the ending of her Reign, it could never thoroughly be root***ed out; though this man a year or two after came into England, and calling himself at the Queens feet, acknowledged his fault, and obtained pardon.

The Treaty of Edinburgh should by promise have been confirmed by France; the French King while he lived; but he not having done it, Queen Elizabeth requires his Dowager, the Queen of Scots to confirm it; but the solicitation often to it by Throgmorton the Queens Leige in France, made always answer. She could not do it without the Consent of her Nobility in Scotland, Whereupon the French King suspecting that this Answer was but to hold her in amazement, while some mischief was practising against her, sent Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to persuade the Lords there to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her, and other Protestant Princes; and further, by no means to part with their Queen, now a Widow, to marry again to any Foreign Prince; for which she alleged many great Reasons. In the mean while, the Queen of Scots, purposing to return into Scotland, sent before-hand Dr. Of***s fret French Lord, to interest Queen Elizabeth, that with her leaves, the her might partake by Sea into Scotland; & Dr. Of***s might pass by Land, But Queen Elizabeth openly denied both the one and the other, unless she would confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh; saying, It was no reason she should do the Queen of Scots courte***e, if the Queen of Scots would not do her Right.

The Queen of Scots much troubled with this answer, expedit***ed the matter with her Leige Throgmorton, and much complained of the unh***s faultiness; but in the mean time providing shipp***ing the loaded from Callicie; and under covert of mist, notwithstanding that Ships were laid to intercept her, she arrived safe in Scotland; where she inserted her Subjects in loving a manner that she gave great contentment to the whole Kingdom, as well as to the Parliament; and to the other, and than sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, proffering all observance and readiness to enter League with her; to the might by Authori-***ty of Parliament, he declared her Successor, which was her Right. To this Queen Elizabeth an****\iflowered, That though she would so much degrete from her Right; yet she should be loth to endanger her own security, and as it were to covet her own eyes with a Grave-Cloth, while she was alive; but fell again to her old Abomination, requiring her to confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh: And now to shew the respect she bore her, when she Unckes the Dukes D***s Anmole, D***s Allen, and other Lords of France that had brought her home, returned through England; the gave them most bountiful and loving entertainment.

These two Queens indeed were both of great Spirits, and both very wise; but these grew fuch Jealoufies of State between them; (the Queen of Scots doubting left Queen Elizabeth meant to frustrate her Succession; Queen Elizabeth doubting left the Queen of Scots meant to prevent her Succession) that it kept them more alter-***der in love, then they were next in blood, and was cause of many unkind passages between them: in all which, though the Queen of Scots were a very near match to the Queen of England, in the abilities of her mind; yet in the favours of Fortune she was much her inferior.

But now for all the causes which Queen Elizabeth threw to the Queen of Scots Unlueck, at their returning through England, yet new practices were again set on foot against her at Rome; the Duke of Guise especially laboring to have her be Excommunicated: but Pope Pius full averse from such Thoughs, meant now to try the Queen another way; and thereupon sent the Abbot Martinengi, and when he might not be admitted to enter into England, then caused the Bishop of Viterbo his Nuncio in France to deal entirely with the Queen Leige Throgmorton, that the other Princes might come; who would send their Repr***sents to the Council of Trent, which he before had called. But the Queen nothing tendering this point, made preceptory answer. That a Pope
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

When divers great persons were called in, the Queen was at the Head of a General Council; nor did think the Pope to have any more Right or Power to call it, than any other Bishop. This answer not only exasperated the Pope, but also alienated the King of Spain, mind from her, that he was never after so kind a friend to her as he had been; nor of her Embassadors ever after had any great liking to be employed to him. And now at this time, as the Abbots Marienvaeg was the first that ever was sent from the Pope into England, so Sir Edw. Carew, now dying at Rome, was the last Legate that was sent from the Pope to the King of England.

So likewise was the French, knowing well that she had drawn many ill-willers against her State, the endeavoured to strengthen it by all the means she could devise. She caused many great Ordinances of Braille and Iron to be cast; she repaired Fortifications in the Borders of Scotland; she erected the number of Ships, so as England never had such a Navy before; she provided great store of Armour and Weapons out of Germany; she caused Ministers to be held, and youth to be trained in exercises of Artillery; and to please those people (whose love is the greatest strength of all the great leave to have Corn & Gran transported, and called in all base Coins and Brass Money.

It was now the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when divers great persons were called in question: Margaret Countess of Lenox, niece to King Henry the Eighth, by his eldest Sister, and her second in the Earl of Lenox; for having had secret conference by Letters with the Queen of Scots, were delivered prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville, Master of the Rolls, and with him kept a while in custody. Also Arthur Poole and his Brother, whose great Grand-father, was George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth; Anthony Forstans, who had married their Sister, and others were arraigned, for conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France, and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to declare the Queen of Scots, Queen of England; and Arthur Poole Duke of Clarence, which particulars they confessed at the Bar, and were thereupon condemned to die, but had their lives spared, in regard they were of the Blood-Royal. Also the Lady Katharine Gray, Daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, by the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, having formerly been married to the Earl of Pembroke, eldest Son; and from him soon after lawfully divorc'd, was some years after found to be with Child by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, with which Child being at that time in France, was presently sent for; and being examined before the Archbishops of Canterbury, and affirming they were lawfully married, but not being able within a limited time to produce witnesses of their marriage, they were both committed to the Tower; where she was brought to bed; and after by the convivence or corruption of their Keepers, being suffered sometimes to come together, she was with child by him again; which made the Queen more angry than before; so as Sir Edw. Warner Lieutenant of the Tower was put out of his place, and the Earl was fined in the Star-Chamber five thousand pounds, and kept in Prison nine years after. Though in pleading of his Case, one John Hales argued, They were lawful Man and Wife, by virtue of their own bare content, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The Lady a few years after, falling through grief into a mortal sickness, hereby desisted the Queens Pardon, for having married without her knowledge and commending her Children to her clemency, died in the Tower.

At this time (the King being under Age) discontents amongst the Peers grew hot in France, of which there were two Factions; both pretending the cause of Religion: Of the One, the Duke of Guise, a Papist, was Head; of the other the Prince of Condé, a Protestant. But while Delirant Regina plebiscitur Archie, while their Princes are at variance, the people suffer for it; and chiefly, as being under the weaker protection, the Protestant party, whereupon Queen Elizabeth, having well learned the Leesons: Two varces agonaris, partes com proximus arces, and fearing left the fame of their disfention, might kindle a fire within her own Kingdom; sent over Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales, into France, to endeavour by all possible means their reconciliation; which when he could not effect, (and perhaps it was never meant he should effect it, but only to see what Invitations would be made to the Queen for her assistance) the whereupon, at the mean of the affixed Protestants, sent an Army of six thousand Southerners, under the Conduct of the Earl of Warwick, in assistance of the Prince of Condé, and other Protestant Lords, who delivered to him the Town of Neuvon, to hold in the King of France his name until such time as Calices were restored; but the Prince of Condé, marching to join with the English Forces, was by the Duke of Guise intercepted, and taken a Prisoner, which had been a great disappointment to the English, but that the Duke of Colen joined with him, besieged Caen in Normandy, & took it, together with Bayonne, Falsife, and Saint Lo. The French Hostages that were pledges for the payment of five hundred thousand Crowns, if Calices were not restored, were remaining still in England; who perceiving there was like to be War with France, prepared secretly to get away; but being ready to take Shipping, were discovered and brought back again.

In the mean while, the Prince of Condé drawn on with a hope, to marry the Queen of Scots, and to have the chief Government in France, during the Kings Minority, concluded a Peace with the King, and with the Guises; so as now, all French as well Protestant as Papists, were required to have the Nobility delivered up: But the Earl of Warren, perceiving the infid offers of the French Protestant, did not find it fit to make the least motion, when the Duke of Guise was still in France, and now upon his flight occasion to require him to be gone; he dearest all French both Protestant and Papists, out of the Town, & lays hold of their Ships; the French on the other side make ready to set fire upon the Town, saying, They fought not now for Religion, but for their Country; wherefore it was meet that both Protestant and Papists should join their Forces, seeing they had already concluded a Peace between themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Monmouth sent a Trumpeter to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to yield the Town: who made answer by Sir Hugh Pumlet; That he would never yield it without the Queen's leave; he thereupon besieged the Town, and with a great violence of Battery, fought to get it by force.

Which
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Which Queen Elizabeth hearing, she sent a Commission to the Earl of Warwick to yield it up; if upon honorable Conditions; which soon after was accordingly done, after the English had held it eleven months; and then the Earl, without any detriment for yielding up a Town, which the Petition made him no less unwilling than unable to hold, returned into England: but that which was more doleful than the loss of Newboune, he brought the Petition with him into England. The recovery of this Town, not only made the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellor of France pronounced openly, That by this War, the English had lost all their Right to Callicie, and were not to require it any more, seeing it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations should make War upon the other; which was the Point upon which the King of France and his Mother, when Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Smith to demand Callicie to be restored.

At this time there were such close designs amongst the Princes of Christendom, that a very good Politian could hardly understand them all. The Duke of Guise being slain in the Civil War, the Queen of Scots Dowry was not paid her in France, and the Scots were put off from being the Kings Guard: This exceedingly dilapidated the Queen of Scots; but then to please her again, and for fear lest hereupon the Court should apply itself to the friendship of the English, her Uncle the Cardinal of Lorraine solicits her affreth, to marry Charles Duke of Austria; offering her for her Dowry the County of Tyrol.

The Queen of Scots, to make use of her Uncler fears, and perhaps to bring Queen Elizabeth into an opinion of depending upon her, acquaints her with this motion, and therein requires her advice. Queen Elizabeth not willing the shoulard be with any foreign Princes, persuades her to take a Husband out of England, and particularly commended to her the Lord Robert Dudley, (whole Wife a little before had with a fall broke her neck;) promising withal, that if she would marry him, she should then by Authority of Parliament be declared her Successor, in Case she died without Issue. But when her Uncler and the Queen-mother were informed of this motion, they so much disdained the Marriage with Dudley, so far the Queen of Scots replied, one of them, and that March, and probably were in the Friendship of the French, they offered to pay her the Dowry-money that was behind, and to restore the Scots to all their former Liberties in France. And as for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leiger Embassador here in England; but rather by way of Complement, and to watch advantages, than for any fincer sake; which he began to withdraw from the English, as far as he could, to trade with the Irish Lords.

And now the French Protestants may see what they brought upon themselves, by leaving the English at Newboune, and by trysting to their Country-men the French Papists, for their peace was but a trance, and the Marriage of Henry of Bourbon Prince of Navarre, with Margaret of Valois, the French Kings Sister was but a bait to entrap them; for upon the confidence of this Marriage, being drawn together into Paris, they were the reader for the slaughter; and a few days after the Marriage, which were all spent in Feasts and Masks, to make them the more Secure, upon a Watch-word given, the bloody Faction fell upon the Protestants, and neither spared age, nor sex, nor condition, but without mercy, and cons of humanity, slaughtered as many as they could meet with, to the number of many thousands.

It was now the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, a year fatal for the death of many great Personages: First died William Lord Gray of Wilton, Governor of Berwick, a man famous for his great Services in War; then William Lord Paget, a man of as great Services in Peace; who by his great defervings had wrought his advancement to sundry Dignities, and honourable places; and though zealous in the Roman Religion, yet held by Queen Elizabeth in great estimation to his dying day: Then Henry Manners Earl of Rutland, desecrated by his Mother from King Edward the fourth: And lastly, Francis the Dutches of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Mother to Queen Jane.

And now Queen Elizabeth finding howickle the French Protestants had carried themselves towards her, intended to make a Peace; and to that end sent Sir Thomas Smith into France, joining the Protestants in Communion with him; and in conclusion, a Peace was agreed on; whereof, amongst other Articles, this was one, That the Hostages in England should be freed, upon the payment of six hundred thousand Crowns: and this Peace was ratified by the Oath both of the Queen of England, and the King of France.

About this time the English Merchants were hardly used both in Spain, and in the Netherlands, upon pretence of Civil differences, but indeed out of hatred to the Protestant Religion; whereupon the English removed the Seat of their Trading to Embden in Frisland, but Gofman the Spanish Legier newly come into England, finding the great damages that the Netherlands sustained by these differences, endeavoured by all means to compote them; and thereupon Villautantine Montague, Nicholas Wooton, and Walter Haddon Master of the Renegates, were sent to Bruges in Flandes; who after many evantions, brought the matter at last to some indifferent agreement.

It was now the seventh year of Queen Elizabeth, when making a Progress, she went to Cambridge; where after she had viewed the Colleges, and been entertained with Comedies and Scholastical Disputations, she made herself a Latin Oration, to the great Encouragement of the Scholars, and then returned. Presently after her return, she made the Lord Robert Dudley Master of her Horse, first Baron of Denhig (giving him Denhig and all the Lands belonging to it) and then Earl of Leicester to him, and the Heirs males of his Body lawfully begotten; which Honour was conferred upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known. And now Leicester, to endure himself to the Queen of Scots, accused Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord-Keeper, for being privy to the Libell of Hales, who affirmed the right of the Crown to belong to the Family of Suffolk, in case the Queen should die without Issue; and thereupon was Bacon cast into Prison;
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Queen seeks to marry the Lord Dalrymple, son of the Earl of Lennox, but the Commissioners refuse to consent to this marriage. The Queen Elizabeth dislikes her from it, and the Commissioners refuse to marry the Earl of Leicestershire.

Hereupon, the Queen proceeds to conclude a marriage with Sir Thomas Randell for Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Murray, and Liddington for the Queen of Scots at Burwick, entered into a Treaty concerning the marriage with the Earl of Leicestershire. The English Commissioners urge the great benefits that by this match would accrue both to the Queen of Scots and the whole Kingdom of Scotland: The Scots will be appeased, and the great disparagement it would be to the Queen of Scots, if refusing the offer made her of divers great Princes, she should match her self with to mean a Person as the Earl of Leicestershire. This matter held long debate, partly for the English Commissioners were so appointed by Queen Elizabeth: and partly for that the Scots Commissioners had a good mind to hinder her from marrying at all; and perhaps not the least, for that the Earl of Leicestershire, being very peripatetic, should she at last obtain Queen Elizabeth her self, by secret Letters warned the Earl of Bedford not to urge the marriage with the Queen of Scots too far; and was thought for this cause to favour Dalrymple under hand. The matter being in this manner protracted for two whole years together; the Queen of Scots impatient of longer delay, and being resolved in her mind what she would do, used means, that the Lord Dalrymple got leave of Queen Elizabeth to go into Scotland for three months only, under colour to be put in possession of his Father's lands, (though it be strange, the Queen upon any terms would let him go, if she really intended to hinder the marriage: but such was the desire, if there were not a plot in it,) and so in February he came to Edinburgh; who being a young man of not above nineteen years of an age of a comely countenance, and most princely presence, the Queen of Scots as soon as she saw him, fell in love with him, yet modestly dissembling it for the present, she thought to get a Dispensation from Rome because of their nearness in Contiguity. And now, her inclination being grown to apparent, that there was no concealing it, she sent Liddington to Queen Elizabeth, declaring her content. But the, through the suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induced to believe that the Queen of Scots intention was, by this Marriage to get the Crown of England, and to bring in Popery, entered into consultation with her Privy-Council, what was to be done to hinder the Marriage; who all concluded, that there were the best ways: First, To have a Company of Souliards levyed for terror sake about the Borders towards Scotland; then to commit to Prison the Counsellors of Lennox, the Lord Dalrymple Mother; and to recall from Scotland the Earl of Lennox, and his Son Dalrymple, upon pain of the loss of all their goods in England: then that the Scots who were known to be of the Marriage, should be relieved and assisted: And lastly, That Katherine Gray, with the Earl of Hertford, should be received into some grace; above whom only (it was thought) the Queen of Scots was most solicitous, as being her Rival to the English Crown. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was sent to the Queen of Scots, to counsel her in the Queen's name, not to proceed in this Marriage; and to throw her into the many inconveniences that would accrue unto her by it. But she returned answer, that the matter was too far passed to be recalled; and that Queen Elizabeth had no cause to be displeased with it, seeing herein the followed her advice. Not to match with a stranger, but with an Englishman born, Queen Elizabeth being informed of her Answer, calleth home the Earl of Lennox and the Lord Dalrymple his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return: The Father modestly by Letters excuseth himself; the Son humbly in- treatheth her not to be a hindrance to his preferment; which he vows to imply in his Majesties Service, to the uttermost of his power.

And now to make him the fitter match for her, the Queen of Scots honoured him with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armackne, Earl of Roff, and Duke of Rothlery, which Dukedom by Birth pertained to the eldest Sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, when he had not been above five months in Scotland, she married him, and with the consent of most of the Peers, declared him King. At this the Earl of Murray, and other whom he drew to his party, extremely fretted, and fell to moving of turbulent questions, Whether it were lawful to adum a Papist King? Whether the Queen of Scots might chuse a Husband at her own pleasure? and whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not out of their own Authority impose one upon her? But however, they rallied Arms, and had disturbed the Nuptials, but that the Queen levied an Army to encounter them; with which she pursued them so closely, that they were fain to flee into England for protection; where Queen Elizabeth made no attempt to receive them, seeing the Queen of Scots had received Paley, Sandford and Hales, which were fled out of England; but the Earl of Murray especially, who had always been found adverse to the Affiant on the Bench; two Lawyers and a Notary; and the first President made in this place, was Sir William Sel-leger.

And now Queen Elizabeth, in a Progress went to Oxford; where she took pleasure in viewing the Colleges, in hearing Orations, in seeing of Comedies, till the Comedy of Palemon and Arcess turned into a Tragedy; for by the fall of a wall, through the multitude of people that pressed in to see it, three men were slain. At her coming away, she made an Oration to the Scholars, a sufficient remembrance for all the Orations they had made to her. And this year was a call of seven new Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Gray's Inn, in Holborn.

Upon the Queen's return from Oxford, the Parliament began, where they presently fell upon the matter of succession, and moving the Queen to marry; in which points some went so far, that they spared not to accuse the Queen, as one careless of Polity; to desame Cecill with Libels and reproaches, as if he were her Counsellour in this matter; but above all, to curse Doctor Hair, her Physitian, who was thought to divest her from Marriage, by reason of I know not what womanish infidelity. At last in the Upper-House it was agreed, That Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper, their Oractor, should in all their names beseech the Queen to marry: and withall, to declare a Successour in the Crown, if she should happen to die without Issue; for which he gave many Reasons, declaring what mischiefs were likely to befall the Kingdom, if she should die before a Successour were designated. But in the Lower-House there were some, amongst whom were Bell and Mountain, (two Lawyers of great account) Dutton, Sir Paul Wentworth, and others, who grew to far higher terms, disparaging the Queens Authority, and saying That Princes were bound to design a Successour; and that in not doing it, the Queen should flee her self no better than a particle of her Country. The Queen was contented to bear with words spoken in Parliament; which spoken out of Parliament, she would never have endured: but not willing to expolituate the matter with the whole number, She commanded that thirty of the Higher House, and as many of the Lower, should appear before her, to whom She delivered her mind to this effect: That she knew what danger hangeth over a Princes Head, when a Successour is once declared; She knew that even Children themselves, out of a holy desire of bearing Rule, had taken up Arms against their own Fathers, and how could better Conditions be expedited from Kindred? She had by reading observed, That Successours in a collaterall Line have seldom been declared; and that Lewes of Orleance, and Francis of Angoumois, were never declared Successours, and yet obtained the Crown without any noise.

Lastly, she said, Though I have been content to let you debate the matter of Succession, yet I advise you to beware, that you be not injurious to your Princes patience. With these and the like Reasons, she gave so great satisfaction, that they never after troubled her with making any more such motion. And though she contended not in plain terms to declare a Successour, yet soon after She gave some intimation of it: for one horatious, a Reader of the Civil Law in London, who in his Lectures called the Queen of Scots. Right in question, was clapp'd up in Priscon for his labour.

In the beginning of her ninth year, Charles the 9th. King of France, sent his Ambassador Ramhout into England to the Queen, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of Saint Michael, to be bestowed upon which two of her Nobility the pleased; and the making choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, they were by Ramhout invested with them; An Honour that had never been conferred upon any Englishman, but only King Henry the 8th. King Edward the 6th, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, though afterward prostituted almost to any, without difference.

And now to return to the affairs of Scotland: The sixteenth of June last past, the Queen of Scots, in a happy hour, was at Edinburgh Cattle delivered of a Son, that was afterward James the faith of Scotland; and the first Monarch of Great Britain: whereof She pretentiously sent to Queen Elizabeth, by James Melrose: who thereupon sent Sir Henry Kilkenny to congratulate her safe deliverance, and her young Son, whose all demonstration of love and amity. But now the love of the Queen of Scots to her Husband the Lord Darby, was not so hot at first, but it was now grown to be so cold; and she had not heaped honours on him so far before, but now as fast the take them off: for where before in public Acts, she had used to place her Husband name first, now she caus'd it to be placed last, and in the coining of Money began to leave it quite out.

This unkindness between them, was fomented by one David Riske, an Italian, grows a great favourite of the Queen of Scots. The King's son on by his Lords, murdered him. The Queen of Scots is delivered of a Son.

many, that the Queen was conscious of the manner; which was the thing that by marriage they intended: And the suspicion once raised, they seek by all means to increase, that they may have the better colour against her, and to the very same end which had absolv'd Bothwell, and contented to the marriage, now takes Arms against her, as a Delinquent in both; force him to flee, and then seize upon the Queen, whom, clad in a very home-y Garment, they thrust into prison in Lochleven, under the Custody of Murray's Mother, who had been the Harlot of James the Fifth; but her self to have been his lawful Wife, and her Son his lawful Issue. Queen Elizabeth having at length notice thereof, sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland to expostulate with the Confederates, touching this insolent usage of the Queen; and to confult by what means she might be restor'd to her Liberty. But Throgmorton coming into Scotland, found the Confederates in more insolent terms than he had been report'd; being divided in Opinion, what to do with the Queen, some would have her banish'd perpetually into England, and when he came home would have her question'd before the Judges, committed to personal custody, and her Son proclaimed King: Others, more inhumane, who would have her at once depriv'd of Princely Authority, of life and all; and this Knox and some other Ministers thund'red out of the Pulpit. Throgmorton on the other side, all'dged many passages out of the holy Scriptures, touching Obedience to the higher Powers; maintaining, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunal, but that in Heaven; That no Judge upon Earth might call her in question; That there was no Office, nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, which was not deriv'd from her Authority, and revokable at her pleasure. They again opposed the peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland; and that in extraordinary cases, they were to proceed besides order: taking up Buchanan's Arguments, in those days, by inflammation of Murray, and interposing Dialogue, de jure regni apud Scotus, wherein against the Right of the Scottish Hiclike, he endeavours to prove, That the People have power, both to create, and to depose their King. After all their debating, all that Throgmorton could get of them, was a Writing without any subscription, wherein they protest'd, They had not up the Queen for no other intent, but to keep her apart from Bothwell, whom she loved to desparately, that to enjoy him, she regard'd not all their railes; willing himself to rest satisfied with this Answer, till such time as the rest of the Peers met together. And notwithstanding all he could say, they shut up the Queen daily in more strait custody, though with tears she besought them to deal more mildly with her, and to let her but once have a sight of her Son, which would not be grant'd her. At last, when fair perswasions could serve to make her freely give over the Kingdom, they threatened to question her openly for incontinent living, for the Kings Murder, and for Tyranny, to go through fear of death, they compell'd her, unseen, to swear hard to three Instruments: In the first whereof, she gave over her Kingdom to her young Son, at that time scarce thirteen Moneths old. In the second, she con-fituted Murray Vice-Roy during the minority of her Son. In the third, in case he refused the Charge, there Governors were nominat'd; James Duke of Chafeteon, Giles, Spire Earl of Argyle, Matthew Earl of Lenox, John Earl of Adbull, James Earl of Morton, Alexander Earl of Glencairn, and John Earl of More. And presently she signified to Queen Elizabeth by Throg- morton, That she had made these Grants by compulsion through the Council of Throgmorton, tell- ing her, That a Grant extorted from one in Prison (which is a just fear) is actually void, and of no effect.

Five days after the Queen had made this Re-signation, James the sixth, the Queen Son, was Anointed and Crown'd King, John Knox preach-ing at the same time; but a Protestation was then put in by the Hamiltons, That all this ought to be no prejudice to the Duke of Chafeteon Herald, in his right of Succession against the Family of Lenox; but Queen Elizabeth had forbidden Throgmorton to be at the Action, That the might not seem by the presence of her Embassador, to approve their proceeding in displacing the Queen.

Fifteen days after this translation, Murray himself return'd out of France into Scotland, and within three days went to the Queen with some other of the Confederates, who charg'd her with many Crimes, and wish'd her if she tend'd her Life and Honour, to observe these Prescriptions: Not to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, nor desire to be at Liberty; Not to flir up the Queen of England, or the King of France to molest Scotland with any War; nor to think any more of Bothwell's love, or meditate Revenge upon Bothwell's Adversaries.

Murray being now proclaimed Regent of Scotland, he bindeth himself under his Hand and Seal to do nothing which shall concern War or Peace, the Kings Person or his Marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the consent of the Confederates; and then gives Throgmorton warn-ing by Lydston, not to make any further interferences to the Queen's Liberty, for that he and the rest had rather run any hazard than to suffer it. Soon after he put to death John Hepburn, Dagnall, and others that were Bothwell's Servants, for having a hand in the Murther of the King: But they (which he little expected) when they were at the Gallow's, ready to die, protested before God and his holy Angels, that Bothwell had told them, that Morton and Murray were the first Authors of the Murther. They feed the Queen from all suspicion, like as Bothwell himself being Prisoner in Denmark, both living and dying, often protested with deep afflictions, That the Queen was innocent. And fourteen years after, Morton going to Execution, confess'd that Bothwell dealt with him to content to the murther of the King; which, when he refused utterly, unless the Queen under her hand Writing would allow of it, Bothwell made answer, That could not be, but the fact must be done without her know-ledge.

A little before this time, upon one and the same day died two of the Privy-Council, Sir John Majen and Sir Richard Scoukile, and the Queen was innocens. The Queen of Feathers of fear, lest her hand to three Instruments, to her own prejudice.
Exchequer, a man both prudent and provident, and allied to the Queen by her mother Anne Boleyn. In his room succeeded Walter Mildmay, a man of Wisdom and Integrity: In Majeste Office came Sir Francis Knollys, who married Katharine Carie, the Daughter of Mary Boleyn, the Queens Mothers Sister.

It was now the year 1567, and the tenth year of Queen Elizabeth Reign, when the Earl of Stirling came into England from the Emperour Maximian, to Treat of the Marriage of the Queen with the Arch-Duke Charler, upon which very occasion the Queen a little before had sent the Earl of Suffolk to the Emperour, with the Order of the Garter: But in the Treaty of Marriage there fell out to many difficulties about Religion, maintenance of the Duke, about the Royal Title, and concerning Succession, that after it had been treated of seven whole years together, it came at last to nothing, and the Duke not long after married Mary Daughter to Alters the Fifth Duke of Bavaria; yet both he and the Emperour endeavoured to win her after a good correspondence with the Queen.

About this time there came from John Balfour Emperour of Russia and Muscovia, Stephen Tweedies, and Theodore Pogorell, with a Prefent of rich Furs of Otter, Munive, and the like, tending all service and obsequiousness to the Queen and the English. The Merchants by vertue of a Grant from Queen Mary, had combined them selves into a Society, which they called the Muscovia Company; and having large Priviledges granted them from the Emperour, went thither with a Navy yearly, making a very gainful Voyage: but then it proved most gainful, when for the Queens sake they obtained at the Emperour his hands, in the year 1569. That none but the Englise of that Company should Traffique in the North-parts of Russia. With these Russian Em buffadours there returned into England, Anthony Jaffens, who in his Travells made curious Observations of Russia, and wrote for a Geographical Description of it, and was the first of the English that followed through the Caspian Sea; and this year the eighth of June, Sir Thomas Sackville was created Baron of Buckhurst, at Whitehall.

We have seen before the first Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy: Now comes in the second, having been eleven months kept a Prisoner at Laft, by the help of George Douglas, to whose Brother the she was committed, The made escape from Loche-lyon to Hamilton Caffle, where upon the testimonies of Robert Melvyn, and others, in a meeting of a great part of the Nobility, there was drawn a sentence declaratory, That the Grant extorted from the Queen in prison, (which is jusfas mentis) was actually void from the beginning. Upon which Declaration, great multitudes flocked to her, so as within a day or two she had gotten an Army of at least fix thousand but when they came to Borth with Blavray, being but raw and unexpert Soldiers, they were soon defeated. In this Cafe the Queen fought to save her self by flight, journeying in one day threefcore miles, and coming at night to the House of Macdouwell Lord Heryes, from thence she sent John Betson to Queen Elizabeth with a Diamond Ring, which she had formerly received from her, as a Pledge of mutual amity; intimating, that she would come into England, and implore her aid, if her Subjects offered to prosecute her any further. Queen Elizabeth returned an fiver, that she should expect fromm in abundant manner, all loving and friendly Officers.

But before the Meffenger was returned, He, contrary to the advice of her friends, entered into a small Bark, and with the Lords, Heris and Fleming, and a few others landed at Wickinton in Cumberland, near the mouth of the River of Der-

Ave, the seventeenth day of May; and the same day wrote Letters to the Queen in French with her own hand, the effect whereof was, That having made an escape from the hands of her insolent and rebellious Subjects, she was now come into England, upon certain hope of her approved clemency: and therefore humbly defiring, she might forthwith be conducted to her presence. Queen Elizabeth sending Letters by Sir Francis Knollys, comforted her, and promised her aid and defence, according to the equity of her cause; but denied her access, for the matter was held guilty of many Crimes, committing command to have her brought to Carlisle, as a place of better safety. The Queen of Scots receiving this answer, and finding access to the Queen, denied her, making request again by Letter, that she might have leave both to unfold the injuries she had received, and to answer the crimes objected, in her own presence: humbly interreating her, that either she might be admitted to have conference and affiatice, or else have free leave to depart out of England, to gain supply elsewhere, and not to be held a prifoner in the Castle at Carlisle; for as much as she came voluntarily into England, relying upon her love so often professed. Upon these Letters, Queen Elizabeth exceedingly commiserated her case, and could have found in her heart to admit her to her presence, but that her Counsellors conceived it to be matter for consideration, what to do in this Cafe. To detain her in England, had many more occasions to it; to send her into France, as many, to send her back into Scotes, many more; as in conclusion, the most were of Opinion, to have her detained, as one taken by right of War, and not to be disturbed, till she had made satisfaction for assuming the Title of England, and for the death of Darly her Husband, who was born one of the Queens Subjects. In this diversity of Opinions, Queen Elizabeth out of her own Judgment, sent word by Middemores, to the Regent of Scotland, that he should come himself in person; or else depose some fit persons to answer the Complaints of the Queen of Scots against him and his Confederates, and render sufficient Reasons wherefore they had depivred her, otherwise she would forsworn dismiss her, and with all the forces she could, settle her in her Kingdome. To this Summons, Murray obeyed, and comes to York, the place appointed for this Treaty, accompanied with seven more of his intimate friends, who were sent to the Infant King, namely, James Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkney, Rivers of Dunfermu, Patrick Lord of Lynedich, James Mack-gilly, and Henry Balmeray; and with these Lydington the Secretary, and George Buchanan. And the very same day came thither Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Raitt Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Ralph Sacker a Privy Counsellor, appointed Commissioners for Queen Elizabeth. For the Queen of Scots (who took it harmfully, that Queen Elizabeth would not hear the cause her self, but refer her to Subjects, being an absolute Prince, and not tied to their proceedings) there appeared John Leffy Bishop of Roff, William Lord Levingston, Robert Lord Boyes, Queen of Kilmainan, John Gourdon, and James Cechan. Being met, Lydington turning himself to the Scots in a wondrous liberty of Speech, gave them the Prince naturally to consider, what prejudice they should deal against themselves, murdering the Queen of Scots, and calling her Reputation in question publicly before the English professed enemies of the Scottish Nation. Likewise, what account they shall be able to give hereof to the King, when he shall grow to riper years, and shall see what an injury this was to the Kingdome, his Mother, and his own Perfon. Wherefore (said he) it seemeth requisite to forbear this business altogether, unless the Queen of England will enter into a mutual league of Offence and Defence, against all those, which under this presence, shall go about to molest us. Upon this Speech of his, the Delegates of the Queen of Scots made Protestation, That although it pleased the Queen of Scots to have the canie between her and her disloyal Subjects, debated before the English, yet she being a free Prince, and conscious to no earthly Prince whatsoever, did not thereby yield her self subject to the Jurisdiction and command of any person. On the contrary, the English protected, That they did in no wise admit that Protestation, in prejudice to the right which the Kings of England have anciently challenged as superior Lords of the Kingdome of Scotland. The day after, the Queen of Scots Delegates set forth at large the injurious dealing of Morton, Murray, Marre, Glescaurn, Hume, and others against the Queen; and how they had compelled her, for fear of death, to resign her Crown; which therefore (they said) was of no force. Murray and his Confederates make answer, That they had done nothing, but by content of the Peers in Parliament, and that in projecting of Bothwell, the Author of the Kings murder, whom the Queen protected; and as for her renunciation, that it was voluntarily and freely done. All this the Queen of Scots Delegates answered and confirmed, affirming in particular, That there are one hundred Earls, Bishops and Barons, (more or less) that have voices in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in that tumultuous assembly they speak of, above four Earls, one Bishop, an Abbot or two, and six Barons; wherefore their earnest Request was, that the Queen of England should be sensible of these indignities offered her; and take some course for a speedy redress.

After this, some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, to some of whom the Queen of Scots took exception; unless the French and Spanish Embassadors might be taken in, and her self admitted into the presence of the Queen and them, publicly to defend her own innocency; and that Murray might be detained and cited, whom the affirmed, she was able to prove to have been the chief Plotter of the murder of her Husband Darley. This was held to be a just demand by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundel, Suffolk, Leicester, and the Lord Catesby. But Queen Elizabeth waxing somewhat angry, openly said, that the Queen of Scots should never want an Advocate as long as Norfolk lived: It was seen here, which is fast, that the heart of the King is insensible; for how Queen Elizabeth stood affected in this case of the Queen of Scots, no man could well discern; she detested the infidelity of her Subjects in deposing her, and yet gave no assistance to reprove his, and after nothing concluded, Murray a little before his return into Scotland, fully propounded the marriage of the Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest answer rejected as a thing full of danger. But within, Murray the more to alliterate Queen Elizabeth mind from the Queen of Scots, gave out, that she had hasted away to the Duke of Abylly her Right to the Crown of England, and that the transactio was confirmed at Rome; he thowed Letters also which the Queen of Scots had written to some Friends whom the trusted; wherein he accused the Queen for not dealing with her according to promise, and boasting of succours he expected from some others. This last shewed something troubled Queen Elizabeth, neither could the conjecture from whence any such succour should come; seeing both France with the Civil Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low Countries had enough to do at home. But at last it brake out, that one Robert Ridolph a Florentine, under the habit of a Merchant in London, was furnished by Pope Pius the fifth, to make a secret communion of the Papists in England against the Queen, which he performed indeed with a deal of secrecy, and much cunning; whereupon the Queen of Scots was removed from Bolton (a Castle of the Lord Scroop) where all the neighbouring people were Papists; to Tynbore more toward the heart of the Country, under the Custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

About this time the Guises in France, and the Duke D'Alva in the Low-Countreis began to endeavour the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion. In France, the Ministers of the Gospel are commanded within a limited time to depart the Kingdom; when Queen Elizabeth forgetting the fickleness of the Protestants at Newhaven, once again took upon her their protection supplies them with two hundred thousand Crowns in money, besides Munition in abundance, and withal humanity receives the French that fled into England; the rather, for that they made solemn protestation, they took not up Arms against their Prince, but only stood upon their own defence. In the Low-Countreis likewise, the Duke D'Alva breathing nothing but slaughter and blood, made the Dutch come flocking into England, as into a Sanctuary, where with all courtesy they were received.

And here it will be fit to shew how the War in the Low-Countreis began, which was thus: At which time the King of Spain brought in the Spanish Inquisition; a small number of the meanest sort of people, in tumultuous manner, call the Images out of Churches, and break them in pieces; and although that rumour was soon quitted, yet the King of Spain taking advantage at the

... The Earl Murray being returned into Scotland, makes the Lords believe that he designs a meeting at Edinburgh, to consult about restoring the Queen to her Liberty; but as Hamilton Duke of Châlnotte, it happened that the Earl Murray could have been content the Queen should have been set at liberty; but that he knew, her liberty could not be without his favour; and Queen Elizabeth perhaps would willingly have had her restored to her Kingdom, but that she doubted, such restoring would indanger her own security: And thus, while they regarded their own ends in the first place, and hers but in the second, she had the fortune to be pitied, but not the happiness to be relieved; and all the could do her self, was but to tie the knot of her bonds the fatter: if she could have fate fill, they would perhaps have losten of themselves; but now, the more the fird, the more the was intangled.

And now the Definy of the Duke of Norfolk began to work: It was in every ones mouth, that the Duke should marry the Queen of Scots; and it is true, there had been motions made; but the matter not to forward, as the Voice of the People, which commonly prefight what will follow. It had been motioned to the Duke at York, by the Bishop of Roff, and afterward (in presence at least) by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the matter, deliberated with the Earls of Arranfell, Northumberland, Westmorland, Suffolk, Pembroke, Southampton, and Leicester himself, who all judged it fit, he should acquaint the Queen with it first, and then leave the matter to her liking. Within a few days, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton meeting the Duke in the Palace at Westminster, advised him, to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the Match, seeing he had formerly led for it: but if he refused it, then at leaft to take him along with him, for that himself alone would hardly be able to procure the Queens content. A day or two after, the Earl of Leicester propounded the matter to the Duke, and then communicated it to the Earls of Arranfell and Pembroke, to whose Lloyd, together with Throgmorton, wrote the Queen of Scots, commending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband; the Duke himself likewise wrote to her, tending his singular love and respect unto her. Upon this, Articles are drawn, written with Leicester own hand, and sent to the Queen of Scots; to which, if the contented, they then promised to procure, that Queen Elizabeth should give her consent, and that forthwith she should be restored in her Kingdom, and the Secession of England should be confirmed upon her. We may easily believe, the Queen of Scots was not hardly drawn to give content to her own devise; but in the mean time, the Duke had imparted to the Lord Lumley the whole proceeding, and had much ado to get the Earl of Leicester Content that he might advise of it with some other of his Friends; yet a little after, he opened the matter to Cecil; and Articles between them are drawn by Leicester.

The rumour of this Marriage was soon come to the Queens Ears; which the Duke undertook, as he dealt earnestly with the Earl of Leicester, to have the matters propounded to the Queen out of hand. Leicester makes delays, and pretends caufes to put it off; which Cecil seeing, he advices the Duke to go and acquire the

who were now in disgrace; but towards the Queen, professing themselves most dutiful Subjects; with all they send Letters to the Papists all the Kingdom over, requiring them to come to their assistance; but they were so far from joyning with them, that many sent both the Letters and the Bearers of them to the Queen, and afforded their aids and partes against them, no less then the best Protestants; even the Duke of Norfolk himself was not backward in it.

These Rebels go first to Durham, where they tear in pieces all the Bibles and Books of Common-Prayer they could find in Churches of the English Tongue; when they had been twelve days in Rebellion, they numbered their Army, and could not reckon above fix hundred Horse, and four thousand Foot; whereupon being certainly informed, that the Earl of Suffolk with fome thousand, and the Earl of Walmersley with twelve, were setting out against them, they betook themselves to Kebale, the chief House of the Earl of Walmersley; going from thence, they besieged Bernardi Castle, which for lack of Provision, was yielded to them. At which time being proclaimed Trantors, and hearing a fifth of the great Forces that were coming against them, the two Earls with a small Company get preiently into Scotland, had by where the Earl of Northumberland hid himself at Har court in a poor Cottage, amongst the Grayhams (famous Rebsners) who afterwards betrayed him to the Earl of Murray: Walmersley made a shift to get into the Low-Countries, where he had a fleder Rennion from the King of Spain, and there lived even to old age. Of the telt, that terrors and examples take, there were hanged at Durham three time and fix of the chief; amongst whom, Plontree a noted Priest. At York they were executed, Simon Digby, John Enbury, Thomas Bifhops, Robert Penman, and at Leeds, when some years after, Christopher and Thomas, and some other in other places.
After this, the heads of the Rebels being convicted of High-Treason, were proscribed; names ly, Charles Earl of Walmersley, Thomas Earl of Northumberland, Anne Countess of Northumberland, Edward Dares of Morton, John Nevill of Leverfeg, John Swainborn, Thomas Marten-field, Ewinn Raffic, Brother to the Earl of Suffolk, Christopher Nevill, Richard Norton, Christopher Marmaduke, Robert and Michael Tempeft, George Stafford, and forty others of good account. "Out of the ashes of this Rebellion, a new fire was kindled at Newcastle in Commonwealth by Leonard Dares, second Son to the Lord Dares of Gyllifland; He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking forth sooner than he expected, and he at that time being at the Court, and there admitted to kits the Queens hand, rendered his Service to go against the Commons; and to that purpose, was sent forth, but in his Journey (branding himself with a double dishonour) he consulted with the Rebels, and encouraged encouraged them to go on; and by virtue of Letters of Credence from the Queen, he surprised the Castle of Greyflock, and other Hounies of the Dares, and gathered together an Army of three thousand men: But being encountered by the Bri- son of Hunsfod, after a great fight, wherein, though he were crook-backt, he behaved himself valiant- ly, he was put to flight, and fled into Scotland, from whence soon after he paffed over the Low- Countries, and in great misery and poverty died at Louysyn.

But though the Queen were thus intangled with Rebellions at home, yet she was not care- less of the afflicted Protestants in France: for she stirred up the Protestant Princes to defend the common Cause; supplied them with money, taking in pawn the Queen of Navar's Jewels; and gave leave to Henry Champeron to lead into France a Troop of a hundred Horse, Gentlemen all, and Voluntaries, amongst whom were Philip Boteler, Francis Barlow, and Walter Rangleigh, a very young man, who now began to look into the World. But at the Queen of England affifted the French, so in revenge thereof, the King of France meant to affift the Scots, but that he was taken away by death.

There was at that time a Rebellion in Ireland also, raised by Edmund and Peter, Brothers to Border Earl of Ormond; but after many outrages by them committed, the Earl of Ormond first by per- vations, obtained of them to submit them- selves; and when notwithstanding they were committed to prison, he then obtained of the Queen they should not be called to the Bar, be- ing exceedingly grieved that any of his Blood should be attainted of Rebellion. The rest of Rebels were pursu'd by Sir Humphry Gilbert, and soon diered.

And now the Earl of Murray, Regent of Scot- land, when he had brought all things to his hearts d-ice, and thought himself secure, at Lunatick for his treason, was taken into the belly with a Bullet, beneath the Navil, and there fell down dead. The Actor was a Hamilton, who did it upon a private revenge, for that Murray had forced him to part with a piece of Land which he had by his Wife; who thereupon falling Lanatick, he in a great rage committed this slaughter.

After Murray's death, the Countrey being without a Regent, was cauf'd of many disorders, Thomas Care and Walter Sen, two principal men amongst the Scottish Borders, and devote to the Queen of Scots, made Inroads into England, waiving all places with Fire and Sword, till by Forces sent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Suffet, and the Lord Hunsfon, they were defeated: In whose pursuit, three hundred Villages were fired, and above fifty Hides were overturned. For which service the Earl made many Knights in his Service, to Drury, Sir Thomas Adgener, Sir George Care, Sir Rakers Confoable, and others, and then returned. And now to prevent further disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to assemble about the election of a new Regent, they asked Council of Queen Eliz- abeth in the matter; but the making anser he would not meddle in, because the would not be thought to work any thing prejudicial to the Queen of Scots, whose case was not yet tried, they created Matthew Earl of Lenox Regent in place, which Queen Elizabeth did the better like, as conceiving he could not choose out of natural affection, but have a special care of the young King, being his Grand-child.

But while Queen Elizabeth favored the Kings Party in Scotland, the Earl of Huntley, the Duke of Caftle-Heralds, and the Earl of Argyle, (the Queen of Scots Lieutenants) employ the Lord Seton to the Duke D' Alva, requiring him for many great Reasons, to vindicate the Queen of Scots at liberty, and her Affiduous.
Lords of the Queen of Scots Party continuing to protect the English Rebels, the Earl of Suffolk once again, accompanied with the Lord Scroop, entered Scotland, burned the Villages all along the Valley of Anandale, and compelled the Duke of Cawley-Herald, and the Earls of Huntlie and Argyll, under a Writing signed with their own Hands and Seals, to forçage the English Rebels. Whereupon the Earl of Suffolk returning home, made these Knights, Edward Hasting[es], Francis Raffell, Valentine Brown, William Hilton, Robert Step[le]ton, Henry Careen, and Simon M'Dravse.

Queen Elizabeth's mind being now in great suspicione, by reason of that Ball from Rome, and the late conspiracie, in Norfolk, sent Sir William Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scots, who was then at Chatsworth in Derbyshire, to confer with her by what means the search in Scotland was, and what she made of her, the re-involved in her former dignity, and her Son and Queen Elizabeth might be secured. The Queen of Scots did little deplore her own afflicted condition, putting herself wholly upon the Queens elemonie, when the Commissioners made unto her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, that the Treaty of Edinborough should be confirmed; Then, that she should renounce her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeth's life, or any Children of her Body lawfully begotten; Then, that she should send her Son for a Hostage into England, with other six Hostages, such as the Queen should nominate: Then, that the Caftles of Hume and East-coffe, should be held by the English for three years; with some other. To which Propositions the Queen of Scots for the present gave a provident answer; but referred the full Answer to the Bishop of Roff, her Ambassadors in England, and her Council in Scotland; what he made of all, some of the Propositions, and not allowing others, the Treaty came to nothing.—but the matter reëd in the State it was before.

At this time Philip King of Spain had con- trasted a Marriage with Anne of Austria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximili, his own Nece of by his Sifter; who was now setting Sail from Zeland, towards Spain; when Queen Elizabeth, to testify her love and respect to the House of Austria, sent Sir Charles Howard with the Navy-Royal, to conduct her through the Britifh Sea.

And now was the twelfth year of Queen Elizabeth Reign finishe[d], and some of the most important Acts he made Papists believe should be her la[t] but contrary, as if it were but her first, a new Caftell began, of celebrating the seventeenth day of Novem-[ber] (the Anniversary day of her Reign,) with ringing of Bells, Tiltings and Bonfires: which Caftell, as it now began, so it was never given over as long as the real was, and is not yet forborn long after her death.

At this time in Ireland, Conneghier O Brien, Earl of Thomond, not brooking the severe Go- vernment of Edward Pifton, President of Conneghier, entered into Cofultation with some few, to raise a new Rebellion; which, being at the point ready to break forth, was strangely discovered: for the day before they meant to take up Arms, Pifton knowing not at all of the matter, sent the Ead word in friendly manner, that the next day he and a few friends with him would be his Gue[sts]. The Earl convinced by his own Con- Science, imagined that his Intentions were rev- ealed; that Pifton would come as an Enemy, rather than a Guest. Out of which fear, he pre- Pentially sat fay into France; where repeating him seriously of his faults, he confedted the whole buffen to Norris the Queens Embassador in France; and by his intercession, was afterward pardoncd and restored.

In January, the thirteenth year of her Reign, Queen Elizabeth in Royal pomp entering the City of London, went to see the Battle where Sir Tho- mas Grahame had lately built for the use of the Merchants; and with found of Trumpets, and the voice of a Herald solemnly named it the Royal Exchange. A few days after, for his many great Services, he made Sir William Cecil Baron Burghley.

There were now about the Scottish affairs, in the name of the King of Scots, the Earl of Mar- ton, Pernare Abbott of Dumfermin, and James Mac-Gray; whom when Queen Elizabeth re- quired to know more clearly, for what causes they had depofed the Queen; they exhibited a long and tedious Commentary; wherein, with a cer- tain infolent liberty, they endeavored to prove, by the ancient Right of the Kingdom of Scotland that the people of Scotland were above the King, and urged Catholic Authority also; That Popular Magistrates are continued for the moderacion of the licentioseis of Princes: that it is law- ful for them, both to impress Kings; and upon just causes, to depose them. This Writing the Queen could not read without indignation; but to the Delegates, she gave this Answer; She saw no just cause yet, why they should handle the Queen in such manner; and therefore wished them to think upon some cause out of hand, how to allay the discontents in Scotland. Hereupon in Sir Nicholas Bacon house, Keeper of the Great Seal, a Proposition was made to the Bishop of Ro[s], the Bishop of Goway, and Baron Creving- fon, Delegates for the Queen of Scots, that for the security of the Kingdom, and the Queen of England; it was requisite, that before the Queen of Scots should be set at liberty, the Duke of Cawley-Herald, the Earl of Huntlie and Argyll, the Lords Hume, Herin, and another of the Bar- rons should be delivered for Hostages, and the Caftles of Dumbriton and Humes, yielded up into the hands of the English for three years. But they made answer, this to yield up great Perish- ages, and such Fortifications as were demanded, were nothing else; but to leave the miserable Queen utterly destitute of faithful friends, and naked of all places, fit for guard and defence: yet they offered, to give two Earls and two Bar- rons for Hostages, till two years was expired: which not being accepted, they at last abandon- there ther, and spake it openly; That now they plainly perceived the English meant to keep the Queen of Scots perpetually prisoner, and likewise to break off the Treaty; seeing they rigorously demanded such security as Scotland was not able to make good. And now Queen Elizabeth seeing that nothing could be done for her own, the King and Queen of Scots safety, unless both Factions in Scotland confented, she held it fit that that the Lords of Scotland should themselves appoint some chosen persons to compound the matter.

While matters in England proceeded in this fort, the Queens Party in Scotland was hardly used: Dambriam Fryth, the trusty Castile in Scotland was taken: and J. Hamilton Archibishop of Saint Andrews, the Duke of Cofle-Herolds Brother, as an accessary to the mutther of Daries, was hanged without being arraigned according to Law. In England, the Queen of Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten only, and a Priet to say Maffe: with which indignities the Queen of Scots provoked, causeth a large Commentary of her Councils, with certain love Letters to the Duke of Nofolk, to be carried to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolphus, which being brought first to the Duke, Higford (one that waited on the Duke in his Bed-chamber) had copied out: but being commanded to burn them, he hid them under a Mat in the Dukes Bed-chamber: and that (if it should seem) purposely, Ridolphus to draw on the Duke to be head of the discontented Party in England, aggrandized to him the wrongs he had suffered: how against all Law he had been kept a long time in prison, and now, to his great disgrace, was not summoned to the Parliament: he exhibith in this a Catalogue of such of the Nobility, who had vowed to assist him: he shewed how the Pope (so the Catholick Religion might be promoted) would himself undergo all the charge of the War, and had already laid down an hundred thousand Crowns: whereof himself had distributed twelve thousand amongst the English that were fled: he promised, that the King of Spain would lend four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to his Assistance: to these Reasons the Bishop of Rothes added, that it was an easy matter for him to surprize the Queen; whom, when he had in his hands, he might set the Queen of Scots at liberty, and might easily obtain of Queen Elizabeth, a toleration of Religion. The former Reasons took some what with the Duke, but this point of surprizing the Queen, he abhorred, as an impious Fact, and therefore rejected as pernicious and dangerous.

In France, a little before this, was the Marriage solemnized between Charles the Ninth King of France, and Elizabeth of Austria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximilian; in gratulation whereof, Queen Elizabeth sent into France, Thomas Lord Buckhurst, who with great magnificence was received, and perhaps in relation, in regard of a motion now intended to be made: for the Lord Buckhurst having in his Retinue, one Gondio Cavalcante, a Noble man of Florence, the Queen-mother of France, as being a Florence her self, had often conference with him, when the would many times say, What a happiness it would be to both the Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England, and her Son Henry Duke of Albany; and at last defir'd him to command the motion to the Queen of England, both from her, and from her Son the King of France, as a thing they both exceedingly desired. The Lord Buckhurst returned, having for a present from the King of France a Chain weighing a thousand French Crowns, and Cavalcante at his return made the motion to the Queen, who seemed not unwilling to hearken to it; for by this Match, there should be added to the Kingdom of England the Argill and the Dukedoms of Albany, Burkert, Arent, and in particular, by the Kingdom of France it self. Hereupon a Treaty was held, in which the French propounded three Articles, one concerning the Coronation of the Duke, another, concerning the Joint Administration of the Kingdom; a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion: to which it was answered, That the two first Articles might in some fort be composed, but the third, scarce possibly; for though a contrary Religion might be tolerated between Subjects of the same Kingdom; yet between a wife and her Husband it seemed very incongruous and inconvenient: Yet the matter at last came to this conclusion, That if the Duke would afford his presence with the Queen at Divine Service, and not refuse to hear and learn the Doctrine of the Church of England; he should not be compelled to use the English Rites, but at his pleasure use the Roman; not being expressly against the Word of God. But upon these Fundiments they could not accord; and so the Treaty, after it had continued almost a year, brake utterly off. It was indeed generally thought, that the March was never really intended on either side, but that they both pretended a liking, as a step towards their own ends: for the Earl of Leicester (who knew the Queens mind than any man) wrote at this time to Sir Francis Walsingham, the Queens Embassador in France, that he found the Queens inclination to cold in the matter, that though the point of Religion were fully accorded; yet she would find one point or other to break it off.

At this time the continuance of the Duke of Norfolk's affection to the Queen of Scots, came to be discovered by a Packet of Letters, sent by Ridolphus to the Bishop of Rothes and by Bayly's confession (who brought the Letters) being sent upon the Rack: so that the Bishop of Rothes was confined to the Isle of Ely; Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Roifon, were cast into the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had an aspiring mind to be Archbishop, was committed to the Archbishop of Canterbury's keeping. At the same time the Queen of Scots sent money to her Confederates in Scotland; which being by Higford delivered to one Brown to carry, and told it was Silver, when he found by the weight that it was Gold, he began to suspect something; and thereupon went and delivered both the money and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this, Higford being examined, confessed the whole matter; and withall gave notice of that Commentary also of the Queen of Scots, which is mentioned before; two days after, the Duke himself being examined, and knowing nothing what his Servants had confessed, denied every particular; and thereupon was brought again to the Tower, by Ralph Sadler, Thomas Smith, Henry Nevil, and Doctor Wilton: And after him Bennet, who was the Dukes Counsell at Law: The Earl of Arundell and Southampton; the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, Henry Percy, London, Pelony, Goodyer, and others, are committed to Prison; who, upon hope of Pardon, confessed all they knew concerning the matter. When these things, and especially the Commentary, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

First, Whether an Ambashiador who raiseth Rebellion against that Prince to whom he is an Ambashiador, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambashiador, and is liable to Punishment? They answered, That such an Ambashiador hath forfeited the Priviledges of an Ambashiador, and is liable to punishment.

Secondly, Whether the Minister or Preator of a Prince, who is deputed by public Authority, and in whose room another is inaugurated, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambashiador? They answered, That if such a Prince be lawfully deposed, his Preator cannot challenge the Priviledges of an Ambashiador, forasmuch as none but absolute Princes, and such as have Right of Majesty, can appoint Ambashiadors.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince who is come into another Prince's Country, and held in Custody, may have his Preator, and if he shall be held an Ambashiador? They answered, If such a Prince have not left his Sovereignty, he may have his Preator; but whether that Preator shall be reputed as an Ambashiador or no, this dependeth upon the Authority of his Delegation.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince gave morning to such a Preator, and to his Prince who is under custody that this Preator shall not from henceforth be accounted for an Ambashiador; whether that Preator may by Law challenge the Priviledges of an Ambashiador?

They answered, A Prince may forbid an Ambashiador to enter into his Kingdom, and command him to depart the Kingdom, if he contain not himself within his臣 limits; yet in the mean while he is to enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambashiador.

Upon these Answers, the Bishop of Roffe is warned by the Lords of the Council, that he shall no longer be effectually an Ambashiador, but be punished as his fault shall deserve. The Bishop alleged for himself, that he had not violated the Right of an Ambashiador Via Jus, but Via Falsi (to use his own words) and therefore advieth them, not to use harder measure to him than was used to the English Ambashiadors; belonged not to the Queen England, but was the King of Spain from that subject; it is nevertheless condemned by the Form of Niplit dict (for so much as no man can renounce the Country wherein he was born, nor abjure his Prince at his own pleasure) and finally executed after the manner of Traytose.

Ireland at this time was indifferent quiet; for John Perce, President of Munster, had brought James Fitz Morris to submit himself, and crave pardon. Lord Oglethorpe returned into England, and Sir William Fitz Williams, who had married his Siter, succeeded in his room.

It was now the fifteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign; when Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, on the sixteenth day of January, was brought to his Tryal at Westminster-Hall; where sate as Commissioners, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury (made high Steward of England for that day) Beauclergy Earl of Kent; Thomas Ratcliffe Earl of Suffolk; Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington; Francis Kefcl Earl of Bedford; Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke; Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford; Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwicke; Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester; Walter Devereux Viscount of Hertford; Edward Lord Clinton, Admira; William Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain; William Cecil Lord Burley, Secretary; Arthur, Lord Gray of Wintoun; James Blouf Lord Montjoy, William Lord Sand, Thomas Lord Wentworth, William Lord Berrow, Sir Walter Leyborne. Lord Paulten Lord St. John of Basing, Robert Lord Rich, Lord North; Edmund Bridges Lord Chandos, Oliver Lord St. John of Bifho, Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhough, and William Brayf Lord de la Warte. After silence bidden, Sir Owen Heston, Lieutenant of the Tower, was commanded to bring the Duke to the Bar; and then the Clerk of the Crown said, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, late of Kneppels in the County of Norfolk, Hold up thine hand; which done, the Clerk with a loud Voice readeth the Crimes laid to his Charge; That in the eleventh year of the Queens Reign, he had traytously consulted to make her away, and to bring in foreign Forces for invading the Kingdom; Also, That he dealt with the Queen of Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his promise made to the Queen under his hand-writing: Also, That he believed with the Earl of Northumberlaid and Westumberlaid, that had hurled up Rebellion against the Queen; Also, That in the 13th year of the Queens Reign, he implored Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius the Fifth, the Queens professed Enemy, of the King of Spain, and the Duke D' Alva, for the freeing of the Queen of Scots, and restoring of the Popish Religion: And lastly, That he sent supply to the Lord Heri, and other the Queens Enemies in Scotland.

These Indictments being read, the Clerk demanded of the Duke, if he were guilty of these Crimes, or not? Here the Duke requested he might be allowed to have Counsell. But Catherine chief Justice, made anfwer, That it was not lawful. Yet (fai the Duke) I have heard that Humphrey Stafford, in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, in a Cafe of Treafon, had one affidged to plead for him. To which Dyre chief Justice of the Common Pleas, made anfwer, That Stafford had Council affigned him concerning the Right of Sanctuary, from whence he was taken by force; but in the Indictment of Treafon, he pleaded his own caufe. After this, the Duke yielding to be tried by the Peers; first Barbon, Serjeant at Law, then Gerard the Queens Attorney; and lastly, Bromley, the Queens Solicitor, enforced the Crimes objected against him to all which, the Duke made colourable anfwer; but most of them being proved by sufficient evidence, he asked upon occasion. Whether the Subjects of another Prince, who is confederate, and in league with the Queen, are to be accounted Enemies to which Catherine anfwered, They were; and that the Queen of England might wage War with any Duke of France, and yet hold firm peace with the French King. When it grew towards night, the Lord High Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any more to say for himself, who anfwered, I rely upon the equity of the Laws. After this, the Lords withdrawing a white, and then returning, the Lord Steward beginning at the lowest, asked them, My Lord de la Ware, Is Thomas Duke of Norfolk guilty of thefe Crimes of High Treafon, for which he is called in question? He rising up, and laying his hand upon his breef, anfwered, Guilty: in like manner they answered all. After this, the Lord Steward with tears in his eyes, pronounced sentence in form as is used. A few days after were Barnes and Malher executed, who confcripted with one Heri, to make away certain of the Counfellors, and to free the Duke; but Heri revealed the business privately, to whom Barnes (when he saw his Accuser brought forth) himself, said, Heri, thou went but one hour before me, elfe I had been in thy place for the Accuser, and thou in my room to be hanged: At the same time with them was hanged also Henry Ruff, for counterfeiting the Queens hand. But though the Duke were now condemned, yet the Queen was so tender of his cafe, that it was four moneths after before he was executed; at last, on the second of June, at eight of the Clock in the morning, he was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower-Hill, and there beheaded.

At this time, and upon this occasion, a Parliament was Assembled, wherein amongst other Laws, it was Enacted, That if any man should go about to free any person imprisoned by the Queens Commandment, for Treafon or suspicion of Treafon, and not yet Arraigned, he shall lose all his Goods for his life-time; and he imprisoned during the Queens pleasure; if the faid person having been Arraigned, the Refcuere shall forfeit his life; it condemned, he shall be guilty of Rebellion.

In the time of this Parliament, the Queen created Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, being before created Earl of Essex, and of age, and by what Queen Elizabeth's friends the Lord de la Warr, and others, to the Queen, to charge her with many crimes, and what she answered.

The Queen's Solicitors, were sent to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her. That she had usurped the title and arms of the Kingdom of England, and had not renounced the same, according to the agreement of the Treaty at Edinburgh: That she had endeavoured the marriage of the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the Queen, and had had all forcible means to free him out of prison; had raised the Rebellion in the North, had relieved the Rebels both in Scotland, and in the Low-Countries; had implored aids from the Pope, the King of Spain, and others; had confpired with certain of the English, to free her out of prison, and declare her Queen of England; Lastly, That she had procured the Popes Bull against the Queen, and suffered her to be publicly named the Queen of England in Foreign Countries: All which accusations the Queen neither absolutely denied, or else freely extenuated: and though (as she said) she were a free Queen, and not subject to any Cicerate; yet she was content, and requested, that she might make her personal answer at the next Parliament.

About this time, the King of Spain by his Embassador here, complained to the Queen, that the Rebels of the Netherlands were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the Articles of the League; whereupon the Queen forsook a severe Proclamation, That all the Dutch, who could any wayes be suspected of Rebellion, should presently depart the Realm, which yet turned little to D' Aube's, or the King of Spain's benefit; For herupon, Count Vander-Mark, and other Dutch going out England, surprized the Brill, first, then Flemish, and afterwards drove other Towns to revolt, and in a short time excepted the Duke D' Aube in a manner from the Sea. And this error, to suffer the Protestant Party to get possession of the Sea-Towns, hath been the cause they have been able to hold out, even all this long time, against the King of Spain. And now many Military men having little to do at home, got them into the Netherlands, some to Duke D' Aube; but the far greater number to the Prince of Orange: The first of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried three hundred English to Flemish; then followed by his procurement nine Companies more under the conduct of Humphrey Gilbert; and afterward he became the Naurer of all our English Souldiers.

At this time Charles the French King setting his mind wholly (at least seeming so) upon the Low-Country War, concluded a peace, entered into a League with Queen Elisabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their two lives, but between their Successors also, if the Successor dignifie the Survivor within a year, that he accepteth, otherwise to be at liberty. It was likewise agreed, what aid by Sea or Land, they should each of them afford to other upon occasion. And for ratification of this League; Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln and Admiral of England, was sent into France, with whom went the Lords Dacre, Rich, Talbot, Sandys, and others.

The French King likewise sent the Duke of Montmorency and Paul Fauz into England, with a great Train; that the Queen in the presence of them, and the Embassador in Ordinary, might.

Great pretences for the marriage of Henry, Prince of Navarre, with the French Kings Sister, At which marriage was made.
France was wonderful importunation, that her Son Alfonso might have leave to come to see her: whereunto, being wearied with continual Letters and Meffages, she gave her content; but upon condition, that he should not take it for any disgrace to him, if he returned without obtaining his Suit; But as soon as Queen Elizabeth had notice, that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was very fick, she gave intimation to Alfonso, by Edward Hessey Governor of the Isle of Wight, that he should not make too much haste into England but that he procure Peace by some means or other in France, and declared by some notable Argument, his good will towards the Protestant thereby to be the more welcome Guelf into England. Hereupon a Peace was concluded in France; and in certain places the Protestants were allowed to exercise their Religion; and then again the French King and the Queen-Mo-ter used all their endeavours to have the Marriage Go forward (for they were very dextrous that Alfonso who was of a crooked and perverse disposition, and prone to raise tumults) might be removed out of France; and withall, they requested of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Alfonso took his Voyage into Poland by Sea; he might have publick caution to fail through the Britifh Ocean. To this lift Request, the not onely contented with all alacrity, but also made offer of a Fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while, Alfonso fell sick of the Meazels, which his Mo-ter signified to Queen Elizabeth by Count Fleets, executing him thereupon for not coming into England as he had determined. Trote de Cource found the Queen at Canterbury, where she gave him Royal entertainment; and Matthew Par-erk Archbishop of Canterbury, Royal entertainment to them both.

All this while, since the death of the Earl of Mortimer, there had been no Regent in Scotland: but now by the procurement of Queen Elizabeth chiefly, James Douglas Earl of Morton is made Regent; who, when his Authority in a Parliamentary Assembly was established, Enacted many profitable Laws for the defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the name of the King; But the protection and keeping of the Kings Person, he continued to Alexander Erse, kin Earl of Moray (to whom the custody of the Kings in their tender years, by special privilege belongeth) though he were himself in his Ministry: Upon these Conditions, That no Papists, or favourab Ster persons should be admitted to his preference. An Earl should come with only two Servants attending him: A Baron, with only one:
All other, finge; and every one unran-ed. The French King in the mean time, sent his Embaffidour Monfieur Fyrian to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley, with large promi"ses, to oppose the Regent; Queen Elizabeth as much labour'd to defend him: but though by the Ministry of Kiligren, she had drawn James Hamilton Duke of Caflie-Herald and George Gordon Earl of Huntley, and the most emitent of that Faction, upon indifferent conditions, to acknowledge the Regent, yet William Kirkald, Lord Orange, (whom Murray when he was Regent had madeGovernor of Edinbrough Ca-flie) the Lord Humes, Lydington, the Bishop of Dunkeld.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth

Dunkeld, and others, would by no means admit of the Regent's Government, but held that Castlereagh, and fortified it in the Queen of Scots name, having Lydington for their Councillor herein, and truf ting to the natural strength of the place, and to the Duke of A"vus and the French Kings promises, to fend them supplies both of men and money. Now when these persons could by no means be drawn to accept of Conditions of Peace, and to deliver up the Caffe to the Regent, Queen Elizabeth (who could in no cafe indite the French in Scotland) suffered her self at length to be intertated by the Regent, to fend Forces, Guns and Ammunition, for assaulting the Caffe, upon certain Conditions, whereof one was, that ten Holfages should be sent into England, to be security for returning the Men and Ammunition, unless by the common hazard of War they should chance to miscarry. The Conditions being agreed on; William Drury Marshal of the Garrison at Barnwik, with some great Ordnance, and fifteen hundred Souldiers (among who were some Nobles and Peers, George Cariis, Henry Carter, Thomas Cecil, Henry Lee, William Knolles, Sutton, Cotton, Kelway, William Killigrew, and others, entered into Scotland, and besieged the Caffe, which after three and thirty days siege, was delivered up to the Regent for the Kings life, with all the peronels that were in it; amongst whom, Kircald Lord Grange, and James his Brother, Mufman and Cook Goldsmiths (who had counterfeited Cofyn in the Caffe) were hanged; although to redeem Granges life, a hundred of the Family of the Kircalds offered themselues to be in perpetual Servitude to the Regent, besides an annual Penion of three thou- sand Marks; and twenty thousand pounds of Sec- rifice money in present; and to put in caution, that from themc welth he should continue in duty and homage to the King; but it would not be accepted. Homes and the rest were spared, though Queen Elizabeth's merciful intercession; Lyding- ton was sent to Leith, where he died, and was suspected to be poisoned. A man of the greatest understanding in the Scotish Nation, and admired of an excellent wit, but very variable; for which, George Buchanan called him the Chamelion.

And now from this time Scotland began to breath, after long Civil Wars, and as well the Captains of both Parties, as the Souldiers, betook themselves into Sweden, France, and the Low-Countries, where they valorously behaved themselves, and won great commendation. As for John Lesly Bishop of Rofe, he was now set at liberty, but commanded to depart presently out of England, and being beyond the Sea, he con- tinued fall to solicit his Miftrels the Queen of Scots caufe, with the Emperour, the Pope, the French King, and the German Princes of the Poffith Religion; who all led him on with fair prom- 1ises, but performed nothing: For indeed, he in whom he had greatest confidence, which was the Duke of D' Avo, was at that time called away, partly out of Jealousie of State, as being thought to grow too great, and partly out of opinion, that by his cruelty he made the people to re- volt; and therefore in his place was sent Lod- crine Zwing, a man of great Nobility in Spain, but of a more peaceable disposition than D' Avo; and now this man did all good Offices to win Queen Elizabeth to him, and minding his own affairs only, would not interfere with the Scotish or English matters.

About this time, a frantick Opinion was held by one Peter Bourcher a Gentleman of the Middle Temple, that it was lawful to kill them that oppo- sed the truth of the Gospel; & so far was he poffeft with this opinion, that he assaulted the famous Seaman Captain Hawkins, and wounded him with a Dagger; taking him for Hutton, who at that time was in great favour with the Queen, and of her Privy Council, whom he had been informed to be a great Adversary to Innovations. The Queen grew so angry hereat, that She commanded Martial Law should be executed upon him presently, till her Council advised her, that Martial Law was not to be used, but in the Field, and in turbulent times; but at home, and in time of Peace, there must be legal proceedings: Hereupon Bourcher was sent to the Tower, where taking a brand out of the fire, he stuck it into the brains of one of his Keepers, named Hugh Longworth, and killed him; for which fact, he was condempned to death, being cut in pieces, and his head thrown out, and nailed to the Gallowes, and then himself hanged.

After the violent death of this Valient, we may speak of the natural death of two great personages: First, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Son of that Warlike Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by his second Wife Agnes Tilney, This William was made a Baron by Queen Mary, and Lord High Admiral of England, and by Queen Elizabeth Lord Chamberlain, till such time, that being taken with age, he yielded up that place to the Earl of Sussex, and was then made Keeper of the Privy Seal, which is the fourth degree of Honour in England. His Son Charles succeed- ed him in the Dignity of his Baron alloys, who was after made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, and then Lord High Admiral of England. A while after he had diered Reginald Grey Earl of Kent, whom the Queen a year before of a private man had made Earl of Kent, when as that Title, from the death of Sir John Grey Earl of Kent, who had wafted his Patrimony, and was elder Brother to this man Grand-Father, had been alive for fifty years together.

At this time many particular Rebellion were in Ireland; the O'Conors and the O'Mores took Arms, and committed many outrages: In Mun- hery James Fitz-Morris, and Fitz-Edmund did the like; but by the industry of Sir John Perrot, President of Munster, were suppried. In Riffier, Bryan Mac Philips burnt Knockfergus, and many other joined in Rebellion with him. Against thefe, Walter Devereux (whom the Queen had lately created Earl of Effex) defir'd leave to go; which Sir William Fitz-Williams, Deputy of Ire- land oppoied, as fearing that the glory of so great an Earl would eclipse his light. But for this, the Queen finds a remedy, by appointing Effex to take a Patent of the Deputy, whereby to be made Governor of Riffier. But this remedy for Fitz-Williams might have made a fore in the mind of Effex (to receive his Author- ity from his inferior) but that the Nobles of his mind made him more to regard the Vacuum, than the Glory. And so, in the end of August; he landed to Knockfergus, having with him the Lords Darcy and Rich, and Sir Henry Knolles; and

The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

As soon as Henry the Third, King of France, was come from Poland, Roger Lord North was sent into France, to congratulate his return, and happy Inauguration into the Kingdom; who thereupon together with the Queen-Mother, did forthwith send their joint Letters into England, strongly soliciting the subjects of Marriage between Alfonso and the Queen. In these letters, notwithstanding they used all possible devices (and left no means untried) to get the young King of Scotland to be sent into France, and to derive Agnes, who was the Regent, of his Authority, whereof the Queen of Scots also was desirous; she being persuaded, that if her Son were once gotten safely into France, she and the Catholics in England should be more mildly used. At which time, an abortion was cast upon the Queen of Scots, as if she had made the match between Charles Uncle to the Queen of Scots (who had lately the Earldom of Lenox confirmed to him by Parliament) and Elizabeth Countess the Countess of Shrewsbury. Daughter by a former Husband, upon which ground, both their Mothers, and some others also were kept in prison, for a time; and being doubted whereunto this marriage should tend; Henry Earl of Huntington, President of the Council in the North, is authorized with secret Instructions to examine it. It will be fit here to say something of this place of Government in the North; which from small beginnings is now become so eminent as it is at this day; whereas this was the Original. When as in the Reign of Henry the Eight, after that the Rebellion in the Northern parts about the abjuration of Ab- bies was quieted, the Duke of Norfolk tardied in those quarters, and many complaints of injuries done were tendered unto him, whereof some he complained himself, and others he commended unto him, and meant to move for his correction. Hereof when King Henry heard, he sent down a peculiar Seel to be used in these cases, and calling home the Duke, committed the same to Tunstail Bishop of Durham, and constituted Affiliants with Authority to hear and determine the complaints of the Poor, and he was the first that was called President; and from that time, the authority of his successor grew in credit.

It was now the year One thousand five hundred seventy five, and the eighteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Henry the third King of France being returned from Poland, and Crowned at Rheims, was careful to have the League of Bibles confirmed; which in the year 1573, had been concluded between his brother Charles and the most Illustrious Queen Elizabeth; now therefore he confirmed it with his own Subscription, and delivered it to Dale the Queens Legier, as the Queen pleased not to take it in evil part. If the bands of a Minister; But a little after he demanded by Letters, whether the mutual defence against all persons mentioned in the League, was intended to comprehend the case of Religion also? Whereunto he answered, that it did comprehend it; he thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began presently to prepare War against the Protestants, and Alfonso being drawn to the Adverse party, there was no speech of the marriage for a long time.

In the Netherlands at this time, Lodovick Zwing, who as successor unto Duke D'Alva, was wholly bent to recover the Command of the Seas, which D'Alva had neglected; but not being sufficiently provided of a Navy, he sent Boshoot into England, that with the Queens leave, he might take up Ships and Mariners to go against the Hollanders and Zelnders; but this he would not grant; Then he made fast that the Queen would peace likewise ratified it; that he near next Minister; But a little after he demanded by Letters, whether the mutual defence against all persons mentioned in the League, was intended to comprehend the case of Religion also? Whereunto he answered, that it did comprehend it; he thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began presently to prepare War against the Protestants, and Alfonso being drawn to the Adverse party, there was no speech of the marriage for a long time.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth

Laws of Hospitality; yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burghian Law, the commanded by Proclamation, that the Ships of the Dutch, which were made ready, should not go forth of the Haven, nor yet the Dutch, who had taken up Arms against the K. of Spain, enter into the Ports of England; & by Name, the Prince of Orange, and Fifty other the prime of that Faction; and this he did the more willingly, because Zuinga at the interception of Wilfon the English Embassador, had removed the Earl of Westmiflrand, and other En-gh's Fugitives out of the Domains of the King; the Low States, and had also dissolved the English Seminary at Duny; though in stead thereof, the Garfrom the procuring of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, set up another Seminary at Rheims.

And at this time the Prince of Orange, percieving his Forces but small, and thinking himself too weak for the King of Spain, and little hope of aid from England, he entered into Consultawith the Confederate States, to whose protection they were bound, and in the most secrecy to betake themselves: The Princes of Germany they knew were not all of one mind, parted from money very hardly, and did not every way, nor would not by any means possible accord and concun with them in their Religion; and therefore they were not so fit. Then the French they saw, were intangled in a Civil War, and had enough of their own do to; besides the old grudges and heart-burnings that were between the French and Dutch; and therefore neither were they fit for it. The English, as fit for any (if it might be obtained) feeling they were Neighbours, of the same Re-igion, and of a Language not much different, strong in shipping, and rich in Merchandize.
Hereupon (considering the commodiousness of the English Nation) they sent into England Philipip Marnixe of Saint Alechand, James Dowfay, william Noyell, and Doctor Mefller, who in an honestable Ambaffege, offer the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be peacefull or protected by the Queen, forasmuch as she was descended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa Wife of Edward the third, Daughter of William of Baratries, Count of Henonia and Holland: by whose Sifer, the Hereditary Right of those Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this offer, the Queen takes time to answer; and at laft, havoring mure advisedly of the matter, her Answer was this: That as yet the conceived not how with the fifty of her Hoards and an upper Concurrence, she could receive those Princes into her Protection, much less assume them into her possession; but promised, she would deal esserely with the King of Spain, that a well con-tioned Peace might be concluded. Presently upon this, Zuinga Governor of the Low-Countries died; after whose death, the States of Brabant, Flandes, and the other Provinces took upon them the ancient Administration and Authority in the Common-wealth; which the King of Spain was thin to confirm to them, till at length as John of Austria were come, whom he determined to make Governor there. In the mean time, Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the King of Spain, sent William Davifon in Ambaffege to those Princes, to exhort them to be peaceable and and quiet; which yet, by reason the Spanish Souldiers were so outrageous, little prevailed.

In England all was calm and quiet for all this year, onely a difference fell out between Sir John Porter Governor of Berwick, and John Cormichill Keeper of Edifdale in Scotland: In composing whereof, the Regent of Scotland, having given Queen Elizabeth some discontentment, was fain to come unarmed before the Earl of Huntingdon, appointed the Legate for England at Berwick, and to the matter was taken up, and the Regent ever after continued constant in ob-erving the Queen, and to his great commendation, reftrained the Free-booters of the Borders, to the great good of both Kingdoms.

This year there dyed in Scotland, James Har-miton Duke of Caffie-Herald, and Earl of Aran, who was great Grand-child to James the Second, King of Scots, by his Daughter appointed Tutor to Mary Queen of Scots, and design'd Hair and Governor of the Kingdom, during her mino-

At this time the Earl of Essex is come into Ireland again, where having done good services, and being in the midst of Victory, he was on a sudden commanded to resign his Authority in Ireland and as though he was an ordinary Commander, he set over three hundred Souldiers: which disgrace was wrought by his adversaries in Court, to the continual perplexiing of his milde spirit. And now is Sir Henry Sidney the third time sent Deputy into Ireland; who going into Ireland, there came to him and submitted themselves Monf. Mauch, Monf. Goyon, Tirtuch Lomdyk, the O-Count and O-Moor, the Earl of Desmond, and the rebellious Sons of the Earl of Clarendon, all whom he received into favour, and with great commendation administered the province.

into Spain, hisrode carriage.
Edward Horsey, Governor of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his coming thither, and to offer his help, if the States called the French into the Netherlands; yet at the same time, Srentingham being exceeding importunate on the States behalf, they sent them twenty thousand pounds of English money (so well the could play her game of both hands) upon condition they should neither change their Prince nor their Religion, nor take the French into the Low-Countries, nor refuse a peace.

The Earl of Effex, who had been Schoolmaster to King Edward the sixth, and was no less a Schoolmaster to his own Daughters whom he made skillful in the Greek and Latin Tongues, married all to mean of great Honour; one to Sir William Cecil, Lord Treasurer of England; a second to Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, a third to Sir Thomas Hoby, who dyed Embattellour in France; a fourth to Sir Ralph Lovell; and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

At this time, the Sons of the Earl of Clarendon, who scarce two months before had obtained pardon for their Rebellion, fell into Rebellion again; but were by the Deputy soon suppurt, and William Drury newly made President of Munster, reduced the whole province to good Order, except only the County of Kerry, which a number of Vagabonds were gotten, truing to the Immunities of the place. For King Edward the third made Kerry a County Palatine, and granted to the Earls of Desmond all the Royall Liberties which the King of England had in that County, excepting Wreck by Fire, Forfeiture, and Treason. The Governor notwithstanding, who wisely judged that these Liberties were granted for the better preservation of Justice, and not for maintaining the outrages of the malevolent, when not employed into it, and violently put to flight and vanished the mischievous crew, which the Earl of Desmond had placed there in ambush. The Earl in the mean while made great complaints of Drury to the Deputy, and particularly, of the Tax which they call Caffage, which is an execution of provision of Vintners at a certain rate, for the Deputies Family, and the Soldiours in Garrison. This Tax not he only, but in Limerick also many Lords refused to pay, alledged that it was not to be exacted but by Parliament; but the matter being examin'd in England, it appeared by the Records of the Kingdom, that this Tax was anciently imposted, and that by a certain Right of Majesty, a Prerogative Royal, which is not subjedt to Laws, yet not contrary to them neither, as the wise Civilians have observed. Yet the Queen commanded to use a moderation in exactions of this nature, saying She would have her subjects thorn, but not devoored.

It was now the year 1577, and the twentieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when John of Austria, pretending to Queen Elizabeth nothing but Peace, yet is found to deal fiercely with the pope, to deprive her of her Kingdom, and himself to marry the Queen of Scots, and invade England: of which his prates the prince of Orange gives Queen Elizabeth the first Intelligence. Whereupon (finding his deep dissembling) he enters into a League with the States, for mutual defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain Conditions; but having concluded it, because she would not have it wrongfully interpréted, as though the meant to foster a Rebellion in the Netherlands; the feat Thomas Willebeke to the King of Spain with these Informations, That she had alwayes endeavored to keep the Low-Countries in obedience to the King of Spain, had persuaded even with threats the prince of Orange to accept of Peace, but unhappily, if the King of Spain have his Subjects obedient to him, they then requites him to restore their priviledges, and to remove John of Austria from the Government, who not only was her deadly enemy, but labored by all means to bring the Netherlands into utter fer titude. If this be granted by the King of Spain, the then faithfully promiseth, That if the States perform not their Allegianc to him, as by their promis to her they are engaged to do, the will utterly forfay them, and bend her self with all her Forces to compel them. While life in Spain unfoldeth these matters, John of Austria sendeth to Queen Elizabeth in most grievous manner accusing the States for disobedience and making a large declaration of the caufes for which he had taken up Arms again. Thus Queen Elizabeth (like a fortunate Prince) fate as an Honourable Arbitrife between the Spanifh, the French, and the States; informeth that it was not untrue which one wrote, That France and Spain were Balances in the Scale of Europe; and England the Beam to turn them either way; for they still the better, to whom the adhered.

About this time, when the Judges fate at the Affifts in Oxford, and one Roundland fakes a Book-feller was questioned for speaking appropriate things against the Queen, they were wrapt up with a perfeft favour; whether refund from the noyume smell of the pofton, or from the damp of the ground, is uncertain, but all that were there present, almost every one, within forty hours dyed except Women and children and the Contagion went no further. There dyed Robert Bell, Lord chief Baron, Robert D’Oyly, Sir William Bulington, D’Olye Sheriff of Oxfordshire, Harcourt, Weyman, Pelisplace, the moft of them men in this Art; Barnab the famous Lawyer; almost all the Jurors; and three hundred other, more or lefe.

This year the title of the Lord Latimer (which had flouriished in the Family of the Nevilis even since the days of King Henry the first) was extinct in John Nevill, who dyed without issue male, and left a fair estate to four Daughters, whereof the eldest married Henry Earl of Northumberland, the second Thomas, second Earl, who was afterward Earl of Exeter; the third, William Comyns; and the fourth, Sir John Dauers.

In Ireland the O-Mores and O-Courys, and others, whose Ancefors the Earl of Saffexy in Queen Mary’s days, had for their rebellion deprived of their Patrimony in Lefcy and Ophalke, did now fbreak forth into a new Rebellion, under the Conduct of Keris Oge, that is, Roderick the younger; fett on fire the Village of Nanaf, affault Lachlin; from whence being driven back by the value of George Carew the Governour, he was afterward flain.

Out of England at this time there went out into the Low-Countries John North the Lord Norths eldest Son, John Norris second Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Comyns, and Thomas Morgan Colonels, with many Volunteers, to learn Military Experience. Thither also came Camesire the Earl of Darlington Son, with an Army of Germans Horse and Foot, at the Queen’s Charge: upon these: John Johns, affilld by the Prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the left Commanders of Spain, confident of Victory, fhyth furiously, before they expected him, yet after a long fight, was forced to retreat; but then returning again, and thinking to break through the Hedges and Bukes where the Engiſh and Scotifh Volunteers had placed themſelves, was again repulſed; for the Engiſh and Scoſſiſh were so hot upon the matter that casting away their garments, by reafon of the hot weather, they fought in their shirts, which they made fast about them. In this Battle Norris fought most valiantly, and had three Hores flain under him, as also Sneyard the Scott Bingham, and William Markham.

Now for comfort to the afflicted Provinces, there came at that time into the Netherlands, the Count Suenzenberg from the Emperor; Montfeur Bellivier from the French King; and from the Queen of England, the Lord Cobham and Walsingham, with Commination to procure conditions of Peace, but returned without doing any thing, for that Don John refused to admit the Protentant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refu-l ed to return into Holland.

About this time Egremond Ratcliffe, Son to Henry Earl of Saffexy, by his second Wife, who had been a prime man in the Rebellion of the North, and served now under Don John, was ac-curred by the Engiſh fugitives, that he was fenf under-hand to fall Don John, which (whether true or falfhe) he was therupon taken and put to death. The Spaniards have affirmed, That Ratcliffé at his left end, confefled voluntarily, That he was freed out of the Tower of London, and moved by Walsingham large promises to do this Fact; but the Engiſh that were present at his death, deny that he confessed any fuch thing, though the Engiſh Rebels did all they could to wet this confeffion from him.

At this very time, Don John, in the flower of his age, died of the Putridity, or (as some fa" grief, as being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother; a man of an intaftible Ambition, who aimed first at the Kingdom of Twys, and after, of England; and who, without the privity of the French King, or King of Spain, had made a large ts with the Guifes, for the defence of both Crown.

Aylfon although very busie about the Belgium Affairs, yet now began again to purifie the Mar-rage with Queen Elizabeth; by remittance of the which suit first was Bacheville fent to the Queen, and foone after Robanville, from the French King; and within a month after that, Smiers a neat Curtior, and exquifitey learned in the Art of Love, accompanied with a great number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen at Rich mond entertained in fuch loving manner, that Leclefier began to rage, as if his hopes were now quite blaited. Certainy a little before, when Abhley, Lady of the Queens Bed-Chamber, mentioned the Earl of Leclefier to her for a Husband, the with an angry countenance replied, Doth thou think me fo unlike my self, and fo forgetful of Majesty; as to prefer my Servant, whom I my self have advanced, before the great Princes of the Christian World?

But it is now time to return to the Scotch Affairs. The Earl of Morcen, Regent of Scotland though a man of great wisdom and valour, yet was now to overcome; with confidence, that he grew universally hated; and therefore, with the joy confent of the Nobility, the Administration of the Common-wealth, was transferred to the King, though he was yet but twelve years old, and D’da twelve
twelve of the chief Lords were appointed to attend him in Council, three of them by course for three months, amongst whom, the Earl of Morson for one, but they might not seem to call him quite off. The King having taken upon him the Administration, sent presently the Earl of Darnferin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great defenses towards him, and requesting to have the Treaty of Edinburgh, agreed on in the year 1579, to be confirmed, for the more happy retaining the Robbers about the borders; and withall, That his ancient Patrimony in England; namely, the Lands granted to his Grand-father Matthew, Earl of Lenox; and the Countess his Grand-mother, might be delivered into his hands who was the next Heir. The Queen readily promised the former demands, but fluck a little at the last concerning the Patrimony; For she would not grant, That Arbeila, the Daughter of Charles the King of Scots Unkle, born in England, was the next Heir to the Lands in England; neither would she grant the Ambassadors proof out of History, That the Kings of Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently (without question) hold the Earlom of Huntingdon by Right of Inheritance. Yet she commanded a Sequestration to be made of the Revenues of the Lands, and the Barony Matter of the Wards; and willed the King, That out of the goods of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland, satisfaction might be made to his Grand-mothers Creditors here. For she took it in all part, that the King had recalled the Enfeoffment of the Earlom of Lenox (made to his Unkle Charles and his Heirs) after the death of Charles, to the prejudice (as was suggested to her) of Arbeila; although indeed it be a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland, That they may recall Donations made in their minority.

The Earl of Morson in the mean while, not enduring the diligence to be out of his Regency, regarded not the Precontract Form of Government lately set down, but drew the Administration of all matters to himself, and kept the King in his own power at the Castle of Stirling, admitting none to his presence, but whom he pleased. At this preambulation, the Lords growing angry, made the Earl of Abell their Captain, and in the Kings Name levied a great Army, and were ready to encounter Morson; but by the Intercession of Robert Bowes, the English Ambassador, they were stayed from fighting; and Morson presently betook himself home, and the Earl of Abell soon after dyed, not without suspicion of being poisoned.

At this time the King of Spain, and Pope Gregory the Thirteenth held secret Confloration, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute ruine of Queen Elizabeth; The Pope to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Buon of Campania, whom he had made Marques of Vinola: The King of Spain secretly to relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth did the Dutch, while Friendship in words was upheld on both sides: and being known, That the greatest strength of England confin'd in the Navy Royal, and Merchants Ships, it was advis'd, That the Italian and Dutch Merchants should hire there Ships for long Voyages; to the end, that while they were absent, the Queens Navy might be surpriz'd with a greater Fret; and at that time Thomas Stukeley, an English Engineer, should join himself to the Irish Rebels with new Forces. For he made great business, and promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Popes Bifhad Son, had to inuffocated himself into grace with the ambitious old man, that he adored him with the Titles of Marquefs of Lemsfer, Earl of Westford, and Countiy, Viscount Mulbough, and Baron of Reffes, (the principal Dignities of Ireland) and made him Commander over Eight Hundred Irish Souldiers, to be employed in the Irish War. With which Forces Stukeley setting Sail from Civita Vecchia, arrived at length in Portugal, where he and his Forces were by the Divine Providence diverted another way. For Sebastian King of Portugal (to whom the Chief Command in this Expedition against England was alligned) being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in aid of Mahomet Abdali, Son to the King of Feffe, perfwaded Stukeley to go along with him into Mauritania, together with his Italian Souldiers, and then afterward they would go together against Ireland. To this motion Stukeley soon agreed, and therein agreed with his desity; for in that memorable Battle where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their Lives.

At this time the Earl of Morton (who had been Deputy of Ireland at several times eleven years) delivered up his Deputy-ship to Sir William Drury, President of Maufer: Such a Deputy, for good Government, that if any have equall’d him, none have exceeded him.

It was now the year 1579, and the two and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when John Caumer, Son of Frederick the Third, Count Palatine of the Rhine, came into England, where, after he had been entertainted with Tiltings and Jaits, made Knight of the Garter (the Queen tyning the Garter about his leg) and rewarded with a yearly Penfion, he returned. And now was Alexander Farmer, Prince of Parma, made Governor of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, and Queen Elizabeth supplied the States with a great sum of money, for which William Davyfon brought into England the ancient precious Habitations, the Family of Burgundy, and their Coftry Vellies, laid to pawn by Matthew of Ambracia and the States.

Simler in the mean time here in England coast not by all aomorous devices to petivade the Queen to marry Alagon; wherein he drew her so far, that the Earl of Leiscler gave out, he crept into the Queens affectio by Love-Potions and unlawfull Arts: and Simler on the other side endeavoured by all means to cast down Leiscler, discovering his marriage with the Earl of Elyff Wido: whereas the Queen grew so angry, that she confined him to the Castle at Greenwich, and meant to have him committed to the Tower, but that the Earl of Suffolk (though his greatest Advertery) dissuaded her: telling her, That none ought to be molest'd for contractinge lawful Matrimony, But Leiscler notwithstanding was so provoked for his Confining, that he was bent to revenge it: and if it be true, as some said, he had borrowed one Founder a Yeoman of the Guard to marther Simler. Sure it is, the Queen by Proclamation commanded, That no person shouled offer injury to the Ambassadors or any of thei Servants. At which time it fell out, that as the Queen,
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Queen, together with Siriam, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hencus Vice-Chamberlain, were rowed in a Barge to Greenwich, a young man shooting off a Harquebus out of a Boat, shot one of the rowers in the Queens Barge through the Arm with a Bullet, who was presently taken and led to the Gallows; but upon solemn Protestation, that he did it unwillingly, and out of no malicious intent, he was let go and pardoned. Some would have persuaded the Queen, that he was purposely fuborned to shoot either her or the French Ambaffador; but she was so far from suspecting her Subjects, that she would often say, She would not believe any thing against them, which a Mo- ther would not believe against her Children.

After a few days Alans for himself came privately into England with a number of attendants, and came to the Queen at Greenwich, at a time when the thought of it, they had secret Conference together, all parties being sent away: after which, being seen of very few, he returned home, but within a monath or two after the Queen enjoyned the Lord Burleigh Trefa- iur, the Earl of Suffolk, Leicester, Hert- fon and Wafhingham, seriously to weigh both the dangers, and the Commodities likely to arise from the marriage with him, and to consult with Simier concerning the marriage Covenants.

As in England there was some fear of this French-man; so in Scotland at this time of another French-man, called Eme Steward, Lord of Aubigny, who came now into Scotland to visit the King his Coulen. He was the Son of John Steward Brother to Matthew Steward Earl of Lenox, the Kings Grand-father, and had denomination from Aubigny in France, which Title Charles the Se- venth King of France had, and was created upon John Steward of the Family of Lenox, who being Contable of the Scotch Army in France, vanquished the English in one Battel, and was slain by them in another: and from that time the Title belonged to the younger descent of that House. This Eme Steward, the King embraced with ex- ceeding great love, made him Lord Chamberlain of Scotland, and Captain of the Castle of Don- brioton, and created him first Earl and then Duke of Lenox. The fear from this man was, because he was devoted to the Grifes and the Popifh Re- ligion; and that which increased the fear from this man, because he applied himself to Mortons Adverfaries: and meditated to have Thomas Care Lord of Ferniholl called home, who of all men was most addicted to the Queen of Scots.

About this time Queen Elizabeth, at the re- quest of William Harbone an English-man, proc- ured a Grant from the Turkifh Emperor, for the English Merchants to exercise free Trade in all places of his Dominions, as well as Venetians, Polanders, and other neighbouring Nations; whereupon they set up the Company of Turkifh Merchants, managing a most gainful Trade at Constantinople, Alle- xandria, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other parts of Asia, bringing home Spices, Perfumes, unwrought Silks, Taffality, Indico, Curtains and the like.

This year dyed Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Ke- per of the Great Seal; but who by virtue of an Act of Parliament, always exercised the Juridi- cation of Lord Chancellor; a very fair man, but singularly wife, and a chief prop of the Queens Privy Council: in whose place succeeded Sir Thomas Bromley the Queens Solicitor, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England.

In Ireland at this time, in the Province of Munster, James Fitz-Morris kindled a new fire of Rebellion; for after his former submission up- on his knees, rowing all Obedience to the Queen, he fled away into France, and promis- ed the French King, if he would lend him assistance, to make him King of Ireland. But being by him flighted, he went into Spain, and made the like offer to the King there. The King of Spain lent him to the Pope, from whom (by means of Nicho- las Sanders, an English Priest, and Mott an Irish man, both Deaf to婶erit), he obtained a little money, a Legats Authority for Sanders, a conecrated Banner, and Letters of Commenda- tion to the Catholick King. And returning from Spain with these Divines, three Ships, and a few men, he landed at Smervick Kerry, a demy Island in the Wift part of Ireland, about the first day of July; where (the place being fuft of all confe- crated by the Priests) he built a Fort, and brought the Ships close under it; but these were presently fet upon and carried away, by Thomas Courney, and thereby the Spaniards deprived of their op- portunity of coming thither by Sea. But now John and James, Brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathered together a small number of Irish, joyn themselves preffently with their Kinman Fitz- Morris. Yet the Spaniards seeing that but a very few Irish, and those unarmed, came unto them, began to diftruft the effate they were in, and to cry out, That they were undone: whom Fizz-Morris hearted the bell he could, telling them that Supplies were presently to come. And going himself to get more Company, he pref- ted through the Land of his Coulen William a Burgh, who though he had been a Rebel before, yet was now grown Loyal, so as there fell out a Skirmifh between them; in which Fizz-Morris being flruken through with a Pike, and flot into the head with a Leaden bullet, died in the place, and moft of his Company with him; but withall, two of William Burgh's Sons were in that skirmifh slain also: when the Queen, to comfort him for the los of his Sons, adorn'd him with the Dignity of Baron of Care Conell, and rewarded him with a yearly Penfion besides; which Fa- vours so overwheflned him with joy, that he lived but a short while after. And now Sir William Dray the Deputy growing very fick, appointed Sir Nicholas Malby, then Governour of Con- naught to be Prefident of Munfter, and General of the Army; at which time, the Earl of Des- mond, who had all this while made a fhew of Loyalty, breaks openly out into Rebellion: where- how Dray the Deputy dying at Waterford, by his death Malby, Authority ceasing, Sir William Pelham is by the Council chosen Justice of Ire- land, with the Authority of Vice-Roy, until such time as a Deputy were appointed, and the Earl of Ormond is made President of Munfter, Pelham goeth into Munfter, and fendlth for the Earl of Desmond, who refusing to come, is there- upon proclaimed Traytor, and an enemy to the State: and this being published, the Justice con- cluded the following the War to the Earl of Or- mond, who flying moft of the Spaniards and ad-land.

The Lord Justice Pelham now certified, That Armed Lord Gray was landed with authority to be Deputy of Ireland, at Manifel delivereth the Army to George Bourbier the Son of John, second Earle of Banke of that name, and himself returneth to Dubln, to deliver up the Province to his Suc-ceflor. The Lord Gray at his landing, before he received the Sword, hearing where the Rebels had their Rendezvous, marched towards them, who presently betake themselves to Grandinville, a graily Valley, and beft thick with Trees, where they who dwell near, scarce know the winding out; yet the Deputy (taking one Cobbe an old man, well acquainted with the place, to be his leader) entered into it, where he left divers of his men, namely, Peter Caren the youngest, George Moore, Andley, and Cobbe himself that was his Leader.

A short time after, there landed at Smyrnich in Kerry, under the the command of San Poych an Italian, about four hundred Italian Soldiers, who fortifie the place, and name it Fort del Orz; Whereupon the Deputy sent a Trumpeter to the Fort to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, and who sent them; with all commanding them to depart immediately. But they replied, That some of them were sent from his Holiness, others from the Catholick King, upon whom the Pope had bestowed the Kingdom of Ireland, for that Queen Elizabeth (by reason of herself) hath forfeited the Right due unto her; and therefore what they had gotten, they would maintain. Upon this the Deputy prepares for battery, makes his Ordinance four days together, in which time the Spaniards once or twice make Sallies out, to their own lfofe much, but not an English man flain, but only John Cheek, a courageous young Gentleman, Son to Sir John Cheek, a learned Knight. And now San Poych, who commanded the Fort, was afraid that they would die, finding, with the continuall Battery, and having no hope of relief, either from the King of Spain or Desmond (contrary to the will of all his Soldiers) set up a white Flag, and desired Parlee; but Parlee was d - nearly, because he had combined with Rebels, with whom it is not lawful to hold Parlee. Then he demanded that his Company might passe with their Bagge, but neeither would this be granted. Then he requited that some of the chiefer fort might have leave to depart; but neither could this be ob-ained. At last, when they could prevail in nothing, they hanged out the White Flag again, and submitted themselves absolutely, without any condition, to the Deputy's mercy, who presently confented how to deal with them; and this was the Cafe; Their number was well near as great as the English; there was present fear of danger from the Rebels; and the English were to deflute of meat and drink, that they were ready to mutiny; unless they might have the food granted them; and besides, there were no ships to fend them away if they were spared: For the Reson this was concluded, (the Deputy gaining, and letting tears fall) That only the Leaders should be sved, the reft flain, and all the Irish hanged up; which was presently put in execution, to the great disliking of the Queen, who detested the slaughter of such as yield them-sefl, and would not accept of any execuse or allegations.

And yet more cruelty then this was at that time committed in the Netherlads; for John Norris, and Oliver Temple, English Commanders, together with some Companies of Dutch, setting out early one morning, took Mecklen a wealthy Town of Braban, at an assault with Ladders; where they promiscuously murdered both Citizens and Religious perious, offering violence even upon the dead, taking away Grave-stones, which were sent into England to be sold.

About this time certain Engiish Priests, who were fled into the Netherlands; in the year 1568, by the procurement of William Allen an Oxford Scholar, joyned themselves to study at Douay, where they entered into a Collegiate Form of Government; to whom the Pope allowed a yearly Penitent. But Tumults arising in the Low-Countries, and the English Priests being commanded by the King of Spain, Desmond, interference, other the like Colleges, for the training up of the English Youth, were erected, one at Recam in the Guiu, and another at Rome by Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, which always al-furred new supplies of Priests for England, when the old failed, who should spread abroad the seeds of the Romish Religion here amongst us; from whence those Colleges had the name of Sema-raries, and they called Seminary Priests who were trained up in them. In these Seminaries, amongst other Disputation, it was concluded, That the Pope had such fulnes of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian-World, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular matters; that by ve-tere thereof it is lawful for him to excommunicate Kings, abrogate their Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries at this time, there came two at England, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, both of them Englishmen, and Jefuits. Parsons was born in Somersetshire, a free and rough condition fellow; Cam-pian was a Londoner, of a milder disposition.
They had been both brought up in Oxford; Cam-pian a Fellow of St. Johns Colledge, and had been Proctor in the year 1569; and when he was made Deacon, counterfeited himself to be a Professor, till such time as he slpped out of England. Parsons was of Bayliff College, where he made open profession of the Protestant Religion, till for dishonest carriage, he was expelled the House, and then fled to the Popish party. Both these came privily into England, in the disguise one while of Soldiers, another while of Noble-men; sometimes like English Ministers, and sometime in the habit of Apparators. Parsons who was made the Superior, brake forth in such open words amongst the Papists, about defending the Queen, that came two of them, had a purpose to complaimin of them to the Magistrates. Campian, even through something more moderate, yet in a Writing provoked the English Ministers to a dispute; and published in Latin an elegant Book of his Ten Reasons, in maintenance of the Doctrine of the Romish Church; as Parsons in like manner, set forth another violent Pamphlet against Clark, who had written medallly against Campian's Provocation. vocation. But Dr. Whitaker loudly conti-ceded Captain, who being after a year apprehended, and put upon the Rack, was afterward brought out to a disputation; where he severely made good the great fame that went of him.

In this year was the return of Captain Drake from his incredible Voyage round about the World (which Magellan had before attempted, but dyed in the Voyage) whereof to relate all particular accidents, would require a large Volume: It may suffice in this place, to deliver some special passages. He was born of mean Parenttage in Devonshire, yet had a great man (Francis Rosell's, after Earl of Bedford) to be his Godfather. His Father, in King Henry the Eighth's time, being persecuted for a Protestant, changed his Surn., and lived exile in Kent. King Henry being dead, he place among the Mariners of the Queen's Navy, to read Prayers, and afterward bound his Son Francis to a Ship-Master, who in a Ship which went to and fro upon the Coast with Commercies, one while to Zealand, another while to France, training him up to pans and skill at Sea; took such a liking to him, that afterwards dying, he bequeathed the Barque to him by his Will: This Barque Drake sold, and in the then year 1567, went with Sir John Hawkins into America; in which Voyage he unfortunately lost all he had. Five years after having gotten again a good sum of money by Trading and Piracy, (which the Preacher of his Ship told him was lawful) he bought a Ship of War, and two small Vessels, with which he set sail again for America, where his first Prize was great store of Gold and Silver, carried over the Mountains upon Mules; whereof the Gold he brought to his Ships, but left the Silver, finding it under ground; after this, he found a great place of Treasure called the Crab, at the River Chinga, when roaming to and fro upon the Mountains, he espied the South Sea; where falling upon his knees, he craved assistance of Almighty God, to find out that passage, which he receiveth for another Voyage; and for the present, having gotten much riches, he returned home. Afterwards in the year 1577, the thirteenth day of November, with five Ships, and teem-en to the number of 163, he set sail from Plymouth, for the Southern Sea, and within five and twenty days, came to Canygna, a Cape in Barbary, and then sailed along the Isle of Ego which sends forth flames of Sulphur; and being now under the Line, he let every one in his Ship blood. The sixteenth of April, entering into the mouth of the Plate, they espied a world of Sea-Cavels, in which place John Drayton, the next to Drake in Authority, was called in question for raising Sedition in the Navy, who being found guilty, was beheaded; the report was, Drake had charge given him from the Earl of Leicester, to make way Drayton upon some pretence or other, for that he had said, That the Earl of Eliz. was craftily made away by Leicester: The twentieth of May, two of his Ships he turneth off, and with other three came to the Sea, which they call, The Straight of Magellan. The sixtith of September, entering into the wide Southern Ocean, which they call, The Pacific Sea, he found it out of measure troubled, so that his Ships were here by Tempeasts dispered; in one of which, John

Winter was Master, who returned back into England; Drake himself, with only one Ship, coasted along the shore, till he came to the Isle Muncy, from whence loofing, he lighted upon a fellow fishing in a little Boat, who showed him where a Spanish Ship laden with Treasure lay; Drake making towards it, the Spaniards thought him to be their own Country man, and thereupon in vited him to come on; but he getting aboard, presently fait the Spaniards (being not above eight persons) under hatches, and took the Ship, in which was four hundred pound weight of Gold, At Tarmaqua, going again to shore, he found a Spanish sleeping by the Sea-side, who had lying by him twenty bars of maffive Silver to the value of four thousand Ducats, which he bid his followers take among them, the Spaniards still sleeping. After this, going into the part of Africa, he found there three Vessels without any Mariners in them; wherein, besides other wares, were seven and fifty silver bricks, each of which weighed twenty pound: From hence, yding it to Lime, he found twelve Ships in one Road, and in them great store of Silks, and a Chet full of money coined, but not so much as a Ship-boy abroad; (such security there was in that Coast:) Then putting to Sea with those Ships, he followed the rich Ship called the Cacofage, and by the way met with a small Ship, without Ordnance or other Arms, out of which he took fourscore pound weight of Gold, a golden Crucifix, and some Emeralds of a fingers length. The first day of March, he overtook the Cacofage, fet upon her, and took her; and in her besides Jewels, fourscore pound weight of Gold, thirteen Chefs of Silver ready coined, and as much Silver as would ballast a Ship And now thinking he had gained wealth enough, he re-tolved to return home; and so on the third of March, 1580, he landed at Plymouth, having sailed round about the World, in the space of three years; to the great admiration of all that know what Compass the World is of.

The Queen welcomed him home, but made a sequestration of the Goods, that they might be ready if the King of Spain required them; and commanded the Ship to be drawn on Shore near Devonport for a Monument (where the Car-cais of it is yet to be seen) and her self feated in it; at which time the Knighted Captain Drake. But Bernardina Mendosa, the King of Spain's Ambassador in England, began to rage; and earnestly demanded Restitution of the Goods, and complained, that the English failed upon the Indian Sea. To whom it was anwiser, That the Goods were sequestred, and ready to make the King of Spain satisfaction, although the Queen had expended against the Rebels, whom the Spanish King in England and Ireland, more money than that which Drake brought home. And as for sailing on the In-ian Sea, That it was as lawful for the Queens Subjects as his, seeing the Sea and the Air are common for all to use. Notwithstanding; to Pedro Serrana, the King of Spain's Agent in this busines, a great sum of money was repaid, which was not restored to them to whom it belonged, but employed to the Spaniards Wars in the Low Countries, as was known after, when it was too late.
But at this time, when Jackson and the two skilful Pilots were sent forth with two Ships by the Lords, to find out a shorter cut to the East-Indies, by the North-West passage; they had not the like success; for a few Leagues beyond the Isles of Perygus, they met with such uncertain Tydes, so many Shallows, and such Mountains of Ice, that they could go no further, and had much ado to return home.

About this time, Henry Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel died, in whom the Sorrows of this most Noble Family ended, which had flourished in this Honour for above three hundred years, from Richard Fitz-Alan, who being descended from the Albani (ancient Earls of Arundel and Suffet, in the Reign of King Edward the first) obtained the Title of Earl, by reason of the pretension of Arundel Castle, without Creation. He had three Daughters by his Wife Katherine, Daughter to Thomas Gray, Marquess of Dorset, all whom he cut-off: Henry a young man of great hope, who dyed at Bruges, Joan, Wife to the Lord Lenox; and Mary, who being married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Philip, in her right, Earl of Arundel.

In Ireland, Arthur Lord Gray the Deputy going against the O'Connors, who raised hills in Opheba, put to death Hugh O'Malley, quieted all that Quarter, even the Families of the Magh-bignes, O'Charles, and in the very beginning suppressed a conspiracy which was bruised forth, by putting to death the Lord Nogent; who being confident in his own innocency, when the Deputy promised to save his life, if he would but confine himself guilty, chose rather to die, and be held guilty, than to live in infamy, by betraying his own innocency. With whole death the Queen was extremely displeased, as by which she was made a patron of cruelty, to her great dishonour. But the Deputy knew with what kind of people he dealt, and by this example of severity, brought Turfagh Leynighe to accept conditions of Peace; and the O'Brians and Contewights (Rebellious Families in Lenox) humbly to crave leave also, and to offer hostages.

In Scotland, at this time great jealousies was had of Lennox, Lord of Arran, left, being in so great favour with the King, he should allure him to marry into France, and bring into Scotland the Popish Religion. Whereupon (although he purged himself by Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and professed himself to be a Protestant) yet many Cortes were taken to sequester him from the King; but so far from taking effect, that on the contrary, the Earl of Morton (who among all other was most addicted to the English) was soon after assailed by the Earl of Arran, and cast into prison; and not long after (notwithstanding all the means the Queen could use to save him) he was beheaded, as convicted to be accessory to the manner of the Kings Father. Whereupon the Earl of Arran, and others who laboured for Morton, fled straightways into England.

In the Low-Countries about this time, the Count Rheiniburg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain; and besiegued Stenwick in Friesland; against whom the States sent Norris General of the Field, who put the Rheiniburg Company to the word, and raised the Siege; but afterward joining Battel with Verding the Span-King, for him and his Heirs, and a Reversion was also added apart, with the Hands and Seals of every one of the Delegates, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to finish the Marriage, until the and the Duke have given each other satisfaction in some particular, and have certified the French King of the same within five weeks. Before those five weeks were expired, Simier, Secretary to the Council, is sent into France, to require the King of France his Confirmation; The King will not hear him, but prelently to have the Marriage accomplished, as it was contracted, and that nothing else was to be done. Simier on the other side, after the Articles, That a League offensive and defensive must first be concluded, This the French King disclaimeth; Whereupon Walsingham is presently sent to compose this difference, who joyneth with Henry Cobham, the Ambassador in ordinary, and Simier, allègdeth to the French King these Particulars, That Queen Elizabeth for no other reason was willing to marry, but for the satisfaction of her people; and seeing many Impediments were come in the way of the said Treaty, namely the Civil War in France, and the Duke's engagement in a War with Spain, which makes the will of her Subjects now to be against the Match; This hath made her to defer the Accomplishment of it, although her affection be still toward the Duke. For this cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, till the French Duke be freed from the Spanish war, and a League of mutual offence and defence be agreed on. The French King willingly accepted of the League defensive; but of the offensive he would hear no speech, till the marriage were finished.

Not long after, the French Duke himself came into England, having with good success raised the Siege of Cambrai; he was here received with as great humanity as he could wish, and nothing omitted, whereby he might judge himself to be truly welcome: Infomuch that in November, when the Anniversary of the Queens Inauguration came to be solemnized, the Queen (while they were in Love-conference) drew a Ring off from her finger, and put it upon his, upon some private conditions. The Standers by imagined, that by this Ceremony the marriage was confirmed between them; and therefore Government of Auvergne being there, presently dispatched messengers into the Low-Countries, to give notice of it; and thereupon Bonfines were made, and all hearts of rejoicing. But the Earl of Leicester (who privily plotted to close the Match) Harrew the Vice-Chamberlain, and Secretary Walsingham, fret and are enraged, as if the Kingdom, the Queen and Religion, were now utterly overthrown. The Maid of Honour, and Ladies that were familiar with the Queen, made grievous lamentation, and so terrified and dummed her, that she could take no rest that night. The next day, the callent the French Duke to her, and after a long discourse, made him explain on the in consequence of Women.

But taking of France disclaimeth the Articles.

The Duke of Auvergne cometh into England.

And in a private conference with the Queen, the King, a Ring from off her Finger and put it upon his. The French Duke and Ladies imaginating the marriage to be confirmed, frenc exceeding.

The next day the callent the French Duke to her, and after a long discourse, made him explain on the in consequence of Women.

But taking of France disclaimeth the Articles.

The Duke of Auvergne cometh into England. A Book lately put forth, with this Title The Galph wherein England will be finifbnd, by the French Marriage; whereas, conceiving that some Puritan was the Author; it made her highly displeas'd with the Parliament of England, within a few days, John Stables of Lincoln-Inne, a zealou Professor, and the Author of this Book, (whoho Sifer, Thomas Cartwright the Father of the Puritans had married) William Page that dispersed the Copies, and Singleton the Printer were apprehended, against whom Sentence was pronounced, That their Right hand should be cut off, by virtue of a Law made in the Reign of Philip and Mary, against the Authors and dispersers of Seditious Writings, (though the chief Lawyers and Judges of the Kingdom could not agree concerning the force of that Statute.) Hereupon Stables and Page were brought to the Scaffold, made of purpose, in the Market-place at Trafalgar, and their right hands with a Butchers knife & a mallet cut off by the wiff, the Printer was pardoned. At that time Stables when his right hand was cut off, uncovered his head with the felt, and cried out, God save the Queen, to the great amazement of all the Beholders.

At this time the Queen, upon impotant fair of her Council, gave way, that Edmund Campion, Ralph Sherwin, and Alexander Bryant Priests, if so be called to the Bar, who being accused by vertue of a Law made in the fift and twentieth year of King Edward the third, to have plotted the name of the Queen and Kingdom; to be adhering to the Pope, the Queen Enemy, and coming into England, to raise Forces against the State, were then condemn'd of High Treason, and accordingly executed. Campion after he was convicted, being demanded; first, whether Queen Elizabeth was a lawful Queen? would make no answer; after ward, Whether he would stand for the Queen, or the Pope, if he should send an Army against the Queen; he plainly protesteth, That he would be of the Popes side, and witnessed so much under his hand. After this some other Papists upon the like occasion were also put to death, which the Queen rather necessitated, than willingly assent to; as being unwilling to force the conscience of any. These, and the like excommunications of Papists, were cause, that new and strict Laws were enacted against them the Parliament following, which begin the next January.

The French Duke after three months abode in England, took his Journey in February into the Low-Countries, whom the Queen her self brought on his way so far as Canterbury; and then commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lords Charles Howard, Huskisson, Willoughby, and for Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Ralegh, Sir George Bowleisher, and some other prime Knights to accompany him to Auvergne, where he is made Duke of Brackenham, Limbourgh and Lorain; for the Dutch had long before removed the King of Spain Government, and quitted the people from their Oath of Allegiance, that it might be in their own power to choose any other Prince. Here the Duke of Augus gave free leave to exercise the Roman Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spain Authority: but after all, having spent a great maffe of money, with which he was supplied from England. and observing that only vain and empty titles were conferred upon him, while the States held all the Dominion in their own hands, he rashly overprized an assault upon Antwerp, and some other Towns, and thereby deserted without any great matter performed.

At this time Queen Elizabeth, as well to get her some friends, as she had procured her self many enemies; received into the Order of the Garter, Frederick, the second King of Denmark; to whom the employed Sir Peregrine Bertie (whom the had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby) to invert him.

But now to prevent the Duke of Guise design in Scotland, which was to make use of the Duke of Lenox favour with the King, to withdraw his affection from the England: William Ruben, whom the King had lately made Earl of Guise, endeavoured with others, by all means to remove Lenox and the Earl of Arran from the King; and, while Lenox was gone from Paris, (where the King at that time was) to Edinburgh, and Arran was also absent on a journey; the Earls Guise, Marmies Landes, and others, taking the opportunity, invited the King to the Caffle of Ruben, and there detained him, not permitting him to walk abroad: All his trusty servants they removed from about him; Arran they cast in Prison, enforced the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a man of a soft and gentle disposition, for the Kings safety readily confented; and not content with all this, they compelled the King by his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, to approve and allow of this his thrall. The Queen of Scots in the mean while, bewailing her own hard fortune, and the distresses of the King her Son, layeth open the same in a large Letter, written to the Queen in French: With which Letter Queen Elizabeth being somewhat affected, sent unto her Robert Beal Clerk of the Council, to expostulate with her concerning the quarrelous writing, and joyntly with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to treat of the setting her at liberty. And indeed furious consultations were held at the Council about this, and the most were of opinion, that upon certain conditions she should have her liberty; but the Scotsish of the English faction opposing it, nothing was effected.

Soon after this, the King sent Colonell William Stewart and John Cottill to Queen Elizabeth, professing all manner of respect and observance, and requesting her advice for quieting the tumults in Scotland, and also for his contracting of marriage. At which time, news was brought, that the Duke of Lenox was dead in France, who depriving this life at Paris, & even at the very point of death, as often times before, made open professors of the Protestant Religion; thereby confining those who had maliciously traduced him for a Papist. After whose death, when the surprizers of the King were lift up in their own conceits, as thinking they had him safe enough; He on a sudden (though scarce eighteen years of age) with some few others, conveyed himself to the Caffle of St. Andrews, to whom the Nobility presently repaired, bringing five or six armed Bands with them: As fearing some danger might befall him. Afterwards, in fair words he advised some of his surprizers to go from the Court, for avoiding of trouble, and promising them pardon, if they would crave it. But Guise, only asked pardon, and furnished himself, using this distinction, That he had not offended in matter, but in form only; and then the King sent for the Earl of Arran to the Court, and respected him as his intimate friend, employing him to compose the Differences amongst the Nobility, and to purge the Kingdom and his own Court from civil divisions.

Whereas he is sedulous in these cares, comes Sir Francis Walsingham from Queen Elizabeth, to advise him not to be led away by evil Counsellors, to the deftruction of both Kingdoms. He findeth the King accompanied with the flower of the Nobility, and beholdeth another manner of Majesty than he looked for in Scotland: Having Audience given him, he put the King in mind of what the Queen out of Scotland, in private Letters had formerly admonished him: That a Prince must be such a lover of Truth, that more credit may be given to his bare words, than to another's tale; and in many words advised him, to beware now in his Youth of evil Counsellors, and always to be like himself. The King answered, that he was an absolute Prince, and would not that others should point them Counsellors at him, but not; but that he had long since devoted the first fruits of his amity to the Queen of England his dear Sifer, and doth now willingly make profit of the same. Walsingham now dealt with him further; not to lay to the Queen's charge what broyles had lately fallen out in Scotland; fithew, how beneficial to him, and to both Kingdoms Amity had been hitherto, and would be in time to come also; so it were not neglected; and that the fame might the better be confirmed, if the variance between the Nobility were laid asleep, by a Law of Oblivion enacted in Parliament, and the Peers which now were removed from the Court called back again, religion looked into, and a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made answer, that he gladly embraced Amity with England, and that he would constantly defend the Religion already established: Afterward he lovingly diffmifed Walsingham, though he had his hand on his heart, and his Mother; and carefully looking to matters with understanding, even above his years, proposed and professed reconciliation to those that had surprized him, if within a limited time they asked pardon; which they were so far from doing, that they entered into new consultations to surprize him again, wherenon they are commanded within a fit time to leave the Kingdom, of which number, Marmies, Elantons, Pasfield, and some other, betook themselves into Ireland; Bozy, Zefler, Wetme, Lockemann, into the Low-Countrys; Domerlin into France; the Earl of Angus is confined to his Earldom, Gury only to his own este, layeth behind the limited time, hatching new devies.

About this time happened a difference, and thereupon a War between the Emperor of Moezevia and the King of Sweden, when John King of Sweden, doubting himself to be fit Match for the Emperor, sent a Royal Ambassadour to Queen Elizabeth, requesting her to intercede for him to the Emperor, which he did without delay, and by her Ambassadour drew the Moezeian to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions. But the Muscovian shortly after dying, and Theodorus his Successor granting free Traffic to Merchants of all Nations that would come thither; the Queen importuned him to admit of none but English Merchants, requiring him to confirm the Privileges which his Father had granted them: Whereeto, by way of Answer, he commanded Free Trading for all the English, saying, it was not fit that a small Company should exercise a Monoopoly, but that the whole Commerce should have entrance to the Prince; he promised to take into his Company than of any other, because they first opened the way thither.

The next Summer, Albertus Aisfeo, a Palatian of Poland, of a comedy personaage, and great Learning, came into England to see the Queen, who was nobly entertained, both by her and the Nobility, as also by the Scholars of Oxford, with learned Orations, and other recreations: but having tarried here four months, and run into much debt, he secretly withdrew himself and departed. This man I saw my self afterward in Crakow, very bare, though it was reported of him, That he had in a Dowry with a Wife, fifty Catles of great value: but what Mine can bear the charges of prodigality?

This year proved fatal to divers great men; for there died, first Thomas Rauceis, the third Earl of Saffex of this Family; a man of a great spirit, and great familiarity to his Countermates. There died also Henry Veryebel the Earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Roman Religion, and a great Favourer of the Queen of Scots, which cost him Queen Elizabeths displeasure, and imprisonment besides.
There died also Sir Humphry Gibers, who was cast away at Sea, in his return from the North part of America, whither he lately jolyed with five Ships, having told his Patrimony, in hope to plant a Colonie there. There died also Edmund Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, being blind through age, a grave and pious Prelate, who lived highly in the Queens favour for a long time, his life being at last, by favouring (as was said) the Puritans Conventicles; but the true cause indeed was, for the disallowing the Marriage of King of an Italian Priest with another mans Wife, against the Earl of Leicester pleasure. Grindall dying, John Whitgift succeeded in the See of Canterbury, being transtlated thither from the See of Warter.

At this time, certain Popish Books written against the Queen, and Princes Excommunciate, with drew divers from their Allegiance, and particularly, so intoxicated one Somervile, an Englishe Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but blood and death against all Protestants, set upon one or two by the way with his drawn Sword. Being apprehended, he fluck not to say, That he would murder the Queen with his own hands. Hereupon he, and upon his intimation, Edward Arden his father-in-law (a man of an ancient House in Warwick-shire) Ardens wife, their Daughter, Somervile's wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemned; Somervile was principal, the rest as accessorys. Three days after, Somervile was found strangled in the Prison, Arden was executed and quartered; the women and Priest were spared. Many pined the old Gentleman Arden, as milled by the Priests; and (as it was generally believed) brought to his end through the envy of Leicester, who used to call Whore-mater, Up-fart, and many such opprobrious names.

In the Netherlands, the English Garrison at Lign in Flanders being neglected, the Governor Pipes, and the other Captains, for want of pay, upon Composition, yielded up the Town to the Spanish, the Queen ordering them, to their homes, joyed themselves to the Prince of Persia; at whose hands finding them lighted, by degrees they fled all away, and came all to unlicked ends.

In Ireland the famous Rebell Gyrald Fitz-Gyrald, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having a long time in lurking places escapecl the English, was now by a common Soulidier found out in a poor Cottage and Iain. His head was sent into England, and lay upon London Bridge. This end had this great Lord, deter-ded from Mauces, the Son of Gyrald of Wind-fore, an English man, famous amongst those who first set upon Ireland, in the year 1706. He possessed whole Countries, together with the County Palatine of Kerry, and had of his own Name and Race, at least five hundred Gentlemen at his Command. All whom, and his own life also, he left within the space of three years, very few of the House being left. But this great disaster he fell into, by provoking Traayerous to his Prince, at the instigation of a certain Popish Priest. Of whom, the chief was one Nicholas Sanders an English man, who at the same time dyed miserably of Fatime, being starved to death, when as being forfaken, and running mad upon his ill fuccease, he roamed up and down the Mountains and Groves, finding nothing to sustain him. In his Script were found certain Orations and Letters, written to heare the Rebels, and promising large Rewards from the Pope and King of Spain, upon the Rebels ill successes; James Fitz-Ephraim, Vicount Baltinglas fled into Spain, where he pined away with grief. He out of zeal to the Roman Religion, a little before he had taken up Arms with the Rebels, and offorthing the Earl of Ormond his Neighbour to do the like, (who drew his Lineage from St. Thomas of Canterbury) he used their words to perswade him, That if Saint Thomas of Canterbury had not died for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond: for King Henry the Second, to expiate the mur-ther of Thomas Becket, gave Larg Lends in Ormond to his Predecessor.

The beginning of the next Spring, certain Scots, together with Gunny, plotted again to purprise the King, pretending only a care of Religion, and to remove several Councillors from him: but the King having intelligence of their practic, used means by Colonel Snistow, to have Gunny taken and cast into prison; whereupon Murt, Glazier, Augus, and other of the Confederates fled into England, and beseech the Queen to committer their exilte, who had incurred the Kings displeasure, to do her and the Kingdom of England service. The King on the other side, accultur them to the Queen of hainous Crimes, and requires to have them delivered up into his hands. But Secretary Waring, who bore great good will to these men, so

At this time Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador, was thrust out of England, for joining with Throgmorton in his Treason against the Queen; whereupon Sir William Wade was sent to the King of Spain, to satisfy him how ill Mendoza had discharged the Office of an Ambassador here in England; who, when the King admitted him not to his Presence, but in a threatening manner, putting him off to his Counsellors; Wade taking it in great disdain, boldly said, That it was a declared Custom amongst Princes (though in war of Heat) to give Ambassadors audience, and thereupon (though he did not declare his Ambassage) and so returned into England unhurt. The greatest matters laid to Mendoza's charge, were gotten out of Throgmorton's Confection; for when he was in danger to be apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a box of Writings; and when his Chefs were searched, there were found two Scoowils, one with the names of the Ports of England, and in the other, the names of the Nobility and Gentry in England, that favoured the Romish Religion. These, when Throgmorton was far from the Place, were committed, and found to it upon the very Rack, and being brought to the Rack the second time, he then confessed all; That Morgan, by Letters out of France had given him information, that the Catholick Princes had decreed to invade England, and with the help of the Duke of Guise, to free the Queen of Scots; and that nothing was now wanting but money and aid in England: and that for procuring of this, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mops, was sent into Suffolk, where the Duke of Guise intended to land; and that he had imparted all this matter to Mendoza, and intimated the names of the Ports, and of the Noble men that should assist. But being arraigned at the Guild-hall, he denied all this again, saying, He had spoken so, because he would not be Racked again. Yet being condemned, he飞 the flying to the Queen mercy, confessing all manner of things he had before related; and there and at Galway was executed again. So false to it self is the mind of man, when it is divided between hope and fears, and lies under the burthen of a guilty conscience.

Sir William Wade being returned from Spain, was employed to the Queen of Scots, about the Treaty begin two years before: To whom the difcontented Queen sincerely professed, that she devoted her service and herself to the Queen of England; and made solemn promise, That if the former Treaty might go on, he would mediate with the King her Son, to receive into favour the Earl of Angus, and the other Scotch Lords, and would charge the Bishops of Ross and Glasgow, her Agents in France, to have no further to do with the English Fugitives. These things Queen Elizabeth heard gladly, and thereupon sent Real to the Queen of Scots, who joyfully with the Earl of Strensham should signify unto her, That if the continued fill in the same mind as she had delivered to Wade; Sir Walter Mildmay should come out of hand to her, and treat concerning her liberty; but withall, the commanded Mildmay and Real to dive into her as well as they could, to know what profit the Duke of Guise had on Foot. To that which she had spoken to Sir William Wade, the Queen of Scots made a wary
